The interview of our artistic correspondent with the Hon. R. W. Thompson, Secretary of the Navy, contained in the present issue of our paper, being Number 10 of the series, cannot fail to interest, since it deals with a question of such vital importance as the supremacy of the Stars and Stripes on the high seas. Mr. Thompson's views are succinctly set forth, while the details with regard to the inner life of the boys enlisted on board our training-ships are as copious as they are engrossing.

In accordance with our announcement of last week, we issue our Holiday Double Number with the addition of a thrilling story by Christian Reid, and a poem by John Moran, while, owing to increased public demand, we also issue a Supplement, making in all 36 pages, of such varied and absorbing matter, as to render this number of our paper in every sense doubly valuable, interesting and entertaining. Our next issue, in addition to other important material, will contain a charming story from the gifted pen of Mrs. Ann S. Stephens, entitled, "Play in Hearts"; a seasonable tale, "Saintly's Christmas Gifts," by Mrs. H. W. Pierson; and the conclusion of "Which of them will be Mary?"

CAUSE FOR GLADNESS.

WITH all the pleasure due to the occasion, we bid our thousands of readers a "merrie" Christmas. The year now rapidly drawing to a close has been crowded with happifying events, both to Government and people. Everywhere throughout the country the revivifying effects of better times have been seen and felt. Commerce, manufactures, mining, agriculture and labor have been brought to experience the pulsations of a new life. Resumption has given increased strength to the national credit, dissipated the fears of over-sensitive capital, and opened the avenues of success to industrial enterprise. Foreign nations have become our tributaries, and pour their golden hoards into the lap of the nation. To what extent the country has profited through its foreign commerce can best be shown by the figures. During the past fiscal year—six months of which are embraced in 1879—the exports, re exports and imports of merchandise have been as follows:

Exports of domestic merchandise...	$698,340,790
Exports of foreign merchandise	12,098,651
	$710,439,441
Imports of merchandise.....	445,777,778
Balance in favor of United States ...	$264,661,666

From July 1st to November 15th of the present year, embracing a period of only four and one-half months, the balance due and received from abroad amounted to $59,000,000 in gold, and still the payments continue coming in.

The years covered by the war, and thence onward to the Fall of 1873, have been denominated flush times. But comparing the situation in 1879 with that of ten years ago, we find that the gold value of our domestic exports has increased from $275,166,697 in 1869 to $698,340,790 in 1879. The difference amounts to nearly 254 per cent., and presents a broad contrast between so-called flush times and solid prosperity. In addition to the great gain in exports, the country, since 1872-3, has reduced its imports of foreign merchandise more than 44 per cent., which result has been highly favorable to our manufactures. The domestic producers of watches, clocks, cotton fabrics, silks, woolen goods, clothing, boots, shoes, iron, steel, etc., have all experienced beneficial results from this reduction in imports. It has enhanced the volume of their own products, and provided additional employment for labor. Thus the importation of railroad bars fell off from 531,337 tons in 1872 to 2,611 tons for the past fiscal year, and this difference our own rolling mills have been called to supply. It may also be said that American manufacturers, under the new order of affairs, are now building up a fair export trade. Many products heretofore exported in small quantities, or not at all, now find profitable markets in foreign countries, and some of these products are exported to countries from which a few years ago they were largely imported into the United States.

In all business centres the tide of prosperity has steadily risen, and swept in a resistless current the whole country round. Domestic trade has grown and prospered throughout the year. Although we have more than twenty-two thousand vessels engaged in coastwise and interior trade, yet the railways have found profitable employment in moving local and Inter-State commerce, rising in value to thousands of millions of dollars. The present year has been a good one for the carrying trade. The earnings of our railways have been enlarged, and they have not hesitated to spend a fair proportion in improvements, and this, in turn, has helped the cause of labor.

The march of tramping multitudes has been arrested by the new turn in business affairs. The cotton and woolen mills of the East, once idle or making only half-time, now find their utmost capacity taxed. Many of them are running day and night to meet the growing demand. During the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1879, our imports of cotton goods amounted to nearly $30,000,000, and of woolen goods to more than $50,000,000. Last year the imports of cotton goods were reduced more than $15,000,000, and woolen fabrics more than $27,500,000. The home consumption of such goods, however, has not been lessened, but our own manufacturers supply the demand. During the so-called flush times the products of American cotton mills found but little favor abroad. Their exportations now treble those of ten years ago, and their ability to compete with others is beginning to be acknowledged even in England. Our woolen mills, too, are turning out goods equal to the best of foreign importations, and the largest proportion of woolen stuffs now worn in this country are the products of American looms.

In iron and steel we have become practically independent of the whole world. These interests have also been touched by the magic wand of returning prosperity, and, to use a modernism, made to "boom." In the whole State of Pennsylvania, the great iron centre, there is not an idle mill to-day. New works are being erected, and everywhere the producers of iron have more than they can do at prices highly remunerative. At no time in our history has the iron interest been so prosperous as at present.

The mining of ore and coal corresponds to the forward movement of industry and trade. The production of anthracite coal, according to present figures, will amount, in round numbers, to 26,000,000 tons for the year, making an excess of from eight to ten millions of tons over the production of 1878.

A good share of the inflowing prosperity has fallen to the lot of that great section which, with magnificent agricultural resources at command, feeds America and a goodly portion of Europe. For the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1879, the exports of breadstuffs amounted to $210,355,528, and constituted about 30 per cent. of all domestic merchandise sent abroad. The wheat, corn, oats, flour, beef, pork, lard, and other productions of the West, play no unimportant part in the industrial economy of the country. Fair prices remunerate the farmers of that broad section, and they now part with their surplus crops for gold, or money possessing a purchasing power of one hundred cents to the dollar. In January, 1877, the average price of wheat in New York was $1.47 currency, per bushel. The selling price now varies, according to quality and time of delivery, from $1.53 to $1.59 gold, per bushel. At the former period Western flour sold in the New York market at an average of $5.50 per barrel; the price at this time ranges from $6.40 to $7.25 per barrel. None can begrudge the golden harvest now being reaped by the West through a return to better times.

Good has also befallen the South during the present year. If spindles, looms, furnaces and mills have been set going in the North, and commerce and manufactures have received a new impetus, there are solid advantages accruing to the Southern section. Last year the cotton crop of the South was greater than at any former time. Her exports of that staple amounted to 1,608,000,000 pounds. The cotton crop of this year, as reported, will exceed that of 1878 by 500,000 bales. Her tobacco crop will yield 12,000,000 pounds more than last year, and her people will make 200,000 more hogsheads of sugar than they produced in 1878. It is computed that the increase in these crops alone will be worth from $40,000,000 to $50,000,000 to the South.

Truly the year 1879 has inaugurated a new era in our national history. It has bestowed substantial benefits upon the whole country. Indulging the hope that our new-found prosperity may permanently continue, we close, as we began, by wishing our readers in every section a Merry Christmas.

THE CHRISTMAS STOCKING.

THE New England Puritans, in their stern determination to have as little as possible in common with other Christians, abolished Christmas. They substituted for it the two celebrations of Fast Day and Thanksgiving Day, the former to represent the solemn, and the latter the joyful, aspects of Christianity. The inherited impulses of eighteen hundred years have, however, proved too strong for the Puritans. Fast Day is dead and its melancholy ghost is rarely visible even in Massachusetts. Thanksgiving Day, in spite of the devout wording of Presidential proclamations, has virtually lost its religious significance, and has become a day of experiments as to the strength and capacity of the American stomach. Meanwhile we have reclaimed our share of the great festival of the Christian world, and Puritan Boston now welcomes Christmas as warmly, and celebrates it as joyfully, as Roman Catholic Rome or Anglican London. Yet we may not safely boast of our regained and beloved Christmas. As German Rationalism is ceaselessly mining the foundations of orthodox Protestantism, so another German heresy is stealthily at work, ostensibly on the side of Christmas, but really in hostility to it; and, unless we awake to the threatening danger, we may yet see our Christmas empty of delight, and dragged down to the level of the materialistic and prosaic Thanksgiving Day.

For many years Christmas has been associated in the American mind with stockings. The rite of the midnight-stocking was in the childhood of the present generation, the most important feature of Christmas celebration. The "Filling of the Stocking" might have furnished Longfellow with a worthier subject than the "Building of the Ship." It was the gage of parental affection. The cold-hearted stepmother instructed her accidental children to hang up their smallest socks; but the true mother, in pious emulation of the pelican of the wilderness, gave her beloved little ones her own deep and expansive stocking, and filled it to the rim. There are many pleasures which fall to the lot of the successful man, but not one of them compares with the internal delight with which, as an expectant small boy, he awoke in the darkness of the early Christmas morning to grasp the mysterious and precious stocking. What splendid possibilities of marvelous toys and seductive candies lay hid in the distended leg, or lurked in the remote recesses of the foot! What a delicious joy there was in striving to indentify, by the sense of touch alone, the carefully wrapped up packages that were drawn out one by one, and with what a blessed sense of boundless wealth was the stocking hugged in childish arms as the possessor lay down again to wait for daylight. The most successful American of our generation has had wealth, fame and honors lavished thick upon him since he reached his fortieth birthday, but he would, doubtless, confess that the Christmas stocking of fifty years ago thrilled him with pleasure which neither the triumph at Appomattox nor the welcome at Philadelphia could surpass, or even rival.

It cannot be denied that the stocking of our fathers—or, more strictly, of our mothers—is gradually being superseded by the German Christmas tree. The advocates of this green and brilliant heresy appeal to our pride of reason. They tell us that the stocking ceremony is based upon a myth unworthy of an enlightened age. There is no supernatural being who descends the nocturnal chimney, and it is criminal to seem, even by implication to give support to so ridiculous a legend. There is nothing, they tell us, of mystery or superstition about the Christmas-tree. The children know that it is a purely material tree, lit by genuine candles. It fosters in them no love for the vague and mysterious, and is, in all respects, a purely Protestant and reasonable thing. The Christmas-tree is dressed in the day-time, while the stocking is filled in the secrecy of night. The latter belongs to the age that believed in witchcraft. The former is in consonance with the intelligence and freedom of the nineteenth century. Misled by these plausible pretenses, thousands of American families have renounced Santa Claus and abandoned the stocking, and they vainly fancy that they can still retain the spirit, while throwing away the substance of Christmas.

The results of the spread of the Christmas-tree heresy will be vast and terrible. It will necessarily affect the peace of the family. The children no longer come to the breakfast-table "filled from the heart to the lips" with bliss and candy. The Christmas tree must be exhibited later in the day and in the depressing presence of the grown-up folk. The untrammeled freedom with which each child explored, in privacy and darkness, his particular stocking, vanishes, when, with the constant exhortation "Now, children, don't touch anything," ringing in his ears, he gazes solemnly at the blazing tree. In such circumstances the childish heart feels cheated of its rights, and the peace which the early morning stocking brings in its beneficent calf is rarely found in the household where the Christmas-tree has found an entrance. That blighting bush also lights the way for jealousy, and kindles envy in the youthful breast. Every child, surveying the presents hanging on its branches, hopes that the best ones may fall to his lot, and inevitably finds himself disappointed and dissatisfied when he fails to receive them. In spite of all its candles the Christmas-tree casts deep and lasting shadows, that renders what might be a happy Christmas a discontented and miserable day.

But there are even worse consequences than these. We recognize sadly the fact of the decay of faith, but our Christmas-trees have no small share in it. If we blot the image of Santa Claus from the infantile mind, can we wonder if the child, grown older, finds it difficult to believe in more important saints? When we take away the stocking, we at the same time destroy the charm of mystery and the reverence for the unseen. The Christmas-tree is the representative of the material; the stocking is the symbol of the spiritual. Rationalism lurks in the branches of the Christmas-tree, and its rootless trunk rests on Positivism. The stocking is full of faith, and no child can touch it without reverence and awe. The stocking and the tree are as far apart as Cardinal Newman and Dr. Strauss.

We can trace the influence of the Christmas-tree and the Christmas-stocking wherever they exist. Its Christmas-trees have brought Germany to a belief in Bismarck and blood and iron; and have converted the warm-blooded Protestantism of Luther into the cold scepticism of the Tubingen school. The Christmas stockings of England have strengthened her masses in their reverence for the English Church, in spite of the insidious efforts of Ritualist reconstructionists, and Broad Church distructionists. In our own country, the spread of unbelief has kept steady pace with the spread of Christmas-trees. If we are to keep the true spirit and cling to the real meaning of Christmas, we must hold fast to our Christmas-stockings. Shall our children, in the innocence of their hearts, ask for stockings, and shall we give them the glittering mockery of trees? Let us pledge ourselves by the memory of our youthful joys that the Christmas-stocking shall for ever usher in the dawn of the American Christmas.

POPULAR RIGHTS.

MAJORITY rule is the great central principle of our governmental system. So long as that principle shall be respected and maintained, just so long, and no longer, can we have faith in the continuance of republican institutions. To subvert, or in any way overturn, the popular will, whether through the agency of Returning Boards, or of Governors and Councils, is to do violence to constitutional government and prepare the way for its final downfall.

Our government is elective in character. The men who administer that government, of whatever grade, are to be chosen by the people. When two or more candidates are presented for the same office a majority of legal electors must choose between them, and when a majority have made choice as to who shall administer public affairs, their judgment must be respected. It must stand as the popular verdict, and no authority less than that of the people should be permitted to reverse it. In no instance, however slight, can popular government be beaten down and trampled under foot without endangering the whole system. It is as essential to respect the will of the majority in the election of a township constable as that in the election of a national magistrate. If by art and trickery a township, county, or State may be disfranchised and the popular will thwarted, then the whole government may, in like manner, be revolutionized and republicanism be made to give place to despotism.

The American people owe it to themselves and posterity to maintain a regular, steady, conservative government, founded on broad, popular representative systems. They cannot afford to wink at any violation of the ballot-box, or suffer any infraction of popular rights. If this republic is to stand, the will of the majority, whenever properly expressed, must remain unquestioned. No greater misfortune could befall the country than to destroy the right of the majority to rule. Borrowing the language of Daniel Webster, we may say that "other misfortunes may be borne, or their effects overcome. If disastrous war should sweep our commerce from the ocean, another generation may renew it; if it exhaust our treasury future industry may replenish it; if it desolate and lay waste our fields, still, under a new cultivation, they will grow green again, and ripen to future harvests. It were but a trifle even if the walls of the national capital were to crumble, if its lofty pillars should fall, and its gorgeous decorations be all covered by the dust of the valley. All these might be rebuilt. But who shall reconstruct the fabric of demolished government? Who shall rear again the well-proportioned columns of constitutional liberty? Who shall frame together the skillful architecture which unites national sovereignty with State rights, individual security, and public prosperity?" The edifice of constitutional American liberty, once destroyed, will never be reconstructed. History, however, will consign to everlasting infamy the men or party through whom its destruction may come.

We have been led by recent occurences in the State of Maine to make the foregoing remarks. At the election held in September last the Republicans, by a total vote exceeding that of all other parties by at least 5,000, elected so many of their legislative candidates as to secure a majority of seven in the Senate and twenty-nine in the Lower House. The Governor and Council, being of adverse politics, upon bare technicalities, have so unseated Republicans as to bring them into a minority of eighteen in the House and nine in the Senate. What is this but a trampling under foot of popular rights, a subversion of the will of the majority? The case of Senator Kellogg, of Louisiana, furnishes another illustration of the existing disposition to override representative government. Before admission to the Senate his case underwent a searching examination at the hands of a Senatorial committee, and his title to a seat received every confirmation. The now dominant party in the Senate have reopened the case and propose to give the place to Spofford, who, according to his own witnesses, has not the ghost of a title to justify the outrage. Whether these things be done by Democrats or Republicans, the American people should cry a halt. Popular government must be preserved at all hazards.

EVENTS ABROAD.

FRANCE has come nobly to the rescue of her sister Spain, and the fêtes in Paris in aid of the sufferers by the floods at Murcia have proved a superb success. Everybody lent a hand, from Sarah Bernhardt to La Gartijo, the famous bull-fighter. The floods in Spain have not, perhaps, been altogether an unmixed disaster, for it is alleged that they have prevented, or at least postponed, a little revolution. This would have been brought about by Montpensier agents, who have been hard at work fomenting disturbances in Carthagena, Murcia and Cadiz for their own purposes, grounding their crusade upon the rapprochement between Austria and Spain, consequent upon the marriage. Arms had already been bought in Birmingham, and there they lie for the present, until some opportunity can be found to smuggle them into Cadiz or Carthagena. The plot for the present is "off."

Eight million francs! This is the sum demanded by the Minister of Posts and Telegraphs of the French Chamber of Deputies to secure "rapid transit."

Yet another abortive Nihilist explosion in Russia. The country would seem to be undermined. This time Prince Dolgorouki, the Governor of Moscow, has escaped by the skin of his teeth. How will the Imperial Commission on administrative reform affect Nihilistic interests?

The prevalence of diphtheria in Russia has now assumed the proportions of a plague. At an extraordinary meeting of the Red Cross Society, held recently, it was decided that succor should be immediately afforded to the province of Pultova, where the children are said to be dying "like flies." The magnitude of the epidemic is shown by the fact that the Red Cross Expedition is to be composed of thirty doctors and three hundred nurses, and is to be furnished with nearly a quarter of a million roubles for expenses.

Immense quantities of forage are being stored in the depots along the Black Sea coast and the Russo-Roumanian frontier in readiness for military emergencies. In the matter of hay alone, twenty thousand tons have been ordered of contractors in the Odessa district. What does Roumania say to this?

The Chilians have again beaten the Peruvians, and against odds. The allied forces of Bolivia and Peru attacked an intrenched Chilian position at Dolores, near Agua Santa. The allied forces were driven back, their camp, thirteen cannon, and the Bolivian general, Villegas, taken. As may be expected, the Chilian loss was extraordinarily heavy.

So Lord Beaconsfield is to be impeached by the Parnell party. Martyrdom for the Juggler of the Jingoes! Perhaps this is the crown that Dizzy was waiting for, and hence his refusal of Tracy Turnerellis, now exhibiting at Madame Tussaud's. Speaking of Ireland, the Duchess of Marlborough, wife of the Lord Lieutenant, is seeking contributions towards a relief fund on the ground that, "While the present distress, actual or possible, is not for a moment comparable to that of 1847, still, undoubtedly, in parts of Kerry, Galway, Sligo, Mayo, Roscommon, Donegal and Cork, there will be extreme misery and suffering among the poor."

So the German army is to be increased—the artillery by 348 guns when on a peace footing, and 522 guns in war; the infantry by eight regiments, and the cavalry, engineer and marine divisions in proportionate degree. The annual conscription is to be raised to 175,000—an increase of 30,000—in order to supply this extension of the military system.

That arch-scamp, the ex-Khedive, is lying ill at Naples. Possibly too much maccaroni, a dish of which he is especially fond.

Vessels from the southern ports of the United States are now free of quarantine in Italian ports. The yellow flag need not now be run up beside the Stars and Stripes.

The famine in Silesia has been rendered more horrible by typhoid fever. The Government seems to be keenly alive to the desperate situation.

The eyes of England are anxiously strained towards Afghanistan, where affairs are assuming alarming conditions. General Roberts declares he can hold his own, but General Gough is short of supplies. A blunder like that committed at Isandula will shake England's empire in India. A success on the part of the Afghans may lead to a general uprising, and then what can a mere handful of troops, however devoted, do—but die.

TEMPERANCE advocates in New York and Brooklyn have added a clause to the usual pledge by which the signers agree to offer no wine to New Year's callers.

MR. TALMAGE has scored a second triumph in the Synod of Long Island, which has refused to alter the decision of the Presbytery of Brooklyn acquitting him on the famous charge of "common fame."

CONNECTICUT has imported a colony of cutlery workers from Sheffield; New Jersey, one of potters from Staffordshire; and now Ohio is receiving some of the most skillful glass-blowers of Antwerp.

A REPETITION of the Brooklyn Theatre horror was prevented at the Park Theatre, New York, on December 18th, by the coolness of the actor Emmet and the policeman Genore. The house was emptied without a panic, or the slightest injury to any one.

WHILE the Inman line has adopted the electric light for the illumination of the cabin and steerage of one of their vessels, a New Orleans company has gone further, and in the right direction, too, by furnishing a steamer with the lights on her pilot-house and forecastle.

SECRETARY SHERMAN persists in the belief that the Government cannot successfully place a bond paying less than 4 per cent. Still he has agreed to consult with the leading bankers of New York as to the practicability of floating a 3½ per cent. bond for refunding purposes.

RUMORS are rife of a marked uneasiness among the Mormons. Statements have been made that a projected emigration en masse to Mexico is receiving grave consideration in Salt Lake City. Apropos of this, and as a possible straw, we note that emigration to Apache County, Arizona, is very brisk, and that four hundred Mormons, with 12,000 head of cattle, are now en route to that county from Utah.

WHILE the public are warming in sympathy towards the Ponca Indians through the eloquent appeal of their earnest advocate "Bright-Eyes," the labors of another Indian princess, Sarah Winnemucca, should not be overlooked. At the request of her father, Chief Winnemucca, she has undertaken a mission to have her tribe gathered together again at their old home in Nevada, where they can follow peaceable pursuits and improve themselves. Sarah has a bright, resolute face, with brave, determined features, exhibiting lines of courage and resolve that tell the whole story of the indomitable daring which made her services as scout, guide and interpreter so invaluable to our Government during the late Bannock war.

PROFESSORSHIPS in the Chinese language have been established at Harvard and Yale Colleges, where Ku and the Rev. S. Wells Williams fill the chairs respectively; and at the University of California, where there is as yet no occupant. So far there has been no rush for Oriental instruction, and the enterprise is not a determined success. Against the theory that there is a field in China for American youth capable of speaking and writing the language of the country, is placed the practical testimony of persons conversant with the actual situation, which may explain why there is no noticeable demand for Chinese instruction in the United States. In China the commercial intercourse, or that relating to buying and selling, is done through "compradors," or natives, who can speak "pigeon English"; and though a white man could speak a commercial dialect of the community perfectly, yet he could not buy an invoice of tea, silk, or any other commodity, without engaging the services of a "comprador." The Chinese merchants will deal in no other way. Except for clerkships in foreign houses, a knowledge of Chinese is of little avail even in China; and when a commercial dialect is wanted it can be picked up in that country with more facility than in any other.

A BILL, greatly affecting the commercial interests of New York City, is that introduced into the House by Representative Muller. It provides for the creation of a permanently deep, wide and straight channel through Sandy Hook bar to New York. The greater the water facilities of the metropolis the better for its business and that of the country. But while considering projects for enlarging the harbor and river routes, wouldn't it be as well to take some practicable step towards rendering such operations unnecessary? If all the rubbish that has been dumped in the lower and upper bays could be at once removed, and the material for shoalings thus withdrawn, there would be little necessity for expensive dredgings and cuttings to render the harbor of New York what nature made it, the safest and best in the world.

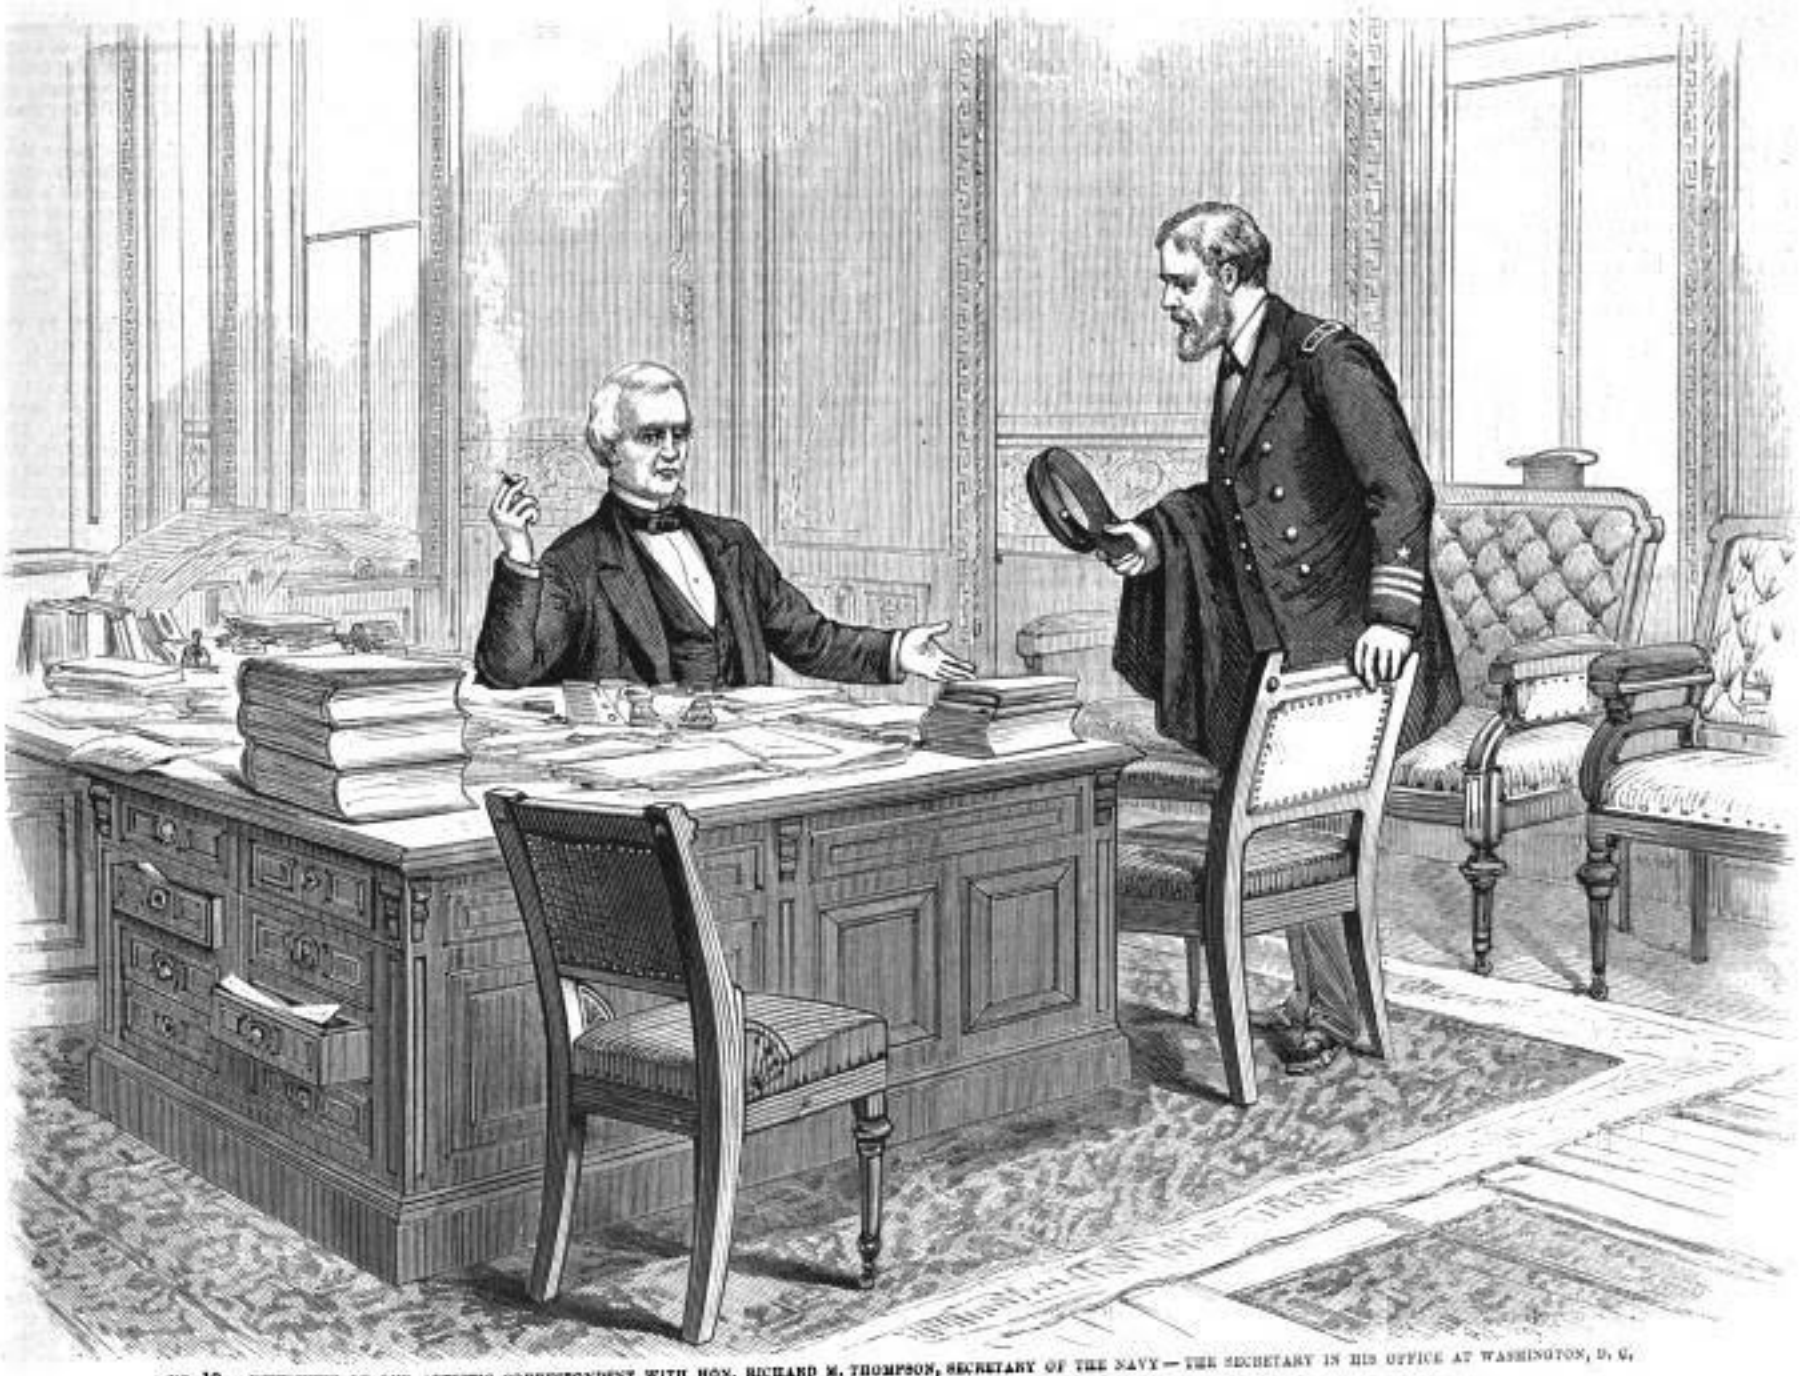
HON. ALEX. RAMSEY, SECRETARY OF WAR.

HON. ALEXANDER RAMSEY, the new secretary of War, was born near Harrisburg, Pa., September 8th, 1815. At an early age he entered Lafayette College, at Easton, and made such progress that when but thirteen years old he was appointed to a clerkship in the Register's Office of his native county. In 1840 he was chosen Secretary of the Electoral College of Pennsylvania, and a year later Clerk of the State House of Representatives. His first appearance in Washington was in 1843, when he took his seat as a Member of Congress. After holding the position two terms he was appointed Territorial Governor of Minnesota in 1849 by President Taylor, holding the post until 1853. Under his administration the Crescent State was settled. He participated in the negotiation of several treaties with the Indian tribes located in the Territory, by which a rapid development was secured, and became so enthusiastic in his work that he determined to settle in Minnesota permanently. In 1855 he was elected Mayor of St. Paul, the capital city, and in 1859 Governor of the State, being honored with a re-election in 1861. On March 4th, 1863, he entered the United States Senate as a Republican, in succession to Henry M. Rice, Democrat, and at the expiration of his first term was re-elected. In the Forty-third Congress he was Chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and a member of the Committee on Railroads. He was also a member of the National Committee appointed to accompany the remains of President Lincoln to Springfield, Ill. Mr. Ramsey retired from the Senate in 1875, and was succeeded by Hon. Samuel J. R. McMillan.

Ex-Senator Ramsey's nomination was confirmed without the usual reference to a committee, because of his former membership in the Senate, and he entered upon the discharge of the duties of the War Department as soon as Secretary McCrary vacated it to take the Circuit Judgeship.



HON. ALEXANDER RAMSEY, THE NEWLY-APPOINTED SECRETARY OF WAR.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY BRADY.

OLD ENGLAND IN THE OLDEN TIME.

YO, ho! the Christmas guests arrive, and at the door of the brave old hall stands its master, Sir Thomas Bridle, knight, the middle-aged gentleman, still portly, though not now stout and ruddy, whose heart, shielded by an ample waistcoat, over which is a warm, easy gown, furred at the cuffs and collar, swells visibly with half-suppressed emotion as he lifts his plumed and peaked hat from a brow already bald, and while his right hand is waving to the company a wide token of general greeting, receives with his left the frank hand-clasp of his brother, who, with his wife, children and kinsmen, have ridden through the bracing frosty air a good forty miles and more to be under the oaken beams of the old roof-tree on Christmas Day. The knight has his five children by his side, with Dame Alice, his wife. The three little maidens are Alice, Mabel and Maude; and the two sturdy boys, Richard and Harry. Mistress Margery, the shrewd housewife, is here with a watchful eye upon her brisk handmaidens. The veteran huntsman stands in the rear with the grooms, the scullions and the plow-boys. There is a young student—a Puritan and a poet—who is tutor to the boys. The girls are taught by a kinsman's two forlorn daughters, who have been generously taken home and protected by the very worthy knight. These are a pretty numerous family, but there is room in the old hall for a dozen more. The parish parson, meekly retiring from notice, watches the new arrivals from behind his patron's back. Some villagers are here to see the brave cavalcade. This is a grand occasion. Now will good ale, sherris, sack, and canary, flow as if from inexhaustible fountains; now will victuals cause the great oaken table to groan, from the lordly boar's head to the stewed capon; now will the family liveries shine resplendent—the knight's crest glittering like a gilded star; now will the merry customs of Christmas hearth and table, with the toasts and songs and frolics, be gone through, and, if yon dainty maid, riding pillion and about being lifted to mother earth, 'scape mistletoe kisses, shame upon the gallant into whose stalwart arms she is about to trust herself! What joy in the faces of the boy and girl on the white pony! How bravely the youngster in cloak and feathered hat and boots bestrides his nag! The dogs, too, are welcome at the old hall, and they know it. A greeting is waved from the lower-window to a mounted cavalier, who returns it with a joyous flourish of his plumed hat. Smiles are upon every face, and even the snow upon the quaint old roof smiles in the setting sun as it contemplates Christmas.

"GRANDMAMMA HAS COME!"

THE dear old lady has arrived at last, and her grandchildren are almost frantic with glee. She is received by the boys at the hall-door with great blowings of horns and beatings of drums, while the girls hasten to relieve her of such small parcels—and their name is legion—as she may happen to be incumbered with. The old lady is forcibly hustled into the parlor, a very bower of holly and ivy, and into an easy-chair, where eager and busy hands untie her bonnet-strings and unfasten her shawl. Grandmamma does not come without having had a satisfactory interview with Santa Claus en route. She brings a big box full of Christmas presents, and already has that bright-eyed young urchin made himself master of its contents by a Peeping Tom glance. He will have a pull at dolly rest what it may, and with watchful gaze on grandmamma, his hand is about to grasp the coveted object. His brother, a sturdy little rascal, gazes fondly out of his great big soft eyes at his grandmother. He is evidently her pet, and the feeling is thoroughly reciprocated. How daintily the second sister unpins the old lady's shawl, chattering like a magpie, while the elder sister superintends the operation, ready to seize upon the wrap and bear it away to a place of safety. This is a beautiful picture of home happiness, of youth clinging lovingly to age, of age fondly leaning to youth. The old lady is no longer old. In her granddaughter she sees herself as in the bygone time. She, too, stood at her grandma's knee—the good, gracious grandmamma, at rest for many years in the village churchyard. In the boys she beholds her brothers since scattered all over the wide, wide world, fighting its battles against desperate odds; but these memories of the past do not sadden her, not they. Here is youth and mirth and laughter; here is Christmas; here are her children's children, and, as she gazes upon these bright, young faces, the burden of the old song comes to her with gladsome meaning:

"And when with envy, Time, transported,
Doth seek to rob us of our joys,
You'll in your girls again be courted,
And I'll go wooing with the boys."

ON CHRISTMAS DAY.

BY CHRISTIAN REID.

CHAPTER I.

HERBERT BRUCE is in a furious passion. Furious is a strong word—but not at all too strong to express the tempest of rage which swells that young gentleman's breast, as he pours the recital of his wrongs and his wrath into the ear of his cousin, Adelaide Dunning, who sits listening patiently. She still mechanically holds open in her hand a book which she was reading when he entered the room a few minutes before; but her gaze is fastened on the carpet at her feet, and there is a curious expression on her face—an expression made up of sympathy one part, vexation two parts, amusement three parts. The sympathy and vexation she shows openly in her eyes and voice as she looks up, presently, but the amusement she conceals as well as she can. It would not harmonize with the temper Mr. Bruce is in, she is well aware.

"I am very, very sorry that this should have happened, Bertie," she says, as soon as she gets an opportunity to speak; "but, honest, I think it is your own fault."

"My fault!" cries Bertie, biting his long black mustache, as he looks at her with angrily sparkling eyes. "How can you possibly say that? Am I to blame for not choosing to see the woman I am engaged to flirting with every puppy in town?"

"Riding with a man is not necessarily flirting with him," says Miss Dunning, dryly. "And you are the first person who ever called Mr. Dorsay a puppy. I rode with him day before yesterday. Do you consider that I was flirting with him?"

"The cases are not parallel," answers her cousin, hotly. "You are not engaged to another man, and were not acting in express violation of his wishes. I told Annette that I would not submit to seeing her receive the attentions of other men, and she deliberately disregarded my request."

Adelaide has nothing to say to this; that is, she knows that it would be useless to say anything. After a pause, she asks if the engagement is positively broken off.

"Positively," is the curt reply.

"I am sorry," she says again, in a tone which shows how sincere her regret is.

"No need to be sorry," responds her cousin, gloomily. "I am not sorry. On the contrary, I consider myself fortunate in escaping what could not but have proved an unhappy marriage, and I despise Annette Reynolds as she deserves. But"—he hesitates, and there is a slight falter in his voice, as he adds, "of course I feel the thing sharply now. It is not possible for one's feelings to change in an hour or a day. I cannot forget that only this morning I looked upon her as my future wife."

"And don't you look upon her as your future wife now?" says a voice near by, so unexpectedly that both Herbert Bruce and his cousin start—the former with almost angry surprise, as he glances hastily around.

The man who has thus "stumbled on his counsel," is standing in an open French window a few steps away, and advances into the room the next moment, bows familiarly to Miss Dunning, and, taking possession of a chair with the manner of one quite at home, looks at Mr. Bruce, waiting a reply to the question he has asked.

"No, sir," answers the young man, recovering his temper and recollection at the look—for the gentleman, Major Falconer by name, is his former guardian. "She has just rejected me."

"Indeed?" says the major, in a tone of concern. "I am sorry to hear that. What is the meaning of it?"

"Bertie's jealousy," answers Miss Dunning, before Bertie himself has time to speak. "He has gone just a little too far in tormenting, for once. But it is only a lover's quarrel. They will make it up."

"Never!" cries her cousin, with flashing eyes. "It is she who has gone too far for once—and it is once for all. On the whole, I am not sorry that the affair has ended this way. A broken engagement is not so bad as an unhappy marriage—and I could never have been happy with an incurable flirt for a wife."

Saying which, he walks indignantly out of the room.

As the door closes on his exit, the two who remain look at each other significantly.

"It is only a lover's quarrel," says Miss Dunning again.

Major Falconer looks rather grave. "Lovers' quarrels are considered trifles," he says, "but I am afraid that, with a man so naturally irritable in temper as Bertie is, they may set a bad precedent for married life. Do you consider Miss Reynolds a flirt?"

"Certainly not!" answers his companion, with emphasis. "She is not in the least to blame in this quarrel—and so I told Bertie. He has worried her beyond endurance with his jealousy and irritability, and it is no wonder that her patience failed at last. But I think they will make it up. Bertie will come to his senses in a little time, and, I dare say, will succeed in persuading her to forgive and forget. She is very amiable."

Major Falconer does not speak for a minute or two—then he says, "Bertie may be right in thinking that it is better the affair should end in this way than in marriage. He is very young to marry. By waiting a few years, he will be able to make a more deliberate choice, and, it is to be hoped, will have learned to control his temper."

"That he may learn to control his temper before he marries is a consummation most devoutly to be desired, certainly," says Adelaide Dunning, with a smile, "for, if he don't, his wife will have a bad time of it; but as to making a more deliberate choice, if he lived a hundred years he could never find a woman to suit him better than Annette does, or as well. I fancy. She is pretty and bright, and has the sweetest of tempers; and it is her nature to make an idol of whoever she happens to be connected with. Every man likes to be the idol and oracle of his wife, I suppose; but Bertie will insist upon it. And he won't easily find another such worshiper as Annette would make."

"We must hope that he may not lose her, then," says the major. "Can't you act as peacemaker?"

"No. I should be afraid to undertake such a dangerous office. It is always best to let people manage their own affairs—particularly their love affairs."

"But want of skill in the art of management is Bertie's weak point," says Bertie's ci-devant guardian. "I don't doubt that he has been blundering deplorably. The wooing of a wife is like the playing of a game of chess—skill and management are absolutely essential to success."

The young lady laughs.

"You have had so much experience in the art of wooing that you may well lay down the law on the subject," she says, ironically.

"I have had no particular experience," he replies—"at least, not since I was a boy of Bertie's age"—at which qualification his companion smiles; "but my observation of the experience of other men has been exhaustive, and I have never known a case—always provided that there was no insurmountable obstacle to begin with—where good management did not succeed."

At this broad assertion, Miss Dunning elevates her brows.

"You don't agree with me?" says Major Falconer.

"Of course not. Good management, indeed! As if women were nothing but puppets!"

"You misunderstand me. I mean that when a man complains of having been badly treated by a woman, or even of having failed to win her, I believe that, in nine cases out of ten, his own blundering conduct of the affair is the cause of his failure."

"What a pity," says the young lady, demurely, "that you don't set Bertie an example of this 'conduct' of which you speak, major."

"I am about to do so," he replies—"that is, I came here a-wooing this afternoon. Will you marry me, Adelaide?"

She gazes at him for a moment in the most profound, the blankest amazement. Then a quick tide of color suffuses her face.

"Surely you must be jesting," she says.

"Is it probable that I would select such a subject as this to jest upon?"

"It seems impossible that you can be serious in asking me to marry you!"

"And why?"

"Everybody has always said, you know, that you wanted to marry mamma."

"I know, yes, that the gossips settled years ago that such a match was desirable; but Mrs. Dunning and myself did not happen to agree with them."

"Did you never think of it?"

"Never."

"How I wish I had known that all these years past!" she exclaims, her face clearing wonderfully. "Ever since I can remember, until lately, it has been the dread of my life. Within the last year I have thought there was no danger of it. But, oh, how jealous of you I used to be!—and now I hated you!"

"Won't you try to make up for that injustice by learning to love me now?"

He is talking in such a matter-of-course tone that the slight embarrassment which Adelaide at first felt, has vanished; and she smiles as she answers:

"I am sorry to seem disobliging, but I am afraid I cannot."

"May I ask why?"

"I—really I don't know. One doesn't reason about such a thing. I only feel sure of the fact."

"But one ought to reason about everything. Stop and think for a moment. You don't love any other man, do you?"

"No, indeed."

"Then, why should you not be willing to marry me?"

"I might answer that: 'I have no other but a woman's reason'—I am not willing to marry you because I am not willing to marry you. But since you are so persistent and argumentative, I will give you a reason—a good reason. You are so much older than I am."

"I am a good deal older, but probably not so much as you think. What do you take my age to be?"

"I suppose you are about my father's age—and I know that, if he was living, he would be forty-five."

"Take nine from forty-five and you have my age."

"Is it possible? Why, you are not as old as mamma, then?"

"Not by five or six years."

She looks at him with awakened attention—as one looks at an object which is so familiar to the eye as never before to have been regarded abstractly—and what she sees is a man not in his first youth, certainly, but with the grace of youth about him still. A handsome man, whose air and manner, taken with a certain imperative intonation of voice in speaking, might seem almost offensively haughty but for the frank good humor expressed by his large blue eye and smiling lip.

"I am waiting for an answer," he says. "Do you mean to capitulate at once, or to stand a siege?"

"Neither the one nor the other," she replies, lightly. "I mean you to be reasonable and understand that, after holding you in abhorrence all my life nearly as a prospective stepfather, I cannot suddenly transform you into a hero."

"I don't ask that"—he smiles here—"I will be satisfied with a gradual transformation into a lover. I am 'too old,' perhaps, to talk sentiment, but I love you heartily, Della, and I don't intend to give up the hope that you may yet love me in return. Take a little time to consider—two or three months, say. This is September—the twenty-fifth, I believe?"

"Yes."

"On Christmas Day, then, I will ask to hear my fate."

"You have heard it now, I assure you," she answers, seriously. "Indeed, my dear major, you have made a mistake—that is all."

"Perhaps so," he says, with a curious smile, and drops the subject.

CHAPTER II.

SCARCELY anything that could have happened to her would have surprised Adelaide Dunning so much as that which had happened—a proposal from Major Falconer.

"The last man, the very last man in the world from whom I should have expected such a thing!" she says, to herself, as she is changing her dress for going out immediately after he has left her. Standing before her mirror, she looks at the face reflected therein with the same sort of scrutiny that she had bestowed on Major Falconer's a short time before. It is a lovely face, with pale, ivory-tinted complexion, soft, dark eyes, and well-cut features that will grow handsomer with years—a face which any man might be excused for falling in love with.

As she is leaving the house she is joined by Bruce—rather to her regret—for she was on her way to see Annette Reynolds. But when he says, "Come and take a walk with me," she assents; and, passing through a short straggling suburb, they are now in the shade of a forest as lonely and untrodden to all appearances as if it was miles away from anything like civilization, instead of being on the outskirts of a prosperous country town.

It is an ideal September afternoon. The air is soft and balmy—the sunshine bright but not too warm—the foliage showing Autumn's approach only by that vivid, spring-like greenness which is the first change from the deep-green of Summer, and which will soon in its turn change into gold and crimson and all the innumerably varied hues that make the earth at once so gorgeously and so mournfully beautiful at this season.

Bruce leads the way; and as soon as they get fairly within the depths of the woods, with the soothing stillness of solitude around them, he flings himself upon the grass in the shade of a gnarled old oak, and says to his cousin, who has sat down beside him:

"I am going to take the train for Memphis to-night, Della."

Adelaide utters a cry of dismay. "Oh, Bertie!" she says, eagerly, imploringly; "pray, pray don't think of doing such a mad thing! You know that it is simply suicidal for an unacclimated person to go there now!"

"My mind is made up," he answers. "I wish very much that I had gone when I first spoke of it—when the fever first began. I ought not to have allowed myself to be dissuaded from doing what I felt to be a duty. However, I shall start to-night; and as I do not want another scene with my aunt and Major Falconer about it, I thought I would merely tell you, and you can tell them to-morrow."

His cousin looks at him with a sense of despair. What can she say, what can she do, to prevent his carrying out this rash design? It is true, as he said, that he was resolved, when the fever first broke out two months before—in the fatal July of 1878—to go at once and offer his services as a physician. He has been studying medicine for several years, and though not yet privileged to write M. D. after his name, feels himself quite capable of doing M. D. work—in this instance at least. His guardian, his aunt, his cousin, his fiancée, had all protested so unanimously and entreated so earnestly against his going, that he had reluctantly yielded to their arguments and importunity. But it is not too much to say that it has been with a pain nearly resembling remorse that he has read day after day the terrible fever record. Nothing but the undeniable fact, so much dwelt upon by Major Falconer from the first, and latterly reiterated every day by the "Howards" in their official reports, that unacclimated persons instead of being a help only afforded fresh material for the fever, and gave increased labor to the already overburdened corps of doctors and nurses, has held the young man in check this long. Though acknowledging to himself that, under the circumstances, it would be an error of judgment in him to go, he has not been able to stifle the feeling of self-reproach already alluded to, and a something like resentment at the opposition he has met with; and this state of mind has had a very bad effect on his temper—which, as before hinted, is not at the best angelic. Miss Reynolds's amiability and Miss Dunning's patience have both been amply tested, and have both up to the present time borne the test triumphantly; but at last, in an ungoverned ebullition of jealousy he had, as his cousin said, gone just a little too far with the former. He is too angry to see, much less to admit, this, and he is determined that he will not longer be prevented by any consideration from going to Memphis.

This is the state of affairs; and Adelaide, looking at him as he half reclines beside her, with his elbow resting on the ground, and his head supported on his hands, while his handsome face wears an expression of obstinate resolution, feels that here is a predestined victim for Yellow Jack. They were reared together as brother and sister, and she is, of course, miserable at this idea. The thoughts that come crowding on her are so horrible, that she suddenly bursts into a passion of tears, and sobs convulsively.

At this unexpected response to the confidence he is reposing in her, the young gentleman is both shocked and provoked. He feels as he might if a man had knocked him down when he was off his guard—that she is taking undue advantage of him. Never before, in any of the myriad scrapes of his boyhood, youth and manhood—in all which, she had been his confidant and consoler—had she resorted to the womanish weapon of tears to carry a point with him. She had scolded, she had entreated, she had persuaded, but never before had she bullied him with a shower of tears.

As she bows her face in her hands and weeps unrestrainedly, he finds his resolution becoming dangerously weakened, and feels the necessity of making a stand against such illegitimate influence. Therefore, he says more brusquely than he ever in his life spoke to her before:

"If I had imagined for a moment that you would make such a scene as this, I should not have said a word of my intention. But I did not want to go away without telling you good-by."

A fresh burst of tears at this.

"If you go"—sobbingly—"I know—I know you will—d-i-e!"

"The chances are that I shall," he answers, coolly. "But what difference does that make? Miss Reynolds will enjoy riding and flirting as much——"

"I am not thinking of her," interrupts his cousin, passionately. "I am thinking of myself—and mamma! Oh, how selfish it makes people to be in love! You know that if you were mamma's son, and my brother, we could not care more for you than we do; and you—you don't consider us for a moment! You only care about Annette—and are wanting to punish her by going!"

The color flames into the young fellow's face. The accusation is not altogether just—but it has a grain of truth in it, and stings accordingly.

"Della, is it kind or just to say that, when you know how I have felt from the first?" he asks, reproachfully.

"I know how you have felt from the first; but all the same, it is because of your quarrel with Annette that you are rushing off now—though you may not be aware of it. If I was in your place—and thought as badly of her as you do—I certainly would not throw away my life to spite her! I would not let her know that I was so badly hurt."

This last shot tells, as Adelaide is not slow to perceive, and she follows up the advantage thus gained so successfully, that, after a long argument supported by many tears, Bertie at last promises to give up his suicidal project, as she calls it.

CHAPTER III.

NOTWITHSTANDING her opinion as expressed to Major Falconer, that it is always best to leave people to manage their own love-affairs, and her resolution that she would not undertake the delicate office of peace maker, Adelaide is urged by the exigency of the case to waive this resolution and make an effort towards the reconciliation of her cousin and her friend. She is by no means certain that, though Bertie has given up for the present his intention of facing the pestilence, he may not change his mind again, and start off suddenly some day without a word of warning even to herself; and she knows that the best safeguard against this danger is to range Annette's influence with her own, by the restoration of the engagement. So, immediately after breakfast on the day following that of the quarrel, she goes to Miss Reynolds—expecting to find that young lady as placable as usual.

She is disappointed in this hope. Annette's long suffering patience is at last exhausted. She is gentle and reasonable, unchanged in her manner to Adelaide herself, but to all the arguments of the latter she answers, substantially, exactly what her lover said—that a broken engagement is better than an unhappy marriage.

"I suppose it is useless to argue with two such obstinate people," says Adelaide, dejectedly, "and yet I am sure you love each other. The end of the matter will be that Bertie will go off to Memphis or New Orleans and die of yellow fever."

"He has too much sense, I am sure, to do that," replies Annette, "after the Howards have so expressly requested those who have not had the fever to stay away."

"I had all the difficulty in the world to prevent his starting last night," Adelaide says, a little coldly, as she rises to leave. And, glad to see that Annette pales at hearing this, she adds, earnestly, "If he does go, Annette, I know you will wish you had done anything to prevent it."

She is not speaking merely for effect—she really believes that there is danger her cousin may go, as she says, at any moment: and her spirits are at the lowest ebb, as she walks slowly homeward, so absorbed in thought as not to notice anything around her. And so it chances that she does not observe two gentlemen who stand at a corner talking, until close beside them. At her approach, the one facing her lifts his hat, and, as she glances up to return his salutation, she becomes aware that the other—whose back is towards her—is Major Falconer.

The uneasiness she has been feeling about Bertie almost ever since she parted from Major Falconer has in a great measure banished him and his proposal from her mind—or, at least, kept them very much in the background—and now, thus reminded, it is with a start that the recollection returns. She colors slightly as, turning, he sees her and bows. He immediately concludes his conversation, and before she has proceeded many steps is by her side.

"I am glad to see you," she says, looking up with a smile, "for I am dreadfully worried about this quarrel of Bertie's. I have just been to Annette, and she is as unmanageable as Bertie himself. It is impossible to blame her; but I am afraid if she continues in her present mind—that is, if Bertie tries to make it up, and she refuses—he will go to Memphis at last."

"You are alarming yourself unnecessarily," says Major Falconer. "Bertie may be very desperate about this affair—he is hasty and reckless about everything—but he is not totally devoid of common sense."

"I doubt he will prove himself to be so in the present instance," she answers.

Lifting her eyes, that have a very distressed expression, they meet those of her companion, which are fixed on her with a look which brings the blood in a crimson tide to her cheeks and brow.

"Have you given me one kind thought since we parted?" he asks, in a very lover-like tone.

The girl is divided between an inclination to frown and a temptation to smile, so oddly does the character he has suddenly assumed seem to her to sit on this man whom she has always rather shrunk from as a possible future stepfather. And yet she is somewhat touched by the earnestness of his manner, and not a little flattered by his admiration.

"Truth compels me to confess that I have not given many thoughts, either kind or otherwise, to anything but this wretched affair," she answers. "I have been so miserable about it, that I scarcely slept at all last night." And then she tells him of her cousin's intended journey, and the difficulty she had in preventing it.

"I am both surprised and disappointed to hear this," says Major Falconer, very gravely. "I thought Herbert had more courage as well as more sense than such folly as this indicates."

"I thought so, too," says Adelaide. "But it seems there are no bounds to the folly of which a man when in love is capable."

It is Bertie only who is in her mind while she speaks; but suddenly remembering how her companion may apply her remark, she colors again, and adds quickly:

"I suppose we must expect folly from such a mere boy as Bertie."

"There I differ with you," says the major. "However young or however desperately in love a man may be, he ought never to forget either self-control or self-respect."

They walk on in silence for a minute, Adelaide much perturbed, and Major Falconer almost sternly grave. Once she glances at his face and is astonished—it is so different from usual. The brows are drawn together, making the eyes look very deep-set, the lips are compressed, even the heavy brown mustache seems to have exchanged its ordinary amiable droop for a more horizontal and less amiable attitude. She is half-frightened, but will not give way to such a feeling. On the contrary, she says with a smile:

"You look every inch a soldier, as if you were about to court martial poor Bertie."

"If I had the power to do so, I am not sure but that I should exercise it," he answers. "I must confine myself to a reprimand, which he shall certainly have."

"Do you think it will do any good?"

"I hope so. At all events it will ruffle his vanity to be made to understand how weakly he is acting, and he deserves a worse penalty than that for causing you so much anxiety."

"Oh, so far as I am concerned it makes not the slightest difference," she says, hastily. "Pray don't scold him on my account. Women were born to suffer in this way, you know."

"They were born to the suffering which is the common lot of humanity; but there is no necessity for their suffering from the selfishness of men, as they so often do."

"Is it possible for a man to help being selfish?"

"Yes. If you will marry me I will convince you that it is."

She looks up frankly.

"I do not love you," she says, gently, "and this being the case, you would not wish me to marry you, would you?"

"Yes," he answers again, unhesitatingly. "I would wish you to marry me to-morrow—to-day—and by the mere force of will I would soon compel you to love me."

"Do you know," she says, after a moment's silence, which he did not interrupt, though he watches her face keenly, "that I am beginning to be—a little—afraid of you?"

"Afraid of me!" he repeats, in surprise.

"You look so stern, and speak so arbitrarily about poor Bertie. And yet his fault is a very venial one."

"Don't you know why I feel and speak so?"

"Because you are out of patience with his folly in wanting to throw his life away so fruitlessly, I suppose."

"No; I might excuse that. But I am displeased at the selfishness with which he would fain march to his own end without a thought of the pain he is giving you."

"That is natural—in a man," looking up with a charming smile.

"Natural in him, I grant—considering how you have spoiled him all his life; but not the less odious, Adelaide," he goes on, in an abrupt, eager tone, "if you will give a little of the affection you lavish on this petulant boy to me, I will know better than he does how to value it."

"I think you talk strangely," says Adelaide. "My affection for Bertie is very different from the sentiment I should have to feel for a man before marrying him. And to marry without this sentiment I never could."

"You are determined against me, then?"

The almost careless ring in his voice as he asks this question is so unlike the earnestness with which he spoke the minute before, that Adelaide is struck by it, and a half-unconscious emotion of pique causes her to answer in an equally indifferent tone,

"I am sorry—but yes, I think so."

"I am sorry, very sorry. I have made up my mind to marry, and you are my first choice. Since you are inexorable to my suit, however, I must look elsewhere. If Bertie had not already appropriated Miss Reynolds, she would be my second choice, but as I trust they may make up their quarrel I will not attempt to interfere with his claims. Can't you, for old friendship's sake, give me a suggestion for my next choice?"

She glances quickly at him to see if he is jesting, but meets only the expression with which one waits for a reply to an ordinary question. Then she laughs.

"How flattered I feel, major, to have been your first choice?" she says. "I must certainly, in gratitude for that distinction, think of some one who, failing myself and Annette, may do for the position. Let me see! How would Julia Bretton suit?"

CHAPTER IV.

THEY are at Mrs. Dunning's gate as she speaks, and meet that lady, who is issuing forth. She stops a moment to shake hands with Major Falconer, and to inquire what success Adelaide has had with Miss Reynolds, and looks extremely disappointed on hearing her daughter's report. Bertie, poor boy, has just come back from his office, she says, in very depressed spirits. They will find him in the house.

They do find him, and, to his surprise, his guardian comes up to him, lays a hand on his shoulder, and says:

"We must try to console each other, Bertie. Like yourself, I am a rejected man."

Bertie turns, with a slightly haughty movement, and looks at the other suspiciously.

"I am not jesting," says Major Falconer. "Your cousin has just, for the second time, refused to marry me. You don't believe me? Ask her if what I say is not true."

No need to ask the question. The blush which suffuses Adelaide's face answers more significantly than words; and at the stare of bewildered amazement with which the young fellow glances first at one, then at the other, both his companions laugh outright.

"You are not more surprised than I was when Major Falconer did me the honor to offer me the 'first refusal' of his hand," says Adelaide. "You must know," she continues, in a tone of fine irony, "that, having decided to marry, he looked about him to find a wife, and, as I happened to be conveniently approachable, he conferred upon me the distinction of standing as his first choice. Annette would have been the second, he says, if you had not forestalled him with her."

"As I am no longer in the way, he need not consider me an obstacle," says Bertie, stiffly. "I hope"—to his guardian, with affected carelessness—"that you will not think of holding back on my account, major. I have no doubt you could distance Dorsay as well as myself in Miss Reynolds's favor. You are much the richest man of the three."

"Bertie!" cries his cousin, indignantly, and meeting the grave, almost stern reproof in Major Falconer's eye, a quick flush shows that the young gentleman has the grace to feel ashamed of himself.

"I came home to get the book you asked me for when we met this morning, sir," he says. "I was reading it last night after I went to bed, and left it in my room."

Up-stairs he goes after the book, and as soon as he is out of hearing, Adelaide begs Major Falconer not to take him to task about what she had said during their walk. "He would be irritated at my having mentioned it," she continues. "I will try and persuade him to go himself to Annette. Perhaps if he does, she may forgive him."

"Of course, I must regard your wishes," answers the major; "but I confess I feel very much out of patience with him when I see how his conduct is worrying you."

"He can't help it!"

She speaks quickly—for her cousin's step is heard descending the stairs at a rush. He brings the book he went to seek, and Major Falconer takes it and says good-morning.

As he leaves the house, Adelaide's eyes follow his soldierly-looking figure with a vague sense of loss—and this almost intangible feeling is put into words for her the next moment by Bertie.

"Is it really true, Della," he says, "that Major Falconer asked you to marry him?"

"Yes."

"And you refused?"

"Certainly."

The young man says nothing for an instant, but his countenance is so expressive of what he thinks, that Adelaide is amused.

"I am wondering what sort of a man you expect to marry—if you intend to marry at all. You will never find his equal. I can tell you."

"Not if I looked at him with your eyes."

"Not if you looked at him without prejudice. But that foolish fancy of yours that he wanted to marry aunt, always made you unjust to him in every way. You know I always told you that the idea was absurd. Depend upon it, you have made a great mistake in not accepting him."

With this uncompromising assurance, Mr. Bruce takes his departure, leaving her to consider at her leisure whether what he says is not true. She is inclined to think it is; but if so, her error is irremediable. Major Falconer has evidently taken her refusal as final.

If she entertains any lingering doubt on this point, it is set at rest by his conduct during the next few days. In virtue of having been her father's friend, and her cousin's guardian, he has always, within her recollection, occupied a privileged position of familiarity in the family circle and the family counsels, coming and going without apology or ceremony, often several times a day. His visits are not less frequent than usual now, but his manner to herself is changed. There is no sign of resentment, coldness, or even consciousness; he seems to have lost interest in her—that is all—the special interest which, she becomes suddenly aware, he has been manifesting for some time past. His face does not brighten at sight of her, as she now remembers it did before this unlucky explanation; his voice no longer takes a softer tone in calling her name. He speaks to her and looks at her precisely as he speaks to and looks at her mother—kindly, cordially, without the slightest embarrassment, with only friendly regard.

It is with a growing emotion of pain that she notices and realizes all this as time passes—wondering how she could have been so long blind to his sentiments. "If I had known that he loved me," she says, to herself, more than once, "if I had taken time to think, I might have answered him differently, perhaps."

She is sitting late one afternoon rather heavy in spirits, if not in heart, with the weight of Bertie's yet unreconciled quarrel on her mind, as well the secret regret that haunts her more than she is willing to admit even to her own heart, when Major Falconer walks in unannounced, as is his custom.

It requires an effort on her part to maintain an unembarrassed manner, as he sits down near her, and looks silently into the fire for a minute or two. There is a little flutter at her heart—she finds it necessary to fix her attention very closely on the piece of fancy-work in her hand, and counts the stitches twice over to insure accuracy. Can he mean to ask her again to reconsider her refusal?

His first remark does not indicate that this is his intention.

"I saw Herbert at a distance a while ago riding with a lady," he says. "Was it Miss Reynolds?"

"No, indeed," answers Adelaide, with mingled vexation and regret. "It was Margaret Ashford."

"What, again! He rode with her yesterday; did you know that?"

"Yes" (reluctantly).

"I wonder," says Major Falconer, with slightly contracted brow, "if he really has given up all thought of marrying Miss Reynolds? This looks like it."

"He cares just as much for her as he ever did, and is as anxious to marry her," Adelaide replies. "But he is angry and jealous, and will not acknowledge himself to have been in the wrong."

PICTORIAL SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN ILLUSTRATED PRESS.

Mr. Gladstone in Midlothian.

The magnificent outburst of political oratory which the greatest of Liberal statesmen and speakers has been pouring forth in the metropolitan county of Scotland, while soliciting the electoral suffrages of the Midlothian constituency in opposition to the Earl of Dalkeith, was the occasion of many extraordinary scenes and grand exhibitions of popular enthusiasm. At the Music Hall, at the Corn Exchange, and in the Waverley Market of Edinburgh, at the neighboring towns of Dalkeith and West Calder, and in other places of the district, Mr. Gladstone met with such a welcome as no part of Great Britain has ever exceeded in doing honor to an influential Parliamentary leader.

The Sydney Exhibition.

Having given an exterior view of the buildings of the International Exhibition now being held at Sydney, New South Wales, we present a view this week of the interior display. Thus far the exhibition has been successful beyond anticipation, and promises to yield valuable results for the future commercial and industrial advancement of the colony.

The Agitation in Ireland.

While the magistrates were examining the evidence against Messrs. Daly, Killen and Davitt, charged with using language in speeches at a tenant-right meeting which would provoke a rebellion and breach of the peace, the court-house and police-barracks in the county town of Sligo, as well as the entire neighborhood, were crowded with excited people, among whom were many women. Bail was taken for the future appearance of Davitt and Daly, and Killen was locked up because of the action of himself and his counsel in trying the patience of the magistrates and refusing to give bail.

New Dry Docks at Bordeaux.

The new dry docks at Bordeaux were opened on October 18th last. The works comprise an immense floating basin and careening dock, hydraulic force being used to operate both. A single man, by the movement of a single lever, can control the entire machinery of this vast enterprise. The cost was 15,000,000 francs, which sum the Chamber of Commerce of Bordeaux advanced to the Government.

The Occupation of Cabul.

Pursuant to his proclamation, issued early in October, General Roberts entered Cabul on the 8th, after considerable resistance, and, shortly after reaching the palace, appeared at a window and addressed the multitude in the gardens. He announced the reason of the occupation, imposed new conditions, and said that the buildings of the Bala-Hissar, which interfered with military operations, would be destroyed. Much to the surprise of every one, at midday, eight days later, in the doomed quarter, a vast quantity of powder was ignited, and the magazine blew up with a tremendous noise, setting fire to all around, falling stones and timber making the ground for hundreds of yards around unsafe.

—HARTFORD'S new reservoir covers 183 acres in the town of Farmington, and will hold 700,000,000 gallons. The land was condemned at from $20 to $60 per acre, and at present 103 acres are flooded one foot deep.

—THE United States Fish Commission has received from the Gloucester (Mass.) fishermen two specimens of fish of the genus trachurus, heretofore not recorded upon the American coast, and caught near Mt. Desert, Me.

—THE Belgian Government grants annually to the Roman Catholics, who comprise ninety-nine per cent. of the population, about $800,000; to the Protestants, $33,573; to the Jews, $2,244. The Jews number about 1,500.

—KOSSUTH has issued an appeal for subscriptions to his promised memoirs. The veteran orator, now in his seventy-eighth year, has been forced to undertake this task in order to earn money, since he lives entirely by the produce of his pen.

—THE overflowing of the rivers Koros and Maros, in Hungary, has caused fearful destruction. The city of Arad, on the Maros, and several other towns, have been ruined and their inhabitants driven away. Fully 10,000 persons have been rendered homeless.

—IN Rome efforts are being made to form a club for woman's advancement. The American residents are active, and the present Queen of Italy has long been interested in educational matters, and her attendance at the lectures makes them fashionable.

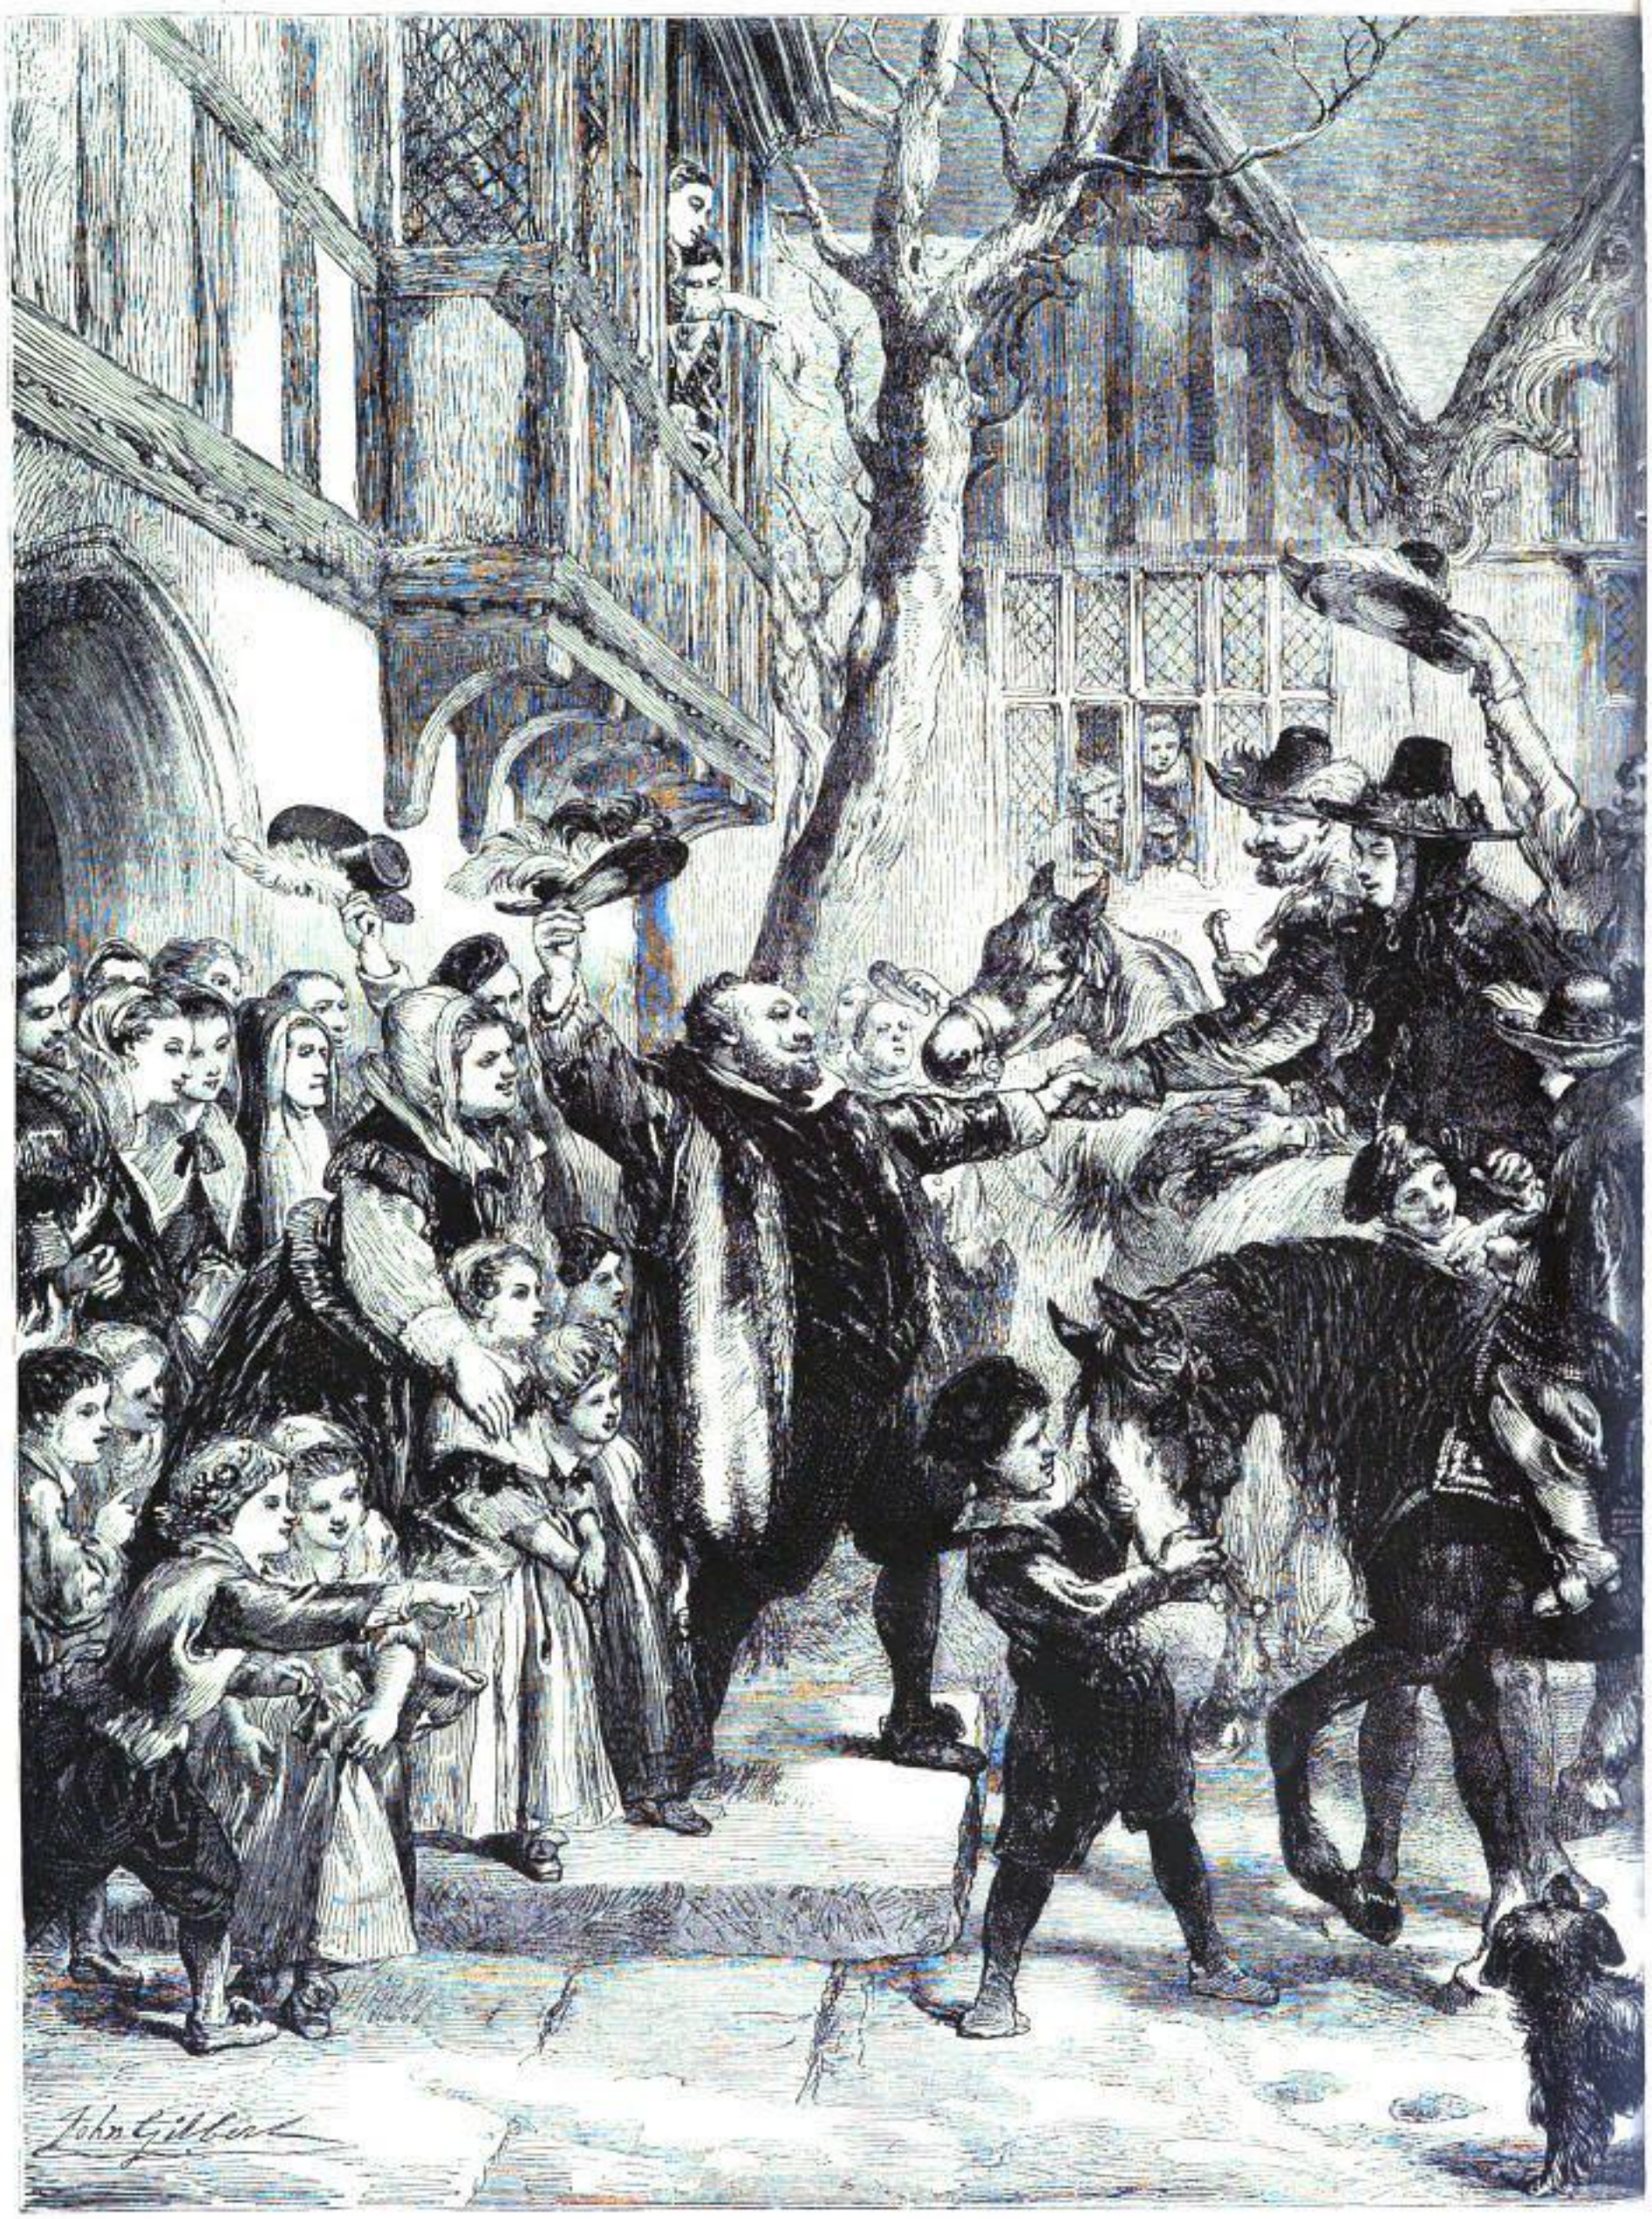
—THE Porte has issued a proclamation to the Albanians, reminding them that the cession of Gusinje and Plava to Montenegro was stipulated by the Treaty of Berlin, and that the resistance contemplated by a part of the inhabitants of those places would result in useless bloodshed.

—THE Dutch minister of the colonies has received from the commander-in-chief at Atchin, in Northern Sumatra, a report stating that the power of resistance of the natives may be considered at an end, and that the authority of the Dutch is re-established in the country, though the war is not completely terminated.

—THERE are thirty-seven women in attendance at the London School of Medicine for Women. Of the seventy students who have entered the school since its foundation, some are in practice and others are preparing for the examination of the University of London, or of the King's and Queen's College of Physicians, Ireland.

—THE suits begun by the Attorney-General of New York, in the Supreme Court in Kings County, against the Brooklyn Elevated Railway Company, at the request of property-owners along the route, have been discontinued by order of Justice Pratt, on motion of the Attorney-General, and no serious litigation now obstructs the completion of the road.



—ON February 19th, the anniversary of the abolition of serfdom in Russia, the City of St. Petersburg is to present to the Czar a silver casket containing twenty-five water color drawings, representing the great public buildings and monuments erected in the capital during the twenty-five years of his reign. This gift is to cost over eight thousand roubles.

—FRANCE has agricultural schools for girls. One of the chief is near Rouen, which is said to have been begun with a capital of one franc by a Sister of Charity and two little discharged prisoner girls, and to be now worth $100,000. This establishment has 300 girls from 6 to 18. The farm, entirely cultivated by them, is over 400 acres in extent. Twenty-five Sisters form the staff of teachers.

—THE Riverside Park, New York City, is now so near completion that there is every probability of its being open in a few weeks. Very few of us, comparatively, are aware what a noble, new recreation-ground has been provided for three miles along the Hudson from Seventy-second Street. No other city in the world has so magnificent a river promenade. A special road for saddle-horses is provided for about a mile, and there seems no good reason—for the width is ample—why it should not extend the whole way.

—THE construction of the new steamers Arizona of the Guion Line and the Sahara of the Cunard Line seems to have stimulated the Inman managers to fresh exertions. The Inman company has just contracted for a new steamer which is to be longer, wider and of greater tonnage than any of her rivals, and it is expected that she will make the transatlantic passage, either way, in six of seven days. She is to be to it wholly of iron, and when completed will be the largest ship afloat with the exception of the Great Eastern. She is to have four masts—the first three to be square-rigged—and two funnels. Her stern will be an overhanging one, of the clipper pattern. The smoking room will be amidships and forty feet long, while her deck is to have a ladies' room above the saloon, seventy feet in length. The saloon will seat 300 people, and her cabins accommodate 250 first-class passengers. She can easily carry 1,500 steerage passengers, and altogether she is expected to be the stateliest steamer on the ocean. Her name has not yet been chosen, but rumor assigns either that of the City of Rome or the City of Chicago.

HIS CHRISTMAS GIFT.

HE was sitting alone this Christmas Eve,
By the glowing fire in the lowered light,
And his restless spirit sought reprieve
In that strange, half-conscious, drowsy mood,
That knows not the value of time or place,
But follows a course no mind can trace.

He had schooled his heart, as he fondly thought,
To live without hope, regret, or fear,
Yet somehow he had not wholly caught
The tone of the cynic's bitter sneer;
And he felt himself even yet possessed
By that weird chameleon elf, Unrest.

For, in ringing, the bells that pealed to-night,
To herald the glad "good-will to men,"
Just hinted at days of childhood bright,
Of old songs echoing back again:
But all faces and lights and sounds were blent
Together in some vague minglement.

There was something familiar, something strange;
A lack in the very ambient air;
The music had lost its full, glad range,
The lights were duller, the scenes less fair;
And then, of a sudden, all died in gloom,
And left but the presence of—what perfume?

Of her hands, her hair, her breath, her dress!
He waked with a cry, "Ah, God!" but she Stood there in her regal loveliness,
To his heart come back at last, and he,
Amid kisses of lips that could not tire,
Had the Christmas gift of his heart's desire!

JOHN MORAN.

THE HIDDEN WITNESS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THAT HUSBAND OF HERS."

CHAPTER XVII.—SYLVE SEARCHES FOR DOCUMENTS.

I HAVE spoken before of the library in the Forester household. It was a handsome room, deeply wainscoted, and filled on two sides with books. The old judge in his lifetime was very fond and proud of his law-books, and spent time and money upon them without stint. On the other side the shelves were filled with miscellaneous volumes, novels, histories, poets, biographies, and on the south, fronting the street, there was no room for books, the space being taken up by two large bay windows, between which stood the business desk covered with crimson velvet, at which Flix Forester generally wrote. On the inside of the windows heavy crimson curtains hung suspended from brass rods. Under these, dainty hangings of white lace frosted the window-pane with snowy outlines of leaves and flowers, and delicate devices in vines and network.

The time was evening. The old clock in the hall, that had been ticking on for nearly two centuries, struck the hour of nine. The room was in perfect order. One gas jet between the windows burned low, but its faint flame outlined the willowy figure of a young girl, who in graceful but despairing abandon sat before the table, her hands clasped and her head bowed upon them. Strange shadows flickered upon the bookshelves and the wall. The docketed papers on each side the window seemed vying with each other as to which could reflect the most grotesque picture. One tortured or doubled itself so that it made an idiot's face staring dully forward. The other, being composed of small papers held by a hand-brace, limned the perfect figure of a little stout man in a little long surtout coat, while the paper-holder sent its caricature over to the opposite wall in the shape of a crocodile's open jaws. There was something depressing in the whole personnel of the room, in the very atmosphere, at the close of a dreary November day; for, though carriages are whirling through the streets, filled with fair and splendidly-dressed society women, bound for ball or opera, the wind blows fiercely, and the storm beats with heavy fingers whatever palpable thing it can reach.

Mrs. Forester had gone to a party, from which Sylve had excused herself, pleading a headache. When Mrs. Forester offered to remain at home, she would not hear of it—so, very reluctantly, the lady left her charge lying on the bed, her face buried in the pillow.

"Everybody will inquire for you," she said, as she turned away in no very good spirits, for she had become accustomed to this bright, beautiful face, and liked to see it admired and sought after. She had not been in society so long that she felt quite lost when she went alone, and she almost dreaded the evening, and made up her mind to return early. No sooner was the door shut than the lovely, listless face came at once out of its obscurity, and Sylve listened eagerly as the retreating footsteps grew fainter and fainter. Then the muffled sound of the front door shutting reached her ear—then the grating of carriage-wheels mingled with the gusty growling of the wind, and Sylve sat up in bed. She threw her unbound hair back from her forehead and uttered a sigh of relief.

"There, she is gone, and I know she'll be miserable without me. I don't care. I shall have this whole evening to myself—at least enough of it"—she consulted the pretty watch at her belt; "but she may, and probably will, return before eleven. I must make the most of my time."

She arose, bathed her eyes and forehead, for she really had suffered from overtaxed nerves, and carelessly put her abundant hair back with a few pins. She had been with Mrs. Forester now nearly twelve months, and was more than delighted with her reception by all the friends of Mrs. Forester. Adulation suited her; admiration she exacted in a way known to romantic modern young-ladydom. Her toilets were perfection, and she had already begun to queen it royally over the hearts of the young men who worship at every new shrine.

Sylve was of the world worldly, and it was strange that this night of all nights she should have allowed a temporary malady to keep her at home. She had often gone before in worse pain, for she was subject to headache, and the effort had invariably driven off the malady. Sylve had an object in view. Her imagination had not been idle concerning herself and her prospects since she had been an inmate of Forester House. That Flix was at work for her she knew; but why should he remain away so persistently? Girl-like, she had begun to weave a romance for herself. She had always loved him when a child, and now the mention of his name set her pulses leaping. Sometimes she would go by herself into the room where his portrait hung and sit before it an hour at a time. It was painted in oils, and made, apart from its likeness, an exquisite picture. Flix had surprised and delighted his mother with this masterpiece on her return from Europe. None of the gayest and brightest and handsomest of Sylve's recent adorers thrilled her with spoken praise or admiring glances as did the large soft eyes of this painted picture. She fancied they followed her every motion and smiled down upon her, and the consequence was the child—she was yet scarcely more than that—was deeply in love with her guardian before she knew it—yet not so much with him as with this rare and speaking semblance. It was something delightful to her to nurse these feelings in secret. She would most artfully lead Mrs. Forester always in the vein to talk of Flix, while she listened with a beating heart to his praises. Dexterously enough she learned that Flix had never yet seemed to fancy any lady of their set.

"What he may do where he is, I don't know," said Mrs. Forester, "but I don't think he will fancy those Southern beauties; and if he did, he would be sure to take me into his confidence."

"How do you know he is heart-whole? He may love somebody, or, at least, have loved somebody, and kept it a secret from you," said Sylve, with affected carelessness.

Mrs. Forester shook her head.

"Oh, I am very sure," she said. "He was a very boy, though of age, till within two or three years, and he keeps what he calls a day-book, in which he notes down important matters, chance thoughts, little poems—for he has the gifts of an improvisatore—and favorite quotations from the authors he likes. Some time ago I was anxious to find something regarding a book I had not seen for years, and just as he was going away for the last time he handed me his day book—three volumes for the three years. 'I'm sure you'll find what you want, or something akin to it, in one of these,' he said, 'for I copied many good things from that book,' and so he left them, merely telling me to replace them in his desk. What a methodical fellow he is! Why, my dear, there's a row of them. I think he must have begun to keep them ten years ago."

"And did you read all of them?" queried Sylve, looking up from her sewing with a flushed face.

"Certainly not, my dear; nor did I read these—I merely glanced them through. Here and there I read the impression that certain young ladies had produced upon him, and I can assure you, Sylve, there was no love in a line he said. Sometimes I am very much afraid that he will give all his heart to his business, and never marry at all."

"But I should have been tempted to read the rest," said Sylve, whose eyes were shining under ther lowered lashes, and whose heart beat fast as she thought to herself, "He shall love me; I will make him;" and at that moment she felt as if all power were hers.

"I trust not," said Mrs. Forester, gravely; "my son's private letters and papers, though the keys of his desk and of his business-boxes are in my possession, are as sacred to me as if they were locked away in some bank or safe. That is a point of honor with me, and should be with every lady."

"Yes, but with his mother—I thought——" Sylve stammered, whose notions of right and wrong were more or less clouded.

"He is a man now, you know, and not under my guardianship. I have really no more right to his confidence than if I was a perfect stranger. If he chooses to give it to me, well and good."

The conversation led to other matters. Sylve was very curious to know more of her own history. She vaguely remembered her father—she held her mother's memory in a true and tender sort of love that more resembled worship. Mrs. Forester was always reticent on this subject. Sometimes she would laughingly refer to Sylve's early history, and repeat the pranks that used to set the small household in commotion.

"I wonder Mr. Forester did not hate me," said Sylve, once, after the narration of some of her exploits.

Mrs. Forester shut her lips, but the flicker of a smile passed over them as she cast a half-doubting, half-mirthful look aside at Sylve.

"If I could only get at those day-books," thought the girl, day after day, "I should know what he then thought of me."

From dwelling on this matter it became a passion. She was perfectly certain that in those day-books much must be put on record concerning her. It was her first desire in the morning, her last at night. If she could but get the keys. It might be unjust—it might be even indelicate, but she did not stop to consider either of these phases. She had not been carefully trained. Motherless and fatherless at an early age, the pliant mind had been open to any and every defacing finger. She had from the first learned to screen herself from consequences by any means, honest or dishonest. Not that she was, or deliberately tried to be, bad in any respect—she inclined too much to be well thought of, and valued the good opinions of others more than they were often worth. It did not look to her a sin to gain possession of the desk-key, and find out about herself, and particularly what sort of an impression he had of her. He had never been to see her at the school. She had often pondered upon that. Why should she care? Why should she have such a hungry longing to conquer him, when she might have hosts of younger admirers at her feet? She could scarcely have told why, except that she remembered that on several occasions in her girlhood she had conquered him.

Her thought and longing always reverted to the key. She found it one day detached from the chain on which it usually hung, and did not go so far as to take it and secrete it upon her person. She merely slipped it into a drawer and shut it up.

"If she misses it," she said, to herself, "she will look for it and find it. If she goes down to dinner without it, she will have forgotten. Then, if the key still is in the drawer, I will prevail upon her to go to the party to-night alone. After that the whole house is mine."

That day a letter came from one of her school-friends—a clever, fussy girl—who had always felt a great affection for Sylve and shielded her from severe punishment more than once. This girl had never ceased to implore Sylve to come and pay her a visit. It was now nearly two years after the war and Sylve had been the confidant of Salome Braddock through all that terrible period, for the latter had left school over a year ago.

"I think that now we have seen the worst," wrote this Southern girl, "and we are getting our homestead in order. Fortunately we have not suffered as our neighbors have. You remember I often spoke to you about my neighbors Eva Lewin and Raphael Wilde. Both Colonel Lewin and Colonel Wilde were killed in battle. The house of the former was destroyed by fire, but Raphael Wilde is well-provided for, and he is at college in the North. But for poor Eva Lewin the situation is terrible. Their house, standing on the road as it did, was almost completely destroyed, and I really don't know what the poor little thing is going to do. But what I write you for now is to come and see me before your Winter closes, if it is possible. And if we could only get one of your smart Yankee school-marms to come here. There is work enough for her, and several of the planters here are able and willing to pay. She should stay with me—for I am head of the house since my mamma died, and we would all try to forget that she came from the North. Pray, don't tell her that; though, if there is anybody you know of, you might as well caution her to let bygones be bygones." And so the letter ran on—and at its close Sylve sat in a brown study, wondering if it was possible for her to accomplish the journey, and because she thought it might be forbidden, longing all the more to go. Salome Braddock had been her favorite companion at school—a dashing, handsome brunette, full of mischief, and always willing to do the most daring things, provided she could extract fun from it. She had captivated her imagination by her description of the fair Southern country—its hospitable and generous people, its curious customs. At her friend's there were horses in the stable on which one might ride without saddle or bridle. There were streams for fishing and woods for picnics, there were hunting parties and a wild, free life out of doors, whenever one desired it.

Sylve put her letter aside with a sigh. She knew that Mrs. Forester would never consent to her going alone, and it was out of the question that she should go with her. And to leave now, when Flix might come home at any time, and so miss the opportunity of meeting and conquering him—that would not do. She arrayed herself carefully for dinner—she always did, in anticipation of that meeting—and went down stairs. Passing Mrs. Forester's room, she saw that it was empty. She knew that lady had dressed, and ventured in. A fire flickered on the hearth, for, though the house was heated by steam, Mrs. Forester always had a wood fire in the room. A crimson glow pervaded the atmosphere. Sylve stepped within half guiltily, and, under pretext of looking in the mirror, opened that particular drawer. The key was there, in all probability forgotten. Sylve suddenly decided to lose her appetite—to complain of languor, and so if possible get excused from the party that night. She did so. Mrs. Forester, as we have seen, left reluctantly, little thinking what sort of a drama would be played during her absence. At last the library door was locked on the inside, the one burner over the desk lighted and the key was in the desk, the lid thrown back, and there, all in a row, with the name stamped in gilded letters on the back, were the day-books that Flix had used for ten years.

Sylve looked at them in a nervous, almost frightened manner, and for some moments stood perfectly still. It almost seemed as if her guardian were there in spirit, if not bodily presence, looking over her shoulder.

"But then, of course, he can't see—he never will know," she said, casting two or three timid glances into the corners of the room. Then she sought for the date of her arrival at Forester House—found the books or two years, and sat down with them in her hand.

What she read there changed her cheeks to the hue of ashes. Think of the effect of such a sentence as this upon an undisciplined nature:

"I am getting to hate the very sight of this child, with her great haunting eyes. Surely if ever any human creature was possessed of the devil, she is. And yet I pity her, for her antecedents have been so terrible that I scarcely wonder that she is just what she is."

"The responsibility is too much for me. Sometimes I think she will do what her mother did, and ruin some poor soul."

"My mother!" gasped Sylve. "Do what my mother did! Oh, what can he mean? If he were here, if he were only here, I would surely ask him!" She referred again to the book, turning the pages over wildly. It had an awful fascination for her. And she would light upon such passages as this:

"My sweet ward has done an irreparable mischief to-day. I am becoming absolutely afraid of the sight of her, child though she is. I am sorry I ever tried the experiment of taking her under my roof. She has worn my mother's patience completely threadbare; the very servants hate her. I wonder if the spirit of murder descends from parent to child? And still I pity the poor, stubborn little wretch, though I can find no words to tell how thoroughly I dislike her. I pity her; she has an unfortunate heritage. Oh, woman! woman! did you know to what terrible influences you subject your children you would never go astray——" Here the book fell from Sylve's palsied hand. She had in that moment passed judgment on her mother, in ignorance, but none the less with an agonized conviction of its truth.

"I see it all now!" she cried, springing to her feet, her face, pale as death, before, now suffused with blushes. "Oh, my God, how can I live! And he knows it, and Mrs. Forester knows it—and that is the secret she has hinted at, and that is what those terrible words mean. I will not live here under such disgrace. They may get the money and give it to some one else. What do I care for money when he knows that shameful thing about me? Oh, mother! mother! Come from the grave and tell me it is not true!"

For a few moments she walked to and fro in a very storm of passion, wringing her hands and moaning, but shedding not a tear. Her eyes were dry and hard; her features rigid. It was long before she stopped before that fatal desk again. When she did she took up the volume for the next year. It contained accounts of expenses, comments on letters that had been sent, regarding her, from her teachers, and which always ended by statements of his own personal aversion. These things were like dagger-points to the sensitive heart of Sylve. Had she been the wickedest creature alive, he could not have expressed a more thorough dislike.

"And all these years he has been hating me—hating!—while I——" she covered her face all over with her hands, and trembled from head to foot. She had keen sensibilities, more's the pity, and it was hard that her first trial of life's responsibilities should be so very cruel. She had begun to think and feel like a woman, and had really and honestly tried to improve herself during the last three or four years; but now she felt—what was the use? Flix Forester hated her, and though she tried to hate him, she could not. The very savagery and lawlessness of her real nature, that she had so fought against, forbade it. No one can tell what bitter years of agony seemed to have been compressed in those few moments into that young, hitherto hopeful, heart. She threw herself down, her face on her hands, but as yet she could not shed a tear. Her nature was elastic, and might bear up even under such a blow as this, but at present all sorts of mad thoughts ran through her brain. Death was all she longed for; if she could only die! Why not? There were plenty of means, and, after all, death was the only cure for such a disgrace.

She started up from her seat, pressed the hair back from her temples, grew suddenly, strangely calm, locked the desk, carried the key to Mrs. Forester's room, then stood irresolute in the hall.

"Which way would be the best, I wonder, and the quickest?" she half-sobbed. "Let me think—let me think."

So she went slowly down the stairs, the train of her crimson silk gleaming under the full glow of the gas as it fluttered from stair to stair, and the rich brown hair showing tints of gold as it fell, for she had loosened it again over her shoulders. Never had she looked so beautiful; never had men seen the fire in her eyes that made them so startlingly brilliant. On she went, scarcely heeding where. The door of the saloon-parlor stood open; she entered listlessly, walked twice to the shadowed end, for it was only lighted by the hall chandelier that, as she passed the doorway, made her look like a beautiful spirit shining out of the darkness for a moment only to enter it again. Suddenly she locked her hands tightly together. She had become aware that she was not alone. As she stood straining her eyes, a figure did come out from the recess by the window. It was that of a man, tall, handsome, bearded. He looked at her with astonishment, blended with admiration.

"Is this Miss Sylve?" he queried, in a voice low and full of music. "The servants told me you were gone out with my mother. I am Flix Forester."

Yes, Sylve knew it from the first, but she could not speak, only stood for a moment, her eyes fixed upon him, like one fascinated. Then with a strong shudder and a cry that was sharp with anguish, she lost all presence of mind, and turned and fled from the room.

"Just what I should have expected," he said, with a bitter smile.

ON CHRISTMAS DAY.

BY CHRISTIAN REID.

"No, I am not mistaken," she says, with unusual decision of manner. "And it is this which troubles me. I have tried in every way to make him listen to reason—and so has mamma—but in vain. Perhaps if you told him that he was acting very foolishly, he might believe you. He despises the counsel of women."

Major Falconer laughs. "That is the fault of his youth," he says. "I will speak to him, if you think it worth while, but I doubt if my influence is greater than yours."

An hour or two later, as they sit at tea, to which he invites himself to stay, he fulfills his promise.

"I was surprised"—surprised in the tone of not pleased—"to see you riding again this afternoon with Miss Ashford, Herbert," he says, gravely. "You are acting very unwisely in paying such marked attention to so notorious a flirt, unless you want to make your breach with Miss Reynolds final."

It is so rarely that his guardian makes an ill-natured remark, especially about a woman, that Mr. Bruce shrinks a little at this speech. Rallying, however, he answers, coolly:

"The breach is final, so my conduct does not concern Miss Reynolds."

Major Falconer looks at him keenly.

"Do you mean to say that you consider your engagement permanently broken off?" he asks.

"That is what I mean, sir," is the reply.

"My dear Bertie!" says his aunt, in a tone of protest, while Adelaide looks at him with silent reproach.

"You would not look upon a man who endeavored to win the regard of Miss Reynolds as trespassing on your rights, then?" says Major Falconer.

"Not at all, sir. It is a matter of indifference to me who wins her regard."

"After such an explicit assurance as that—to which I call upon your aunt and cousin to bear witness," says the major, "you must not reproach me if by chance—or management," he glances at Adelaide here, who returns his smile bravely—"I should be the man to secure it."

"I shall not reproach you, be assured, major."

"Very well. I take you at your word," rejoins that gentleman.

CHAPTER V.

IT is not easy to judge by any outward sign what Herbert Bruce feels when, in the course of the ensuing week, he sees his guardian take the place so lately occupied by himself, as a constant attendant upon Miss Reynolds—her accepted, or soon to be accepted, lover, if the gossips are to be believed. Even his aunt and cousin are at fault in deciding whether the philosophical composure with which he conducts himself, is the result of genuine indifference or Spartan fortitude. Mrs. Dunning inclines to think it the first. Adelaide fears that it may be the last. She is practicing a little of the same herself, and a fellow-feeling often makes us wondrous clear-sighted as well as kind. To say that she blames either Annette or Major Falconer would not be true, for her nature is a reasonable one, and she acknowledges, without hesitation, that both have acted with perfect fairness. But she feels a dull pain on her own account, and, to do her justice, a much sharper one on Bertie's. She is not positively in love with Major Falconer; she is only conscious of a tardily awakened admiration which might easily ripen to love; and for herself, therefore, it is only a regret for what might have been, which troubles her a little. But she knows that Bertie loves Annette with his whole heart, and she is apprehensive that his seeming calm may end as she has predicted more than once that the affair would.

Her prophetic instinct is soon justified. One morning her maid, on entering her room, finds a letter lying on the floor, which has plainly been pushed under the door, and half an hour afterwards Major Falconer is somewhat startled by a summons from Mrs. Dunning, who begs that he will come to her immediately.

"We are in great anxiety about Bertie," is the concluding sentence of her hasty note.

It is needless to say that very few minutes elapse after he has read this before Major Falconer presents himself in Mrs. Dunning's breakfast-room. He finds her sitting disconsolately beside the fire, her face very sad, her eyes showing traces of tears, which she is wiping away as he enters. In reply to his question of "What is the matter?" she informs him that "Bertie is gone—gone to Memphis!"

"All we know," she continues, as he stands in silent consternation at her side, his face actually turning a shade pale, "is that he took the midnight train, leaving a short letter to Adelaide."

Can he see the letter? the major asks, and he would like to see Adelaide herself.

A servant is sent with this message, and soon returns, bringing the letter; but Adelaide begs to be excused, she is not dressed yet. Major Falconer takes the inclosure from the envelope which has just been given him, and, after reading the half-dozen lines which it contains, says:

"I will follow him at once. Fortunately the day train is faster than the one he took. I shall be but a few hours behind him."

While Mrs. Dunning is asking him in a tone of faint protest—for she is evidently much comforted by his determination, and, besides, knows that protest is useless—whether he thinks it would be right to risk his own life because Bertie, against all advice and entreaty has run into this danger, he is writing a few words on a page of his note-book, which, tearing out, he gives to the servant, who is still waiting to carry to Miss Dunning. Only a few words, but they have a magical effect on that young lady. She starts up at once from the bed on which she was lying prone with her face buried in a pillow, bathes her tear-stained face, dresses hastily, and hurries down-stairs.

Her mother and Major Falconer are at breakfast, the latter talking cheerfully. But as he looks up and sees her, his face takes the expression which a man's face always assumes at sight of a woman's tears.

"Are you really going after Bertie? and do you think you can persuade him to come back?" she says, eagerly, as she sits down to table.

"I am going, and I hope to persuade him to come back. If I don't, it will not be for want of trying," he replies.

"But how will you find him?"

"By inquiry at the headquarters of the Howards. He will go there immediately on his arrival to offer his services."

The girl sighs convulsively, but does not say anything more, and as her gaze is bent on the cup of coffee which has been placed beside her plate, and which she is mechanically trying to sip, Major Falconer has full opportunity to watch her face unobserved for several minutes. Mrs. Dunning, who, like most elderly ladies, has certain favorite medicines which she regards as specifics in the treatment of certain maladies, is impressing on him the necessity of using these remedies, and of following the directions she is giving him, in case that Bertie or himself take the fever before he can get the headstrong boy away from the danger.

"I will remember what you say," answers the major, "and if you will put up a small package of medicine for me——"

"That is what I meant to do," says the lady, delighted to find so docile a disciple. "I will see to it at once."

"If you please"—as she rises to leave the room—"for"—glancing at the clock on the mantelpiece—"it is almost time."

As she sweeps out of the room, on her philanthropic object intent, the major, without even a smile at the success of his small stratagem, says at once to the daughter.

"I am afraid you blame me, Adelaide, as I blame myself, for this folly of Her——"

"Don't say anything harsh of him!" she interrupts, quickly, looking up with something like a flash in her eye. "I will not bear that!"

"I was not going to say anything harsh. But you do blame me, then?"

"No. I always try to be reasonable. Bertie told you that his engagement was broken, and, of course, you had a right to marry Annette if you and she liked."

"If you acquit me of fault, why do you speak so coldly, and turn from me as if you could not endure to let your eyes rest on my face? You are thinking hard things of me, I am sure!"

She hesitates an instant, but then says, lelly, "I do think that when there are so many women in the world, you might have left to poor Bertie?"—her voice chokes—"the only woman he ever cared for."

"And do you think I wanted to take her from him?" Major Falconer asks, a little indignantly. "I had no more thought of marrying Miss Reynolds than you have of marrying your cousin himself."

"Then why did you make him think you had?" she demands, passionately. "Why did you make him desperate, and send him off to——"

She bursts into tears, but pressing her handkerchief impatiently to her eyes, forces herself to swallow her sobs, and adds, in a cold tone, "Excuse me! I did not mean to reproach you. I ought not to have come down-stairs. I am not fit to see any one."

She rises from table, and is about to leave the room, when Major Falconer arrests her progress by placing himself between her and the door.

"Adelaide," he says, and, half-wild as she is with terror about Bertie, she starts at the tone of pain in his voice, "are you going to leave me without saying good-by?—without one thought whether I shall live or die?"

Mrs. Dunning returns at this instant, and the clock begins to strike as she crosses the threshold, reminding Major Falconer that he must go. There are hasty farewells; tearful on Mrs. Dunning's part—silent on Adelaide's. At Major Falconer's last words, there comes a revulsion of feeling to her—a recollection that he, too, and for Bertie's sake, is going into the danger she so fears for Bertie. She would like to say something to him—to ask his forgiveness; but she is literally incapable of articulation. She even forgets to offer him her hand when he turns from her mother to herself to bid her good-by; but he takes it, presses it closely, and, addressing Mrs. Dunning as well as herself:

"I hope to bring Bertie back safe to you. I will telegraph as soon as I find him, and will write, of course," he says, cheerfully, and is gone.

Weary, lingering days of wretched anxiety follow. On the first evening, as Adelaide sits on the piazza-steps, with faint white streaks of moonlight all about her, though she is herself in shadow, she is startled to see two figures pause at the gate, which is some little distance from the house. Her heart gives a bound, but sinks again at once, as she sees that it is not Bertie and his guardian. Only one person enters, while the other passes on, and as this one approaches, she sees the pale face of Annette Reynolds.

"Adelaide, have you heard from him yet?" the girl says, in a sobbing voice.

"No," answers the other, coldly. "There has not been time to hear."

"When do you think you will hear?"

"It is impossible to say."

The tone of the speaker is so hard and curt that Annette, sitting down beside her, bursts into tears.

"Why do you speak to me so?" she says, passionately. "You know it is not my fault—you know it is not!"

"I told you he would go, and that you would wish then you had prevented it," says Adelaide.

"How could I have prevented it?" cries Annette. "Oh, you are very unjust! He never came to me; could I go to him? What could I have done?"

"You need not have flirted with Major Falconer, and encouraged his attentions until everybody said you meant to marry him," says Adelaide, bitterly.

"I never thought of flirting with him, and never for a moment imagined that any one would say such an absurd thing!" cries Annette. "And I could not have believed, Adelaide, that you would reproach me so unjustly!"

"I don't mean to be unjust," says her friend, "but I am so miserable."

Silence for a minute, while the two girls try to check their tears, and then ignoring the mutual reproaches just passed, they begin to discuss their hopes and fears about Bertie—of which, alas, the latter predominate.

Major Falconer does not telegraph as soon as they expect, and when at last Mrs. Dunning receives a telegram and letter almost at the same time, neither are at all encouraging. The letter, written immediately on reaching Memphis, informs her that Bertie did not go to that place. "The Howards have neither seen nor heard anything of him," the writer says, "which is conclusive evidence to me that he is not here. In fact, I was satisfied he was not, before I applied to them. The arrivals are now, comparatively speaking, so few, that the railroad officials and the habitual loungers about the stations could not have failed to notice him and recognize him from description. Nobody has seen him. I am very glad of this, for the pestilence does not rage anywhere else so fiercely as it does here. The newspaper reports which we thought so fearful, do not convey the faintest idea of the horrors of it, nor will I attempt to describe what would make you sick to the soul to hear. I shall go first to Vicksburg in search of Bertie, and if he is not there, shall look along the line which the fever has taken inland, and, lastly, if he is nowhere near this place, will go down to New Orleans. Rest assured I will look till I find him, or the fever finds me. I may not write again soon, but will telegraph regularly."

He telegraphs from Vicksburg, "Have not found him yet," and for weeks the changes are rung on these words, as, misled by apparently reliable information, he returns to Memphis, and goes from there to Holly Springs and several other places, before finally getting to New Orleans. Then comes a dispatch which Adelaide reads aloud with white lips—"I have found him here, ill with the fever." And then, for another week, come daily bulletins:

"Desperately ill."—"No better."—"To-night the crisis—no hope, I fear."—"He is still alive—that is all."—"No worse."—"A little better."—"Continues better." And at last, "Out of danger."

Does the joy, the intense, inexpressible relief which those words bring, repay the three anxious hearts which have suffered so much for the agonies endured during that week of terrible suspense? They think so; but still the suspense is not over. They fear a relapse for Bertie, and dread that Major Falconer may take the fever.

"Why does he never say anything about himself," Adelaide thinks, as letters come now in place of telegrams.

He has taken Bertie into the country, and as soon as it is safe for him to travel, they will return home; for the young gentleman yields to the wishes of his guardian in this, though he would much prefer to remain.

So Major Falconer and Bertie both write, and very unexpectedly one evening, just as Annette (who appears almost as regularly as the darkness, to hear news of her errant lover) is rising to say good-night, they walk in. And the first glance and hand-clasp which the young man exchanges with her assures him that he is forgiven.

* * * * * *

It is Christmas Day, and Adelaide Dunning sits alone by the drawing-room fire. She is not of the stuff of which love-lorn maidens are fashioned, and yet she is feeling somewhat love-lorn. It must be confessed she expected, she had even hoped, that Major Falconer would give her the opportunity to reconsider his proposal; it must be confessed she had admitted to herself that if he did give her the opportunity, she would accept it.

He has not given it. Since his return from the West he has been carelessly cordial in manner; he seems to have forgotten that he ever aspired to the character of a lover.

"I deserve it, I suppose, and I shall not break my heart over his inconstancy; but—I am afraid he is not likely to find a rival in my heart, or my fancy—which is it?" she is thinking, when the door opens, and the subject of her meditation appears.

"Tell me," he says, as he advances with grave face, but smiling eyes, "is it defeat or victory for me? Shall I raise the siege of your heart, or do you acknowledge yourself vanquished by 'management'? It is Christmas Day, and I have come to hear my fate."

Under treatment by electricity at Heidelberg she grew much better and felt encouraged about her health until the receipt of the anonymous letter threatening to kill her son, the Crown Prince, unless a certain sum of money were paid to the writer. This letter so frightened the Queen that she has been obliged again to take to her bed, and her disease has been much aggravated.

TO CHRONICLE death is ever a mournful task; to chronicle untimely death adds the leaven of bitterness to sorrow, and when a strong man, not yet even in his prime, goes down beneath the scythe of the ruthless mower, it behooves us to say, "Thy will be done." James Armstrong Murray, who has died at Kilfontein, South Africa, at the early age of thirty-eight years, was "the gentleman and scholar." Born in Africa of blue-blooded English parents, at the early age of fifteen he proceeded to England for the purpose of entering the University of Oxford, where he soon distinguished himself by both his mental and physical endowments, and his name at this moment is as fresh at Alma Mater as that of the captain of the "Varsity Eight." He married into the old Yorkshire house of Althorpe of Dunnington, and on the death of his wife, within one year of their union—he entered into Spanish commercial operations, and with such signal success, and such benefit to Spain, that he was decorated with the highest Spanish Order, namely, that of Carlos III., which bears with it the proud title of Chevalier. His second marriage brought him an all human happiness, his wife being a daughter of the Hon. G. Y. Gilbert, the "Hall," Gilbertsville—one of those palatial homes seldom to be met with outside of Merrie England.—New York. 'Tis but "a little yesterday" that we wished them "God-speed" as they quitted these shores for their ostrich farm in Africa; and to-day we have to announce the death of one who has borne so nobly and so well "the grand old name of gentleman." After a painful and sudden illness, Mr. Murray died at Kilfontein, near Cape Town, on October 29th, leaving a grief-stricken widow and two children to bear "sorrow's crown of sorrow." Mr. Murray was thoroughbred, and over the oak of his honest English nature was laid the exquisite polish of the courtesy of the Hidalgo. He was a man of stainless honor and untainted creed. He was a loving husband, a fond father, and a firm friend. To her whom his untimely death has whelmed with grief we offer our deepest and hearty sympathy.

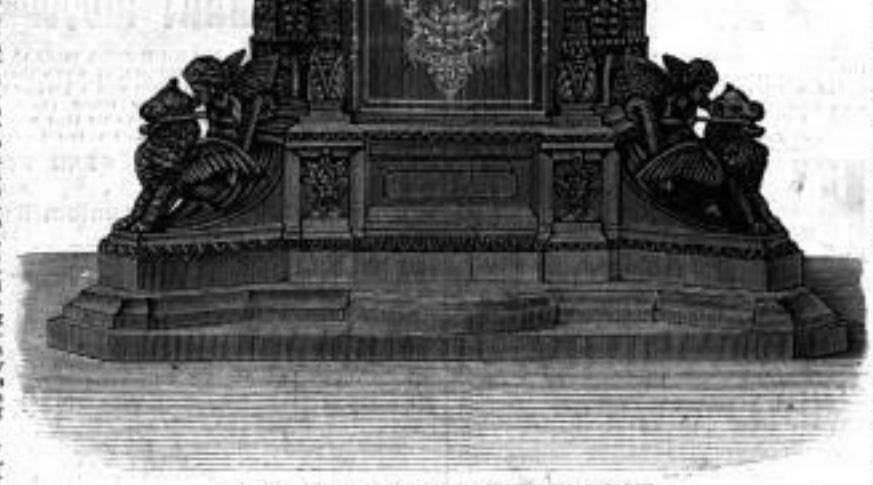
THE "MINNESOTA" MEDALS.

DURING the past twenty-two months, while the United States training-ship Minnesota has been under the command of Captain S. R. Luce, a persistent attempt has been made to elevate the standard of proficiency among the boys who have been enlisted for purposes of training. Among other incidents, that of giving medals annually to successful competitors in the various branches was suggested. As no adequate provision is made by the Navy Department for such prizes, Captain Luce appealed to the private generosity of the friends of the system, and was enabled to secure for presentation last year several fine and costly specimens of these desirable awards of merit. These were distributed a year ago at Newport, R. I., in the presence of Governor Van Zandt and other distinguished guests. At the opening of this year (1879), Captain Luce again solicited from his friends contributions for prizes, and received such generous responses that he was enabled to offer for competition a superb gold medal and seven silver medals, all splendid specimens of artistic workmanship. These were duly competed for, and, after rigid and protracted examinations, were awarded as follows, the presentation being made by the Secretary of the Navy in person, assisted by his daughter, Miss Thompson, and his niece, Miss West, of Washington:



I. MEDALS AWARDED FOR GENERAL MERIT: 1. The "Bailey" Gold Medal, given by the heirs of the late Admiral Theodorus Bailey, and awarded to Thomas M. Johnston, of New York, as the boy who, in the judgment of the officers of the ship, stood highest in proficiency and good conduct. 2. The "Officers'" (silver) Medal, given by the officers of the Minnesota to the boy, who, in the opinion of his shipmates, was most deserving in respect of character and proficiency. This medal was also awarded to Thomas M. Johnston.

II. MEDALS FOR SEAMANSHIP: 1. The "Barron" Medal (silver), the gift of Mr. James S. Barron, of New York, bearing the device, "Look ahead for danger, and aloft for succor"; awarded also to Thomas M. Johnston, the fortunate competitor for the two medals above-named. 2. The "Barron" Second Prize (silver), the gift of Mr. Barron, bearing the engraved picture of the Minnesota, and awarded to J. Costello, of New York. 3. An Anonymous Medal, of silver, bearing the motto over the ensign, "Touch not with impunity"; awarded to W. E. Coman, of Olneyville, R. I.

III. MEDALS FOR GUNNERY: 1. The "Dahlgren" Prize, containing the device and motto adopted by the late Admiral Dahlgren, and given by his widow. This medal was awarded to D. J. Donovan, of this city, he having passed the best examination in gunnery. 2. The "Lawrence" Medal, bearing an engraving of the United States sloop-of-war Hornet sinking the British brig Peacock, and the noble motto of the dying Lawrence in a subsequent action, "Don't give up the ship!" This medal was given by Mrs. Mary Lawrence Redmond, of Newport, R. I., a granddaughter of this distinguished naval officer, and it was awarded to William J. Bigelow, of Philadelphia, who made the best shot in firing at a regulation target 1,000 yards distant from the ship. It may be remarked, in passing, that, in accordance with an established custom on board of the Minnesota, the winning crew named their gun the "Hornet."

IV. MEDAL IN THE ENGINEERS' DEPARTMENT: This medal was subscribed for by the officers, and awarded to J. E. Dodge.

A novel feature in the recent review, at Hampton Roads, which, we think, has not received notice, was an exhibition, in one of the Minnesota's boats, of the working of the diving apparatus, by which the boys are instructed in submarine warfare. A torpedo properly placed in position by means of this apparatus was exploded by Lieutenant W. McCarty Little with remarkable effect, and was witnessed with great interest by the Honorable Secretary and his party.

AN AMERICAN NATIONAL AND ASTRONOMICAL CLOCK.

THE FESTIVAL OF CHANUCKA.

A VERY interesting ceremony, commemorating the dedication of the Temple of Jerusalem, was held in the Academy of Music, New York, on Tuesday evening, Dec. 16th, under the auspices of the Young Men's Hebrew Association. The history of this festival is, in brief, as follows: In the second century before Christ, when Antiochus Epiphanes was elevated to the throne of Syria, of which Judea was a province, Greek influence was making strong inroads on the customs of the Jewish people. Kingly patronage was doing its work in securing desertions from the ranks of the Jews, and even reached the Temple itself, for it is narrated that the high priests Jason and Menelaus were seduced from their allegiance to the living God through court influence. At this crisis in the history of the chosen people, Mattathias, the sire of Judas Maccabæus, stood out from among the faithful to stem the overwhelming influence of polytheism. Jason and Menelaus were not inactive converts, for they are charged with preaching, with eloquent zeal, the doctrine of their new masters, and it is further charged to them that they permitted the Temple to be plundered. Unable by regal favor or the influence of his new vassals to compel the faithful Jewish people to forsake their God, Antiochus practiced great cruelty, and put thousands of Jews to death. At Modin, the home of Mattathias, the Syrian King found stubborn resistance. To Mattathias, whose influence was well-known, Antiochus sent an emissary, who never returned alive. History relates that while the royal messenger was in converse with Mattathias, an apostate Jew advanced to the altar of Zeus, which had been erected in the market-place, and offered an oblation. The sight of this shameless act so enraged the great Jew that he forthwith slew the apostate and then fell upon the royal messenger. Thus began a war which was successfully concluded by Judas Maccabæus, in the defeat of Lycias, Regent of Syria.

The festival at the Academy of Music consisted of six grand tableaux, followed by a ball. In five of the tableaux the above history was outlined. The sixth, which forms the scene of our illustration, was a grand work of realistic art. The preceding one represented the triumphal return of Judas Maccabæus to Jerusalem. The grand procession was led off by Miss Eva Childs and Miss R. Childs. They were followed by over a hundred young ladies with cymbals, and also incense-bearers, slaves carrying precious vessels and jewels, Judas, preceded by a banner with the words, "Who is like unto Thee, oh God?" Judas's brothers, Jewish soldiers, trumpeters, banner-bearers, Syrian captives, and maidens with harps. After the intricate march was ended, forty Jewish maidens with cymbals danced. They were divided into four parts, and one division wore blue, another red, another white and gold, and the fourth white and silver. In the stately dance these colors blended or separated like a kaleidoscope. At a stroke from a pair of cymbals behind the scenes the lights were changed from gold to green, or to blue, or to red, while the dancers grouped themselves into motionless statues. Suddenly the curtain at the rear of the stage was lifted and a very brilliant light streamed out. The interior of the temple was revealed. On one side was the Minorah, in the centre the altar of sacrifice, and on the other side the altar of incense. High priests, priests and Levites, in Biblical dress, were performing their official duties. Judas and his brothers were in the attitude of worship. The choruses were rendered by the children of the Hebrew Orphan Asylum; the incidental music was by Eben's orchestra; the accompaniments by Downing's military band; and the grand tableaux were under the management of the well-known Professor Carl Marwig, famous for his arrangements of the children's carnivals. It was nearly midnight when the curtain was finally run down and the dancing began. This is said to be the first time the festival has been made the occasion of a public display in the city. It is always observed in Jewish families and in the Synagogues.

MEDALS OF MERIT AWARDED TO DISTINGUISHED BOYS ON THE UNITED STATES TRAINING-SHIP "MINNESOTA."

MEIER'S ASTRONOMICAL CLOCK.

MR. FELIX MEIER, of Detroit, Mich., has devoted ten years to the construction of an American national and astronomical clock. It is eighteen feet high, eight broad, and weighs two tons. It has a great variety of automatic devices, but the most remarkable are those connected with the striking of the time. At the end of every quarter-hour an infant in a carved niche strikes with a tiny hammer upon the bell which he holds in his hand. At the end of each half hour a youth strikes, at the end of three-quarters of an hour, a man; and at the end of each hour a graybeard. Death then follows to toll the hour. At the same time a large music-box begins to play, and a scene is enacted upon a platform. Washington slowly rises from a chair to his feet, extending his right hand presenting the Declaration of Independence. The door on the left is opened by a servant, admitting all the Presidents from Washington's time. Each is dressed in the costume of his time, and the likenesses are good. Passing in file before Washington, they face, raise their hands as they approach him, and, walking naturally across the platform, disappear through the opposite door, which is promptly closed behind them by a second servant.

The astronomical and mathematical calculation, if kept up, would show the correct movement of the planets for 200 years, leap years included.

When the clock is in operation it shows the time at Detroit in hours, minutes and seconds; the differences in time in New York, Washington, San Francisco, Melbourne, Pekin, Cairo, Constantinople, St. Petersburg, Vienna, London, Berlin and Paris; the day of the week, calendar day of the month, month of the year, and seasons of the year; signs of the zodiac, the revolutions of the earth on its own axis and also around the sun; the revolutions of the moon around the earth, and with it around the sun; also the moon's changes from the quarter to the half, three-quarters and full.

FUN.

THE best thing out is a bad cigar.

HOPE springs eternal in the agonizer's thought,
Man never is, but always to be, caught.

THERE is something in store for us all, but it takes money to persuade the clerk to hand it out.

THERE are two classes who cannot bear prosperity—one of them being those who can't get a chance to bear it.

"HOW LONG shall girls be courted?" asks an English newspaper. Not later than two o'clock in the morning, we think, except when it rains.

BYRON once said of a lady whose tongue suggested perpetual motion to every visitor that she had been dangerously ill, but was now dangerously well again.

IT is strange how many statesmen there are in this world who are afraid to stand within arm's-length of the money question and touch it with a pair of tongs.

IT has been demonstrated in Paris that when a man pounds his thumb with a hammer he is twice as mad as when he strikes his elbow on the door-frame.

DID you know a barber to own that he had cut you? He never does it; he simply goes for a piece of alum, and casually remarks, "Well, I guess I shaved that spot a little too close."

AGRICULTURAL IMPROVEMENTS.—Land Steward (to tenant farmer): "Well, Giles, what are you going to sow in here?" Farmer: "Ain't 'zactly made up my mind, sir; but if we could put in a few stewards and land agents—they seem to thrive best on the land nowadays."

CHRISTMAS SHOPPING NOTES.

A MODEL DRUG STORE.—In the Continental Hotel building, Philadelphia, is A. L. Heimbold's drug-store. The interior is decorated with a quiet taste, of which the proprietor is largely possessed. The rarest as well as the most common drugs are kept, and prescriptions are compounded with promptness and great care. The line of ladies' requisites, notions, perfumery and patent medicines is as near complete as is possible. The service is polite, and the trade very large.

HOLIDAY TABLES supplied with A. WERNER & Co.'s "AMERICA" EXTRA DRY CHAMPAGNE are certain to be popular and well patronized. This favorite brand has been steadily winning its way to the front during the past few years, and each succeeding season shows constant and deserved progress.

THE SCHOMACKER PIANO.—To that famous Grand procession in Philadelphia one of the most striking features was the magnificent piano of this firm. The tone, touch, action and case are alike wonderful, and reflect great credit on the enterprising firm. Like the Broadwood of London, or the Erard of Paris, the SCHOMACKER PIANO have achieved a world wide reputation. In addition to their general superiority, they have a specialty in the use of their Patent Electro Gold wires, which produce greater power, purer and a more musical quality of tone, and are not liable to be affected by atmospheric action. At their beautiful Warerooms, No. 1105 Chestnut Street, the leading artists congregate, and here it is where the élite make their selection from a vast stock of highly finished Grand, Square and Upright Pianos.

OUR PROGRESS.

AS STAGES and stage routes are quickly abandoned with the completion of railroads, so the huge drastic, cathartic pills, composed of crude and bulky medicines, are quickly abandoned with the introduction of DR. PIERCE'S PURGATIVE PELLETS, which are sugar-coated, and little larger than mustard seeds, but composed of highly concentrated vegetable extracts, and warranted to cure all irregularities of stomach, liver and bowels. Sold by druggists.

CUTICURA SOAP

Is prepared from Cuticura in a modified form and is positively indispensable to the treatment of skin and Scalp Diseases. We recommend it for the preservation of the skins of infants, for gentlemen who shave and are troubled with tender faces, for those who desire a clean and wholesome Skin and Scalp, and for all purposes of the toilet, bath and nursery. Its delightful and refreshing fragrance equals of surpasses the finest Parisian Soaps.

INACTION of the Kidneys and Urinary organs cause the worst of diseases. Which Hop BITTERS cures.

BURNETT'S KALLISTON, as a wash for the complexion, has no equal. It is distinguished for its cooling and soothing properties, removing tan, sunburn, freckles, redness and roughness of the skin, etc., curing chapped hands, and allaying the irritation caused by the bites of musquitoes and other annoying insects.

MORE health, sunshine and joy in HOP BITTERS than in all other remedies.

From Rev. Dr. Taylor, in "Christian at Work," December 11th, 1879.

VERBUM SAP.—The popularity of "SAPANULE" is increasing with the increase of the use of the article. Either for man or beast the lotion is excellent, subduing inflammation, allaying irritation, and producing an invigorated condition of the skin and flesh. Mr. Robert Bonner is not given to issuing statements complimentary of remedies which he has not tried. The following certificate which he has cheerfully given speaks volumes in favor of "SAPANULE":

New York, Dec 24, 1879.

This is to certify that I have used the lotion known as "SAPANULE," and find it to be an excellent article for allaying inflammation.

HALFORD LEICESTERSHIRE TABLE SAUCE.—No gentleman's table should be set without it. A genuine relish.

CURE FOR COUGH OR COLD.—As soon as there is the slightest uneasiness in the Chest, with difficulty of breathing, or indication of Coughs, take during the day a few "Brown's Bronchial Troches."

RELIABLE CANNED GOODS.

GREAT progress has been made within a few years in the art of Preserving Fruits, Vegetables Fish and Meats in tins, and in consequence the consumption has largely increased. As yet, however, canned goods are not generally thought to be "fresh," and some brands are not, perhaps, entitled to be so considered. Those packed by us, however, are Hermetically Sealed at the sources of supply, when they are in the best possible condition, by a process which preserves the much-to-be-desired fresh, natural flavors; and they are really in better condition, fresher, more palatable and wholesome than many so-called "fresh" articles which are exported for sale during considerable periods of time in city markets. All goods bearing our name are guaranteed to be of superior quality, and dealers are authorized to refund the purchase price in any case where customers have cause for dissatisfaction. It is, therefore, to the interest of both dealers and consumers to use THURBER'S BRANDS.

THE GENUINE GAFF, FLEISCHMANN & CO.'S Compressed Yeast

Bears the following Label, which is printed on Yellow Paper.

THE merits of the Genuine "Compressed Yeast" are undeniable. As proof of it, we refer to the host of imitations which have been offered to the public, hoping that the stolen name of

"COMPRESSED YEAST"

(which is secured TO US alone by letters patent of U. S. dated December 5th and 19th, 1876, January 9th and 16th, 1877, and March 6th, 1877,) would sell their goods by deceiving the public.

The housekeeper who once uses GAFF, FLEISCHMANN & CO.'S COMPRESSED YEAST, cannot be induced to abandon our pure extract of grain, which is a natural leaven, for a counterfeit article or a chemical compound, both of which are to be avoided if good health is a first consideration with the consumer.

JOHN HOLLAND'S Patent Record GOLD PEN
Patented Oct. 2, 1877.

Is the highest achievement in the manufacture of Gold Pens and the result of experiments for more than twenty years. The "RECORD" Pen is produced by a skillful combination of the two precious and non-corrosive metals: 16 kr. Gold and Platinum, while the ordinary gold pen contains an alloy of copper, reducing its fineness without yielding that elasticity, density and steel like temper which the costly Platinum supplies. The "RECORD" Gold Pen Points are of the best Iridium. (Diamonds,) indestructible with fair treatment, and polished to glass like smoothness.

Steel pen writers have now every objection to gold fairly overcome, and every requirement in a Pen which will endure and not oxidize, squarely met. The "RECORD" Gold Pen is guaranteed to possess Durability, Permanency of Spring and Perfection of Point. Price, $2.50, sold by all Jewelers and Stationers in the United States. CATARRH

Is a fearful disease, although at first it may appear to be only a cold in the head. Ordinary treatments will not cure it. Its terrible effects are nervous weakness, loss of smell, loss of taste, loss of hearing, loss of voice, weak eyes, dizziness, faint feelings, corrupt matter forming in the upper part of the nose and dropping into the throat, or removed by constant hawking and spitting, nasal deformities, disgusting odors, and finally consumption and premature death. From first to last it is ever aggressive, although often its victims are unconscious of its progress. The inflammation of the mucous membrane may become so great as to cause ulceration or sloughing, and the bones of the nose begin to rot away. Any one who reaches this stage may indeed be pitied. No disease can be more disgusting or more terrible to think of. Thousands suffer with this disease without knowing its nature or the great danger in neglecting it. Many thousands die every year with consumption who a few years or months before had only catarrh. If neglected while a cure is possible, it may rapidly develop and the symptoms of quick consumption announce that it is too late. As the air breathed into the lungs all passes through this mass of corruption, and becomes contaminated with it, sooner or later all the bronchial tubes and lungs are sure to be affected by the disease, if not checked in time.

ASTHMA

Is a disease, which makes life so miserable that its victims almost wish for death.

BRONCHITIS

Is a disease of the throat or bronchial tubes, and of very much the same nature as catarrh. It is dangerous if neglected, and often develops into consumption.

CONSUMPTION

Is a disease that numbers its victims by thousands every year. For those and all pulmonary diseases our treatment by the use of

"Trade Mark." INHALENE

Is the most reasonable, satisfactory and successful. INHALENE is a mixture of the most healing oils, balsams and cordials known to medical science, which, by simply breathing or inhaling from the inhaling instrument, is converted into a cleansing, invigorating, and healing vapor, and taken direct to the disease, where it acts as a local application to the diseased surface, and its health-giving power is felt at once. The medicine is not taken into the stomach, where it is not wanted, but is deposited directly on the diseased surface of the air-passages, in the ulcerated cavities of the head, and in all the air-vesicles of the lungs. By it all ulcerated and inflamed surfaces in the respiratory organs and nasal cavities are as quickly healed as ordinary sores on the hand or other parts of the body by the application of the best liniment.

THE ANTISEPTIC

power of this remedy is of vast importance in view of recent investigations by scientific men and physicians, showing conclusively that many diseases are of parasitic origin, caused and propagated by minute animalcules floating in the air. The corrupt matter discharged in Catarrh has been found to contain myriads of living parasites, or low forms of life, so small that they cannot be seen without the aid of a powerful microscope. The Inhalene, being most powerfully antiseptic, instantly arrests the development and kills all germs of these lower forms of organic life.

Constitutional as well as Local.

This treatment while it acts as a local application to the parts affected, also furnishes the blood passing through the lungs with a rich supply of the greatest purifying element known in nature's laboratory. This being taken up by the blood, is quickly carried to every part of the body, giving new life and health to every organ. With every inhalation new life and health is imparted to the whole system, and with every exhalation the impurities and health-destroying matter are carried off. As this process is repeated the blood becomes purified, cleansed of all poisonous and deleterious matter, and circulates freely. The lost appetite is restored, the digestive organs are enabled to do their work properly, and the entire system is built up, invigorated and vitalized.

Thus it cures the disease first by destroying the cause, second by the most soothing and healing balsams, vaporized and deposited as a local application to the inflamed surfaces in every part of the nasal cavities, and in all the air passages and lungs, and third by purifying, vitalizing, and building up the entire system

No System of Treatment could be more reasonable, and none more successful. Persons even in the last stage of consumption, when beyond the possibility of cure, receive great relief from the use of this remedy; and many cases, considered hopeless, even after excessive hemorrhages, may be entirely cured when all other means have failed. As the oils and balsams condense in the numerous air-vesicles of the lungs, their capacity is greatly increased, and the hollow chest soon becomes rounded and full.

In catarrh it is remarkable how quickly the ulcerated membranes are healed, by breathing the vapor and forcing it into the diseased cavities of the head and out of the nose. It is now acknowledged that this terrible and almost universal disease can only be cured by inhalation. In Asthma and Bronchitis it is equally successful.

This method of treatment is endorsed by prominent physicians everywhere, and by eminent professors of our best medical colleges, and is highly commended by thousands who have used it with entire satisfaction.

HOME TREATMENT

consisting of the following complete outfit, sent to any part of the United States or Canada, and in order that patients at a distance may order with the same confidence as those who can call at our office and examine the treatment, WE GUARANTEE SATISFACTION with every outfit, or will return the money; when the outfit is received examine it and try it as directed in our instructions accompanying each outfit, and if not satisfied with it, return it as directed, and your money will be returned by next mail. An outfit is convenient and pleasant. The vapor is formed without heat and without inconvenience of any kind, simply by breathing or inhaling it. It produces only the most agreeable sensation, and is always ready for use. It is the cheapest treatment to be had for these diseases, as we send a supply of medicine with each outfit to last for several months, and is usually all that is needed in any case.

Complete Outfit, only $6.00.

This outfit consists of The Inhaling Instrument, Inhalene, Inhalents No. 2, No. 3, No. 4, and No. 5. Together with such PROFESSIONAL ADVICE from the PHYSICIAN in charge as you may need now or at any time while using the remedies. And as the corruption formed in catarrh is constantly being swallowed, at least during sleeping hours, and the stomach becomes disordered, the liver inactive, and the entire system impregnated and debilitated by it, we send with each outfit a bottle of medicine especially to correct this and tone up the system generally. This complete outfit will be sent you on receipt of the very low price of $6.00, with full directions how to use it in each case. The Additional Inhalents each have special directions for their use. It is the most complete system of Home Treatment to be had anywhere, and will always give satisfaction. Send money by registered letter, draft, or money-order, payable to the Home Medicine Co.

CAUTION.

To avoid disappointment, see that you get "INHALENE," prepared by the Home Medicine Co. See that the price for the complete outfit is only $6.00. If you are suffering with catarrh, do not waste your money and time with cheap remedies, snuffs, douches, etc., which will never cure and often do harm. It is equally useless to pay large doctor bills to physicians who rely on the old and ordinary treatments. Not one case in fifty can be cured by the old methods. Send for our complete home treatment at once and thus save time and money, and have the satisfaction of having immediate relief and a speedy cure. If you do not need the treatment yourself, cut out this advertisement and send to a suffering friend, or send name and address to us and we will send circulars.

HOLIDAY SUPPLEMENT

FRANK LESLIE'S

ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress, in the year 1879, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.

No. 1,266—Vol. XLIX.] NEW YORK, JANUARY 3, 1880. [HOLIDAY DOUBLE NUMBER.

AT CHRISTMAS

By Etta W. Pierce.

"'God rest ye, merry gentlemen!
Let nothing you dismay,
For Christ, your Lord and Saviour,
Was born on Christmas Day
The dawn rose red o'er Bethlehem;
The stars shone through the gray,
When Christ, your Lord and Saviour
Was born on Christmas Day.'"

BEYOND the solemn rows of black green pines; beyond the high wall, clasped by the close, snake-like arms of the leafless woodbine, some one, in the chilly twilight street, was singing that old carol. Jacquita started and listened.

It was Christmas Eve—she had almost forgotten the fact—Christmas, the time for "peace on earth and goodwill towards men." A shiver passed over her shapely figure.

She paused in her feverish walk and looked up at the sky; it was sombre with coming storm. Far in the west a streak of wavery light marked where the sun had set. In the same direction she could see the river, frozen blue and hard, the spires, the chimneys, the big, busy mills of a manufacturing New England town, and at the head of the bridge which spanned the broad stream, with that streak of sunset shining on its gloomy windows and heavy roof, a stone building—gray, sinister, depressing—the county jail.

The girl was pacing a narrow walk, hardened to flint by the bitter December frost, and lined with rows of whispering pines. In the openings between their scaly trunks, a brown lawn was visible, a frozen fountain, a terrace, a balustrade and the red gable of the old brick house, where many generations of Mathers had lived and loved and died. Suddenly—in a chamber of the second story—a lamp flashed out like a great star. A girlish shape moved across the window, a dazzling young face was pressed to the pane. Jacquita, turning, saw it, and clinched her hands.

"Curse her!" she hissed, through drawn white lips—"curse her!"

The face vanished. She began to walk up and down again under the pines—up and down, with the haste of one who is trying to walk away some intolerable pain. She was a handsome creature, with a dash of hot, foreign blood in her veins. Wild Jack Mather, the black strong youth, to the West Indies, and there married a Spanish creole; and from this mother Jacquita inherited her name, her dark, panther-like beauty and her fiery, tumultuous nature. As she paced that dreary path, under the bitter, leaden sky of Christmas Eve, her long rich dress trailing over the fallen brown needles, a heap of white wool, thrown in a disordered mass, about her shoulders, there was something almost fearful in the girl's appearance. Her face was like death—never under the coffin-lid could it be whiter. An unutterable anguish filled the great black eyes; the soft, curved mouth was pinched and drawn. She looked like one who was fighting some desperate battle with the Prince of Darkness—fighting, and losing ground every moment.

"Oh," she whispered, "must I stand by and see them happy? Must I? I cannot—I will not! I shall kill them both!"

"'God rest ye, little children!
Let nothing you affright,
For Christ, your Lord and Saviour,
Was born this happy night.
Along the hills of Galilee,
The white flocks sleeping lay,
When Christ, the Child of Nazareth,
Was born on Christmas Day.'"

She paused. The singer had entered the walk and was approaching her with a careless, unconscious air. A tall, elegant fellow, fair as one of the old Vikings, with just a touch of gold on the soft flaxen of his hair and beard. Half way down the path, he stopped, drew out a match and lighted an after-dinner cigar. As he flung down the lucifer, Jacquita Mather took a swift step forward and stood before him.

"Gaston!"

He gave a languid start.

"You here, Jack? Isn't this Arctic atmosphere rather bad for you? A dolorous Christmas Eve, eh? There's a storm in that sky, and it will burst before morning."

There was a storm in the girl's face, also—that death-pale face, flashing through a drift of night-black hair.

"I want to speak to you, Gaston—there are times when one must speak or die!" she cried, in a labored voice. "So this is your bridal eve—you are going to marry Emily Mather?"

He removed the fresh cigar from his lips. His careless blue eyes opened wide.

"In just two hours by the clock! What a question; and—— Good heaven! you are as white as a ghost! In the name of all that's unpleasant, Jack, what are you doing in this gruesome walk, at this hour of day? I heard Madam Mather asking for you not ten minutes ago."

She flung back her head with a frightful little laugh.

"I am indulging in a retrospect, Gaston. I am living over all the days and weeks that we spent together here, before Emily came from school. Oh, if I could see her lying dead before me at this moment, I would joyfully suffer the rack, the fire—any torture known to man, and, after death, a thousand years of torment!"

He was an easy-going fellow upon all occasions, was Gaston Steele—careless by nature and self-indulgent. These words gave him a very unpleasant shock. He flung down

"Jack, are you mad?"

"I think my hatred for her began years ago," she went on, all unheeding. "She was an orphan, so was I. Both came here to live with gran. I had the face of my Spanish mother. Gran looked upon me coldly, but she loved fair, sly, wax-doll Emily. At school it was the same. Do I not remember how our French teacher, Monsieur Renaud, used to say to me: 'You two are cousins, but you are a devil, and Mademoiselle Emily is an angel?' Teachers and pupils adored her and distrusted me. Then I fell ill, and was sent home to gran, and here I found you—do you remember? You had come to spend a vacation at Mather House. You were the son of a man whom gran had loved many years ago."

"Yes, I remember," he answered, beginning to quake inwardly. He had an instinctive horror of scenes.

"Do you remember our walks under these very pines? The long hours spent in your boat on the river, our rides up and down the land? You found it very amusing to flirt with me, did you not?"

"Yes, I did," answered Mr. Steele, frankly. "How was I to know, at that early stage of our acquaintance, that you were totally unlike other women?"

"Mather House was a stiff, dull place. It pleased you to kill the time at my feet. You were an adept at flirtation—I knew little or nothing of the art. From the first, we were, as you must acknowledge, unequally matched. All the same, it was good fun for you; it delivered you from the demon of ennui. You had no care for anything beyond that."

"Stop, Jack, stop! You are too hard upon a fellow. By Jove! I don't deserve it."

"Have you forgotten the night, out there on the terrace, when you kissed me, Gaston?" A streak of crimson flashed across her white cheek as she said it.

"I have forgotten nothing," he answered, uneasily, "but, 'pon my soul, I wish you would not go on like this! Women are queer cattle; one never knows just how to take them. Yes, it was a bad business, I confess; but I liked you remarkably well, my dear child, and heaven knows I meant no harm!"

She laughed again.

"You liked me! And I—I would have died for you, Gaston."

"Jack, I am awfully sorry," he said, in a remorseful tone. "You know my easy-going ways. I never dreamed that you were taking the matter so seriously."

"Then Emily returned from school, and the end came. You saw her, and trampled my heart under your feet."

"I did nothing of the kind. Be reasonable, Jack. Why will you talk so? You make me abominably uncomfortable."

She did not seem to hear him. She dashed her clinched hands out into empty air.

"That was a month ago; and to-night she is to be your wife. What ardor—what haste! You love her—yes! Everybody at Mather House knows that. The moment you looked in her waxen face I was forgotten. So it has ever been since the days of our childhood. Emily was born to be my bane. Well, I have one thing still left to me in life—just one—revenge!"

She stood before him in that gray Christmas gloaming, her fierce Spanish eyes ablaze, her lips white with pain, her rich black hair blowing in the shrill wind that swept down the pine walk, stirring all the dry, brown needles in its frosty breath.

The careless languor had vanished from his blond face. He looked shocked and dismayed.

"Jack, you make my blood run cold! I am deeply grieved and ashamed of myself—indeed I am. My cursed careless temperament, which never thinks beyond the present moment, is to blame for it all. But don't abuse Emily—I can't bear that: and don't talk of revenge—that's scarcely Christian, you know, on this particular evening. Is there any reparation which I can make for the wrong I have unwittingly done?"

"No," she flashed; "it is too late for reparation."

He knew that quite as well as she did. He laid his hand lightly on her arm.

"Jack, you are a mere child. Your foolish fancy for me will pass, like a dream of the night. A year hence you will laugh to think of this hour. Some one has truly said, 'We always believe our first love is our last, and our last love our first.' Come, shake hands and be friends. It destroys all my happiness to see you in this mood."

His touch seemed to drive her to frenzy. She struck down his hand passionately.

"Friends!—never!" she stormed. "Not in a year, or a decade, can I forget the misery you have wrought for me. Destroy your happiness!"—she set her white teeth—"I wish I could! I will try—I will do my utmost!"

"Jack, Jack, you are positively beside yourself."

"If I am, it is you who have made me so. Oh, why did you pretend to love me, Gaston? Why did you come here to make my bitter life more bitter? What is to become of me now?"

He was at his wit's end. His face was as pale as her own.

"My poor child, let me take you in out of this dreary night—out of the shadow of these sinister pines. By to-morrow you may be able to listen to reason."

A strange smile dawned on her pale lips.

"Who knows what may happen before to-morrow? We dance and rejoice to-night—in the morning we may mourn and weep, Gaston!"

Her black eyes dilated, her voice sank low; she took a step towards him.

"There's a spirit waiting in this place—I feel him close beside me—a spirit that has work to do at Mather House. Shall I tell you his name? Death!"

"Jack!" he cried, in a horrified tone—"Jack! what do you mean?"

But he spoke to unheeding ears. She had turned, and was flying up the ghostly walk and across the brown brown lawn towards the house.

The frozen grass crackled under her feet, the biting wind whistled through her rich hair. Along the west wing of the old mansion stretched a terrace, darkened by evergreens.

As Jacquita mounted it she saw—or fancied she saw—the figure of a man standing at its far end, with face uplifted toward a row of lighted windows.

In the gathering darkness she could discern only his outlines, and these seemed strangely familiar.

He did not wait to be inspected, for the instant he heard her step in the brittle grass he started, wheeled quickly, and vanished as if by magic.

Jacquita entered the big, wainscoted hall of Mather House. A door on her right stood open, and, as she was flitting by, the sharp voice of Grandmother Mather called to her. Reluctantly she stepped into the room.

A square, low-ceiled parlor, finished in fragrant cedar-wood. Rich old furniture stood up against the walls; red berried holly and pale mistletoe, and great clusters of spotless Christmas roses, ornamented the high, carved mantel and the faded old family portraits.

On a hearth of rare old tiles blazed and crackled an enormous wood fire—a genuine Yule log—and before it sat Grandmother Mather, a stately, hard-featured old woman, in lace and black velvet, giving instructions to a housemaid, who was filling the Japanese vases with hot house flowers.

"Come here, Jack," she cried, as her granddaughter entered. "Good heaven! what has happened to you, girl? Where have you been?"

"In the pine-walk, gran."

"Alone?" suspiciously.

"No. With Gaston Steele."

The angry blood leaped into the old woman's wrinkled cheek.

"You shameless girl! Do you know that you have set everybody in the house talking of your passion for Emily's lover? He might have been better employed on the eve of his wedding. And you—oh! I have no patience with you! Go and dress immediately. Nina has put the last touches to your white silk and tulle, and you will find moss roses and a set of pearls on your toilet-table. It is my desire that you attire yourself suitably for Emily's marriage."

Jacquita stood facing Mrs. Mather on the warm, bright hearth. She flung back her defiant head.

Many a time the old woman had sought to break that fierce will, but had never yet succeeded.

"I wear white silk and roses at Emily's wedding, gran! I would die first! Let people talk. I am past caring for trifles. Since I must appear at the ceremony, since it is your positive command, I shall choose my own dress."

"Jack, for Heaven's sake, do nothing that you will regret," cried the old dame, in angry alarm. "You have betrayed your passion for Gaston Steele to every one. Now let Emily depart without any more scenes. Your wicked temper, which you inherit from your foreign mother, will yet, I fear, bring you into serious trouble. I really believe you would do Emily bodily harm if you could."

Jack clinched her small hands.

"I would, indeed, gran—the utmost harm that one can do another! I shock you—yes, you love always loved Emily, and disliked me. But I—I hate her, hate her, hate her!"

The housemaid gave a frightened jump, and dropped her flowers. Mrs. Mather put up her delicate old hands.

"You dreadful child! Go away! It is plain that you mean to disgrace me to-night. I think I may be pardoned for loving Emily more than you. Why, I actually feel afraid of you at times. Had Gaston chosen you for a wife, he would have deserved my deepest pity. It was well for him that he fixed his choice upon Emily. Go, and for this evening, at least, try to hide your absurd infatuation for another woman's lover; try to conduct yourself as one bearing the name of Mather should."

Sharp, merciless words.

Her pale lips tightened a little, but she made no answer. She turned quickly from the lighted hearth, from the wrathful old woman, and fled up the stairs.

On the landing, before Emily Mather's chamber she paused suddenly. She could not pass that threshold—she must look in.

Some demon seemed holding her, till she should thus torture herself.

Desperately she opened the door, and saw a room full of light and bridal splendor. Servants and bridesmaids were moving about it, and at the toilet table a hairdresser was putting the last touches on the bride's blond coiffure.

And that bride? She sat before her mirror, lost in troubled thought, and nervously twisting a slip of pink note-paper round and round her jeweled finger. A lovely creature she was—

"Faultily faultless, icily regular, splendidly null."

There was weakness in her sweet red mouth, and insincerity in the gentian-blue eyes which had won Gaston Steele's fickle heart from the fiery Spanish girl.

As the door opened, and she discovered the dark, devouring face on the threshold, a nervous scream broke from her lips; she flung down the bit of pink paper.

"How you frightened me, Jacquita!" said Emily Mather, coldly. "Come in, if you wish."

But Jacquita did not wish.

"Come in and help me to dress," urged Emily, in a mocking tone. She knew the girl would have died sooner than lend her hand to such a task. "How dreadfully you look, cousin! Gran must take you to a physician—one," sub rosa, "that can minister to a mind diseased."

Jacquita made no answer, only stood and gazed balefully at the speaker, as some lost spirit, on the verge of the abyss, might gaze at one in heavenly places.

Then she closed the door, and walked slowly away to her own chamber at the far end of the corridor.

* * * * * *

An hour later a bridal train swept down the broad stair of Mather House, and entered the cedar parlor.

Emily Mather, in white satin and orange flowers, with superb diamonds—her fond old grandmother's gift—blazing in her soft blonde hair, and on her lily arms and bosom, looked like an angel.

Pale she was—ghastly pale—but pallor is becoming a bride.

She clung nervously to Gaston Steele's arm; but that was not strange, for if a woman has nerves at all, they are sure to assert themselves on such an occasion.

As for the bridegroom, he had not yet recovered from his interview with Jacquita in the pine-walk. That unlucky encounter had shaken him out of his usual careless ease, and sobered all his joy.

Nevertheless, he supported his bride most tenderly, and his blue eyes dwelt with open adoration upon the lily face under the cobweb veil.

In truth, they were a pair to be envied. Gaston Steele was rich, and the wise ones whispered that Emily Mather was sure to inherit her grandmother's fortune, to the utter exclusion of Jacquita.

It was enough to make an old heart young again to look upon the happiness of these young creatures, blessed with all the best gifts of life.

A crowd of admiring guests filled the great room; but where was that little vixen, Jacquita? She had not yet appeared. Grandmother Mather, handsome and stately in her black velvet and point lace, was watching the door anxiously. What scandalous thing was she likely to do?

"I regret that I did not send her away," thought the old dame. "I feel certain that she will bring me to grief to-night."

The next moment she looked, and saw Jacquita entering by the door. Horror! Could she believe her eyes?

The girl had put on a dress of deepest black. In one dreary, unbroken line it swept from throat to feet!

Not a flower, not an ornament—not even a frill of white—relieved this abominable costume! Her face was paler than even the bride's. Her great black eyes burned with volcanic fire.

The guests stared, whispered, shrugged their shoulders.

Grandmother Mather grew purple with wrath. She would have given half her worldly possessions at that moment for the pleasure of boxing her granddaughter's ears; but that could not be done at Emily's wedding. So, like some threatening shadow, some shape of evil omen, Jacquita, looking not to the right hand nor the left, speaking to none, caring for none, made her way through the crowd to a distant window, and turned her back deliberately on the bridal pair.

There, like a black, graven image, she stood through the ceremony, staring blankly out into the freezing night.

Her eyes she could control, but she could not shut her ears.

"Till death do ye part!"

The solemn, irrevocable words pierced her like dagger-points.

It was done—he belonged to Emily!

Close by her side she heard a guarded voice say:

"That awful Spanish girl! She is in love with the bridegroom. Madame Mather ought to put her in a strait-waistcoat."

"She looks like a death's head at the feast," answered another. "That dress is shameful—it gives me the horrors. I dare say, she will do some desperate thing before the night is over—cut her own throat, perhaps."

"Or the bride's."

Under the chandelier, wreathed with waxen holly, stood the happy pair, now one—evermore one, to receive the good wishes of their friends. Neither had yet seen Jacquita.

Grandmother Mather swept across the room and grasped the girl's arm.

"Go, and congratulate Emily, as everybody else is doing," she whispered.

Jacquita kept her sombre eyes fixed on the night without.

"I will do nothing of the kind. I am no hypocrite, gran."

"You little hornet! That dress—I only wish I could tear it off you! You will be the talk of the whole town to-morrow. For decency's sake, do as I bid you!"

Jacquita clinched her bloodless hands in the obnoxious folds of the mourning-gown.

"Wish her joy with my lips, gran, when at heart I would be glad if she lay at the bottom of the frozen river out yonder? Not I. Let your guests talk. Do you think I care? No!"

"You will feel my wrath hereafter, Jack."

"I have felt it many times already. It does not frighten me."

A few moments later, Gaston Steele and his beautiful bride saw a strange apparition sweeping down the long room toward them—a girl, all in black, from head to foot, colorless as death, wild-eyed as some angry hawk. She approached, not to hold out a friendly hand, not to speak good wishes. She cast upon the two one baleful, withering glance, one look of deepest hate, then swept by, and vanished in the hall.

"Thank heaven!" whispered Grandmother Mather in Emily's ear, "that is the last of her for to-night. You will now have peace."

The doors of a gorgeous supper-room were thrown wide open, and thither the crowd flocked.

"Did you see that love-lorn Jack?" whispered the bride to her handsome, happy groom.

His face fell.

"Yes," he answered, in a low voice.

"All in black for your wedding, Gaston! Ridiculous creature! How she hates me to-night, and oh, how she loves you!"

"My darling," said Steele, gravely, "do not talk of her. I have confessed all my sins to you. Had I never seen your face I might have loved Jack, but when you came it was impossible. Heaven pardon me for the pain I have caused the poor child! An ordinary girl would never have given a second thought to such a flirtation; but there is nothing ordinary about Jacquita; she is unlike other women."

"Which is very fortunate for the other women, Gaston."

"I do not deny that. Pray, let her not spoil our happiness, darling. We have no thoughts to spare for her to-night."

Without, all was pitchy darkness; not a star could be seen in the bitter black sky. Within, music sounded through the rich old rooms, flowers died, breathing sweet perfumes, bright fires blazed, Bordeaux and Burgundy shone in the long-necked Bohemian glasses, wonderful enormities of French cookery delighted the heart of the epicure, lights shone, laughter and talk made a joyful hubbub everywhere.

Supper was over, and midnight was approaching, when Grandmother Mather suddenly missed the bride. She looked around the crowded rooms, but saw no Emily. A singular uneasiness seized the fond old woman. She hurried to Gaston Steele, who was talking with a group of ladies in a corner.

"Where is Emily?" she asked.

"Gone up to her dressing room," he answered; "she will be down again directly."

Mrs. Mather waited ten long minutes, then called a servant.

"Hasten to Mrs. Steele's dressing-room," she said, nervously, "and tell me if she is there—I feel as if something unpleasant had happened."

The girl rushed away, to return immediately with tidings that the bride was not in her dressing room, nor anywhere above-stairs.

"Gaston," cried gran, growing pale, "help me to find her at once!"

He caught the alarm promptly. From him it passed to others. In five minutes, groom and guests were looking for Emily Mather. They looked in vain, however—she was not in the house.

"She must have stepped out upon the terrace," said Steele, in an unsteady voice, "or into the grounds."

"How odd—upon this freezing night!" cried some one; but a light was brought, and Steele sprang out on the terrace, calling his bride's name. No voice answered. He leaped down the stone steps into the garden.

"Emily, my darling!" he shouted, in wild alarm, "where are you?"

No reply. In the centre of the lawn was a statue of Pan, and leaning against it, he suddenly perceived a black object, as motionless as the heathen god himself. He rushed forward, and held up his light. The object turned, and he saw the white face, and deep black eyes of Jacquita.

Her head was uncovered, the wind tossed her rich, rippling hair. Her locked hands hung straight down before her. She was standing there, utterly alone, in the bitter Christmas night.

"Jacquita!" cried Gaston Steele, seizing her almost roughly by the arm, "what are you doing here? Where is Emily?"

She stared at him blankly.

"Emily? How should I know? That is a strange question to ask of me. You see what I am doing—nothing!"

"Emily is not in the house—we cannot find her. Have you seen her, Jack? Has she passed this way?"

She gave a low, mirthless laugh.

"Passed this way?—you are crazy! What could she want here? Is your bride given to meandering the garden on Winter midnights? It is a bad hour, and decidedly bad weather for a solitary stroll."

"Have you seen her, Jack—have you seen her?"

"No, I have not seen her," she answered, tearing herself from his hold.

He rushed across the lawn. Moved by some sudden impulse, she followed him. He made straight for the sombre pine-walk, and entered it, still shouting the name of the missing girl.

Silence. But half way down the path the gleam of a white dress arrested his frantic step. He flew toward it.

"Emily—Emily! Good heaven! what a scare you have given us all! Whatever are you doing here, darling?"

Then he stopped; he lifted his lantern—an awful cry escaped his lips.

Yes, it was Emily. Her slight figure leaned against the rough trunk of a pine, a crooked, low-bending bough supported her like an arm of flesh. A crimson shawl was thrown about her shoulders; her long bridal garments trailed on the brown needles. At her feet a handkerchief had fallen, making another white spot in the darkness. On her arms and bosom and in her fair hair the diamonds still sparkled mockingly. Her head rested against the scaly bole of the tree.

A great agony and horror was frozen on the beautiful face; the wide-open eyes stared vacantly into the awful night—eyes that would never again look love to Gaston Steele's. The pale lips had smiled their last—yea, and for the last time answered the voice of her bridegroom. There, in the darkness of that terrible Christmas Eve, upheld by the arm of the tree, stark, still and awful, stood Emily Mather, the bride of an hour, stone dead.

Gaston Steele caught her in his arms. Her crimson shawl fell to the earth. Had the sanguine shade of the wrap tinged her bridal-dress? Down all its length he saw a strange red stain. What was it?

He laid his hand upon her heart. The hilt of a stiletto—a curious thing in silver filigree—met his touch. She was dead, the lovely, the adored bride—dead—foully murdered on her marriage night, and but a few rods distant from the room where the wedding-guests had laughed and chatted in unconscious gayety.

Far and wide, through the shrubbery rang the bridegroom's agonized cry. In an instant a score of persons had reached the spot. Gaston Steele stooped and picked up the handkerchief which lay on the pine needles at the dead girl's feet. A name was stamped on its embroidered corner. He looked at it by the lantern light, then turned slowly, and faced Jacquita Mather, who was standing, as if paralyzed, in the dreary walk, staring at the awful sight before her.

"My God!" cried Gaston Steele, in a voice of unspeakable horror; "it is your handkerchief—yours, Jack! Oh, wretched girl, what have you done?"

She did not speak, only looked at him, saw the frightful accusation in his eyes, and without word or sound, flung up her arms and, fell senseless to the earth.

There was a medical examiner among the wedding guests; Emily Mather was borne into the house and laid in that cedar-parlor, where she had stood an hour before to receive the congratulations of the company.

Wild, frightened faces, sobs and lamentations, filled the flower-decked rooms. Grandmother Mather was mad with grief. Who could have done the deed? This girl, with her lovely face and gentle nature, had not an enemy in the world. Stop! She had one! The same ghastly thought began to take form in the hearts of all present; but suspicion became certainty when Grandmother Mather begged to see the weapon which had ended her darling's life. It was brought, and at the first glance, she screamed out as if she had received a blow. "Jack's!—it's Jack's! Look, Gaston!"

He looked, and a shudder shook his strong figure.

"You gave it to her before Emily returned from school. She has always used it to cut the leaves of her books."

Yes, he recognized the weapon. Where was the Spanish girl? In her room. Somebody had restored her to consciousness. The guests stared at each other. What would the inquest of the morrow bring forth.

Christmas morning dawned, wild and gray. A few flakes of snow fluttered down from the overburdened clouds.

The great festival of the year had come, but its joy could not penetrate the old brick house among the pines. Gloom and death reigned there.

The coroner and his jury held possession of everything. In the cedar parlor a rigid examination of the members of the household was in progress.

Gaston Steele went up to Jacquita, who stood at the corner of the hearth, warming herself by the open fire. She wore the black dress of the previous night, and her bearing was singularly calm and courageous.

"Jack," he said, in a low voice, "say but these words, 'I am innocent,' and I will believe you, come what may."

She looked him fearlessly in his haggard face.

"I am innocent."

He wrung her hand in silence. Grandmother Mather entered, leaning on her maid. At sight of Jacquita she screamed.

"Take that girl away! Never let me see her again—never let her come near me! Away with her!" Gaston Steele led her to a seat.

"For heaven's sake!" he whispered, "do not talk like that! You will do her incalculable harm. Already the whole town believes her guilty."

"She is guilty!" cried gran, loud enough to be heard by every one.

Whether she was or not, the information collected from the different witnesses told with damning effect against Jacquita Mather.

One by one the servants testified to what they called her "tantrums," and the threats which she had openly made against her cousin.

Grandmother Mather told of her furious jealousy, and her infatuation for Gaston Steele—statements which the latter person was obliged to corroborate, though he did so with much seeming reluctance.

"Miss Mather has a passionate temper," he urged; "no importance should be attached to her wild talk. In fits of wrath it is not her custom to weigh her words properly. She would never have harmed a hair of her cousin's head."

He had taken his stand for the suspected girl. She knew instinctively that every other person in the house was against her, but Emily's husband was her friend.

Throughout her own examination Miss Mather maintained the most perfect composure. Had she not cherished a jealous hatred toward the deceased? Yes. Had she not on several occasions vowed to do her injury? Yes. Was the handkerchief which Steele had picked up at the feet of his bride, her property? Yes. How did she account for the finding of it there with the dead girl?

She had walked under the pines at sunset, and dropped it then.

The stiletto was shown. Did she recognize that?

Yes. It was a keepsake from Gaston Steele. By accident she had left it on a rustic bench in the garden the day before.

How could she explain her presence in the shrubbery at the time of the murder?

She had gone thither to think her own thoughts. She had not seen Emily nor approached the pine-walk. She did not love her cousin, but no thought of doing her actual injury had ever entered her mind.

The coroner's jury promptly decided that Mrs. Emily Mather Steele had come to her death by means of a weapon called a stiletto, in the hands of one Jacquita Mather. And the latter person was at once arrested.

* * * * * *

In the gray Christmas afternoon a close carriage appeared at the door of Mather House.

The sheriff and an officer stood in the hall, ready to conduct the prisoner to the jail across the river.

Jacquita descended the stair, cloaked and veiled. At its foot Gaston Steele waited.

She went up to him, deadly pale, but perfectly quiet and composed.

"Gran will not see me," she said, and her lip quivered a little—the first sign of emotion that she had yet shown. "Will you take my good-by to her, and say that I forgive her for all her hardness to me this day?"

He nodded. The sheriff handed Miss Mather into the carriage, and followed her with his assistant.

After them came Gaston Steele, and seated himself by the side of the prisoner.

"I am going with you," was all that he said.

Down the snowy drive they rolled, and out into the street. All about the stone gates groups of people stood, waiting for the vehicle. A curtain was drawn across the window. Jacquita could not see them, but she heard the yell which they raised as she passed.

They, too, believed her guilty. There was a turbulent population in the town, and throughout its borders the murder had created an intense excitement.

Rapidly the carriage rolled down to the bridge which spanned the river. Scarcely had the horses crossed the heavy planks, when a portentous murmur was heard—the hoarse, mingled voices of a gathered crowd. The sheriff looked grim.

"I'm afraid there's trouble ahead," he said, to Gaston Steele.

Even as he spoke the horses came to a halt. A dozen pairs of hands were laid on the carriage door. The sheriff and Steele tried to hold it fast; but in a moment it was torn from its hinges.

Then they saw all about them a sea of threatening faces. The way was choked, the horses were surrounded; further progress was impossible.

"Let us pass in the name of the law!" shouted the sheriff.

A derisive cry answered him.

"Hand out that she-devil!"

"Show us the murderess!"

"Hang her here on the bridge!"

Bricks and stones came flying into the carriage.

One struck the sheriff full in the forehead, and knocked him back in his seat insensible. His assistant sat paralyzed with terror. Gaston Steele flung himself before the prisoner, shielding her with his own body.

"Let us see her! Drag her out! We will see her!" roared the crowd.

Brawny arms were thrust through the door: Gaston Steele beat them down. He was struck in the face by some flying missile; the blood gushed out—he did not know it.

The frightened officer had drawn a pistol, but his hand trembled so violently that he could not hold it.

"Fire, in heaven's name!" urged Steele, but the man hesitated, and his principal still lay senseless in the bottom of the carriage.

"We will see her—we will see the murderess!" roared the rabble anew.

Gaston Steele sprang out on the carriage-step, and confronted the sea of faces.

"Cowards!" he thundered, "there is no murderess here, only an innocent girl, as guiltless of blood as your own sisters and wives!"

"Who the deuce are you, who dares to say that?" called out a gruff voice by the carriage-wheel.

"I am the husband of Emily Mather!"

Dead silence.

Defense from such a quarter was both odd and impressive. The mob fell back involuntarily. The driver seized the opportunity to lash his horses, but they had not advanced a dozen yards when they were stopped again.

"Let us see her!" persisted the crowd; "innocent or guilty, let us see her!"

Steele felt a light touch. It was Jacquita's hand.

"Move," she said, "and let them see me."

He obeyed. The crowd pressed up, looked in at the door. Lo! there was a girl scarcely more than seventeen, grand and unflinching as some little queen, her proud dark eyes full of quiet scorn, no shade of fear, no sign of guilt visible on her marvelously beautiful face.

Back fell the curious, jostling, menacing throng. At the same moment the officer rallied sufficiently to discharge his revolver over the gathered heads.

The driver struck his horses anew, and this time no hand detained him. The vehicle dashed forward and entered the jail-yard. The big gates clanged upon it, shutting out the crowd—shutting in Jacquita Mather.

Steele bade her good-by in the jailer's room.

"Ah!" she shuddered, as she looked up in his wounded face. "What a day this has been! You are hurt—you are bleeding. I thank you saved my life out there by the bridge. But for you, they might have killed me. It is not a valuable life," with a pathetic little smile, "but still I must thank you."

He pressed her cold hand.

"Thank heaven, you are not harmed. Take courage, Jack. Light must soon be thrown upon this monstrous mystery. You cannot be detained long in this place."

And then he went away, and left her in her narrow prison-cell.

* * * * * *

Emily Mather was laid to her rest in the ancient family tomb across the river.

Gaston Steele remained at Mather House. He could not leave the place till after the trial of Jacquita; moreover, its broken-hearted old mistress clung to him as to a last support; but his belief in Jack's innocence exasperated her greatly.

"I understand," she stormed, "the thought of her weakness for you makes you indulgent towards her. I tell you she killed my darling, and I shall live to see her hanged as a murderess."

"How can you talk like that?" cried Steele, sternly. "She is your own grandchild—as near to you as was Emily. God forbid that you or I should live to see anything of the kind!"

"She is none of mine, now. I repudiate her—I cast her off; I will never call her by my name again."

"Hard words!" he sighed. "hard words!"

An hour or two after this conversation a housemaid was passing through the hall of Mather House, and lo! at the foot of the oaken stair she stumbled upon her mistress, lying prone upon her face, and breathing heavily.

The girl lifted her up. Her limbs were like lead, her eyes were fixed. She could neither stir nor speak; she was stricken with paralysis.

Gaston Steele carried the news to Jacquita.

It was late of a wintry afternoon—the twilight was creeping into the jail with stealthy gray feet. He found the young prisoner reading a little German Bible in the silence of her dreary cell. Her finger pointed to these words:

"Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall become as white as wool."

As the iron door opened to admit the visitor, she closed her book, and arose quietly. He had not seen her for two weeks, and the change in her appearance startled and amazed him.

In the sharpened outlines of her figure; in her great melancholy eyes, fierce no longer; in her air of quiet dignity; in her wasted, subdued face, he could scarcely recognize the fiery, impetuous Jacquita of old.

"What brings you here?" she asked.

"I have tidings for you," he answered; and then he told her of the new calamity which had fallen upon Mather House.

"She will die, thinking me guilty," said Jacquita, with a dry, choking sob. "Gaston, there is something I wish to say to you."

"Say on."

A streak of sunset light was fading off the whitewashed walls of the cell. Her hollow eyes followed it, as it slipped slowly away, then she spoke:

"It was on the night of your marriage. I had just come in from the pine-walk. You know all the wicked things which I said to you there; but you do not know the purpose that was in my heart. I meant to put an end to my own life before morning—to fling the shadow of my death upon the happiness of your bridal. That was the revenge which I meditated—that only. As I passed the door of Emily's room, I stopped and looked in. She was sitting at her toilet, and on her face was a pallor—a trouble, altogether new to me. She held a slip of pink note-paper in her hand—she was twisting it nervously about her fingers. I think—I am almost sure—there was writing on the paper. As soon as she saw me, I passed on. A simple incident, you will say, scarcely worthy of mention, yet it haunts me by day and night. I dream of it when I sleep; I think of it when I wake. I see her before me constantly, with that pale, troubled look on her face, and that bit of pink paper twisted about her hand. Gaston, I wish—I wish that paper could be found!"

The appeal in her tone thrilled him to the heart.

"It shall be," he cried, "if it is still in existence."

"Go back to Mather House and search for it. Has her room been disturbed since her death?"

"No."

"Then you will find it there. I saw her fling it from her as I looked into the chamber. I cannot tell where it fell, but you will find it somewhere—somewhere! It is strange, is it not, that I should attach importance to so foolish a matter? When drowning, you know, one will catch at straws."

Gaston Steele hurried back to Mather House. The sick old grandmother was sleeping, watched by careful attendants. He went straight to Emily's chamber, put down his lamp upon the mantel, and began a minute examination of everything in the room. After long and patient search, in an obscure corner, under the lace-draped toilet-table, he found a bit of pink note-paper, twisted out of all shape, and with some writing in pencil traced upon it. Smoothing out the wrinkled surface, he held it to the light, and, with difficulty read these words:

"I shall wait for you in the walk of pines till midnight. I conjure you, by your old love for me, to meet me there."

No signature was attached. Gaston Steele staggered to the window and flung up the sash. He felt sick and faint. None but a lover could have written those words. From bridegroom, from friends, Emily Mather had stolen away on her marriage-eve to meet in the lonely pine-walk the writer of that note and—a cruel death! Steele held the cursed paper in his hand, the cold wind blew in his face, and out of all his bitterness and grief a sudden joy was born he knew; he felt that Jack—poor, erring but deeply-wronged Jack was saved!

The next morning he presented himself at the jail. She was waiting for him, with a strange expectancy in her face.

"You have found it!" she cried.

"Yes," he answered, and placed the slip in her hand.

She gave a great start, as her eyes fell on the penciled lines.

"I know this writing," she said, looking up in wonder at Gaston Steele.

"You know it?"

"I have seen it scores of times," smiling sadly; "it is that of Monsieur Renaud, our French master at the school. Did I not tell you that he used to call me a devil, and Emily an angel? I had a strange fancy that I saw him on the west terrace of Mather House the night of your marriage. He was very fond of Emily in her schooldays, and I think she cared a little for him—in foolish girl-fashion."

"Enough!" cried Steele, with a stern, white face; "you have solved the mystery of my wife's murder!"

An hour later, the pink paper was in the hands of an officer of the law, who went immediately to the school, where Monsieur Felix Renaud taught his native tongue to fashionable young ladies, and arrested the handsome Frenchman.

Jacquita was set free. Gaston Steele carried her back to Mather House; and scarcely had the door of her cell closed on Monsieur Renaud, when he made a full confession of the secret passion which had long existed betwixt himself and his fair, fickle pupil, Emily Mather, and the wild jealousy, the temporal madness, which, when he found her false and lost to him for ever, had led him to the commitment of her murder.

* * * * * *

Grandmother Mather breathed her last in her granddaughter's arms. Gaston Steele had told her the story which was now on every lip, and she looked remorsefully up into the girl's face, feebly articulated one word, "Forgive!" then fell back on her shoulder and died.

There was no will, and but one heir to the old woman's fortune—Jacquita Mather.

Gaston Steele went abroad. At parting, Jacquita said to him:

"You were the only person who believed in me. I shall never forget that."

He pressed her cold hand in both his own.

"May God send you happier days than you have yet known," he cried, fervently.

A sad smile flitted across her lips.

"I was not born for happiness," she answered, and then he went his way.

Years passed. Again and again Christmas Eve came and went—four had gladdened the wintry world since the murder of Emily Mather. The fifth arrived in storm and cloud, with a wild wind blowing through the sombre pines, and white snow drifting about the strong gates, and along the deserted terraces of Mather House. Dinner was over, and by a blazing log on the hearth of the cedar parlor sat Jacquita all alone.

Her heavy black dress swept the quaint old tiles; her ringless hands, full of spotless Christmas roses, lay listlessly in her lap; her great solemn eyes were fixed on the merry Christmas fire. A handsome woman she was; older than her years, sadder than one with so much of wealth and strength and beauty should have been. With the outer world she mingled little; but the poor and the afflicted for miles and miles around Mather House knew her well.

The storm beat across the windows. Night was falling fast—the blessed night of the Nativity. Shadows gathered in the corners of the room. A faint perfume arose from the flowers in her hands. Softly she began to sing those lines of the old familiar Christmas carol:

"God rest ye, all good Christians!
Upon this blessed morn
The Lord of all good Christians
Was of a woman born;
Now all your sorrows He doth heal,
Your sins He takes away;
For Christ, your Lord and Saviour,
Was born on Christmas Day."

Was there any healing for sorrow like hers? A faint noise startled her. She lifted her eyes, dim with tears, from the happy fire, to find that the door had opened, and that some one—a man, a stranger—was standing upon the threshold looking in upon her.

Her heart gave a great bound. She arose to her feet, dropping her Christmas roses. As she did so, the apparition stepped into the cedar-room. Was it a stranger? Travel had darkened his face, and the years had given it a gravity which it had never worn of old, but time nor change could not deceive Jacquita's eyes. He held out his hand eagerly.

"Pardon me for entering unannounced. Your servant told me I should find you here, Jack, Jack!—ah, I have been too sudden—you are faint!"

She looked about to fall, but by a mighty effort she rallied, and faced him bravely.

"Yes, it is sudden. I did not think to ever see you again, Gaston."

He looked at her fixedly, marked the changes which the years had wrought in her rich beauty, and a light flashed into his face, a great tremor shook his voice.

"Have you no welcome for me, Jack? It is Christmas Eve, and I have come from the antipodes to tell you that I love you—to ask you to be my wife. Since we parted, I have thought of you constantly—your face has followed me in all my wanderings. Can you forget the past—can you be happy without me yet?"

There was a moment of silence. The north wind whistled by the window, the fire snapped on the hearth. She raised her lovely tear-wet eyes to his face.

"Gaston, are you sure of your own heart?"

"For five years it has beat only for you—yearned only for you," he answered, sadly. "Is not that test enough? Oh, my darling, do not doubt me now?"

Mutely she stretched out her hands to him. He snatched her to his heart.

"I am not sure," he said, with a heavy sigh, "that I have not always loved you!"

And the winds roared, the snow fell, the black night settled over the sombre pines; but Christmas Eve had brought joy and peace, and the healing of the old sorrows, at least, to Mather House.

THE TRAMP OF SHILOH.

By JOAQUIN MILLER.

YES, bread! I want bread! You heard what I said;
Yet you stand and you stare,
As if never before came a Tramp to your door
With such insolent air.

"CAME A TRAMP TO YOUR DOOR."

"MY HOME IT WAS BURNED."

Would I work? Never learned.—My home it was burned;
And I haven't yet found
Any heart to plow lands and build homes for red hands
That burned mine to the ground.

No bread! you have said?—Then my curse on your head
And, what shall sting worse,
On that wife at your side, on those babes in their pride,
Fall my seven-fold curse!—

Good-by! I must learn to creep into your barn;
Suck your eggs; hide away;
Sneak around like a hound—leave a match in your hay—
Limp away through the gray!

Yes, I limp—curse these stones! And then my old bones
Were riddled with ball
At your Shiloh.—What you? You battled there, too?
Well, you beat us—that's all.

Bread! money! and wine! sir? Madam, I dine
At your feet—and please, sir, I pray
You'll pardon me, sir—that fight trenched me here,
Deep—deeper than sword-cut that day.

Yet even my heart with a stout pride will start
As I tramp. For, you see,
No matter which won, it was royally done,
And a royal American victory.

But I go. Sir, adieu! Tu Tityre. You
Have Augustus to friend,
While I—Yes, read and speak both Latin and Greek;
And talk slang without end.

Hey? Oxford. But, then, when the wild cry for men
Rang out through the gathering night,
As a mother that cries for her children and dies,
I dropped all, and came for the fight.

What! sit? Sit and tell how we fought—how we fell?
Tell to you who did kill?—
'Neath your cursed Northern vine set me down and drink wine?—
That wine warms, and—I will.

We flew home—fool, that I brought him home here to die
When she, with her last fevered breath,
Had implored this right arm keep him sacred from harm,
And then followed our father in death.

Yet I know he had pined had I left him behind
Safe bound by gray Oxford's bars,
And his proud soul had cried in his valor and died
To ride at my side in the wars.

How young, and how fair, and how noble—but, there!
This wine, or the sudden sunrise—
Sir, when we last stood in the place, and he last raised his face,
I saw there my dead mother's eyes.—

'Twas Shiloh! We stood 'neath that hill by the wood—
It's a graveyard to-day, sir, you know;
And he smiled like a child, even laughed, as the wild
Dogs of war at our throats were let go.

"I KNELT DOWN IN BLOOD BY HIS SIDE."

That laugh was his last! When the bloody wave passed
I knelt down in blood by his side.
On his brow, on his breast—what need tell the rest?—
I but knew that my brother had died;

Then I sprang to my horse. I sought death in my course,
Dashing on till I fell 'mid the brave.
But, disdained still by death, I came back with my breath—
But the place where he fell was a grave!

When a storm wracks the sea, great wrecks there must be,
And waif, wood and stray drift ashore;
And, so pardon me, please, for I am of these.—
But, good-by, I will bother no more.

What! wounds on your breast? Your brow tells the rest?
You fought at my side and you fell?
You the brave boy that stood at my side in that wood,
On that blazing red border of hell?

My brother! My own! Never king on his throne
Knew a joy like to this brought to me.
God bless you, my life; bless your brave Northern wife,
And your beautiful babes, two and three.

"MY BROTHER! MY OWN!"

A DEEP CHRISTMAS SNOW.—"HE OVERTOOK A YOUNG WOMAN STRUGGLING THROUGH THE DRIFT, ALMOST RIDING HER DOWN. IT WAS THE VERY PERSON WHO HAD WRITTEN HIM THAT LETTER HE HAD CURSED WITH SUCH VEHEMENCE."

A Deep Christmas Snow.

By WALTER EDGAR McCANN.

"IT is still coming down," said the beautiful watcher at the window, hopelessly.

Doctor Ezekiel, sitting before the open grate, leaned back with a luxurious sigh. Curious red and yellow lights were reflected upon his glasses; but no heat could give his face a color. He was not a handsome man; but no one could have justly called so intellectual and energetic a countenance homely.

"You should see the snows they have in the North," he said, getting up and crossing briskly to the window. "Pooh! My dear Mrs. Stuart, this is nothing."

"It seems a great deal to me; and how is it that in some places it is so much deeper than in others? The face of the tobacco-field is quite hidden, and the road nowhere, and the church there looks like something drawn on a slate."

"The gale makes the snow drift," explained the doctor, standing now exactly beside the handsome widow, and looming tall and slight above her. "You shall see a sight more wonderful than this to-morrow—I dare say, people will not be able to get about at all. I perceive that we are in for a real old-fashioned storm," and he laughed with rather grim enjoyment. "But I don't mind; I relish it."

"Still, when one thinks of the poor old villagers——"

"One need not do so, I am sure; I prefer to think exclusively of ourselves, Madeline," and he placed his slender arm about her waist. She shuddered a little—an involuntary movement—for it was instantly followed by a quick, sidelong glance of inquiry at his face. He, however, was still intently watching the white downfall outside.

"On reflection, I conclude that I had better go to the post-office at once," he said, suddenly. "The longer I delay the worse it will be."

"But do you expect very important letters?"

"No; but there will be newspapers, I dare say. We must have something to read to-morrow."

Mrs. Stuart did not object further, and the tall, pale doctor left the room, and in the hall put on his heavy coat and seal cap, and so betook himself to the stable. A few minutes later he rode past the window on his great black horse, waving his hand and smiling to the beautiful lady who watched him.

It was indeed a tremendous snow-storm. Dr. Ezekiel buffeted his way with grim enjoyment, being a man who liked difficulties, and had a malicious sort of enjoyment in overcoming them. He spoke with a sharp and objurgatory encouragement to his horse when the great beast stumbled; but it was the outcome of good-humor and a nervous system braced by the keen atmosphere.

At the post-office window he chatted rapidly and pleasantly with Mrs. Brown, while she selected his letters and papers, laughing and blushing. The bystanders stopped in their conversation to listen deferentially. All knew the great man and admired him; knew also that in two or three days he was to marry the beautiful mistress of Red-rose Farm; knew that they had met at the Springs in the Summer and been mutually attracted; knew that the doctor was rich and that the match would be suitable in every way.

He mounts again and is away, holding the bridle with his left hand, and his two letters in his right, which, one after the other, he opens with his teeth and reads. And suddenly the second one, at the instant his eye lights on the handwriting, draws a whistling curse from him, keen as the edge of that icy gale blowing about his ears. He reads though, as it were, in a glance, and then tears the paper into bits and lets it drift with the snow-flakes behind him.

Dr. Ezekiel was scarcely in such good-humor now. The big horse struggled and floundered, the snow almost up to his flanks, and his master rained anathema, and even struck him with his fist.

"Curse the road! I'll go through the churchyard."

So they entered the gate, the doctor kicking it to behind him with a vicious clang, and away they went across the graves, and past the monuments, and by the more elaborate sepulchres. In the very middle of the cemetery loomed up the Stuart mausoleum with its time-worn legend, "Hodie mihi, cras tibi," which arrested the horseman's eye, and he bestowed a pallid sneer upon the quaint lettering. Underneath the floor of that narrow house slept the late tenant of the other and more imposing residence yonder.

"The majesty of buried Denmark rests peacefully," mused Dr. Ezekiel, with his strange smile, stopping in front of the door; "and I conjecture, therefore, that he quite approves of his widow's choice. 'Cras tibi,' eh? In that case it is well to be assured of one's accommodations."

He was off his horse in a minute, and two brisk strides brought him to the iron door; but though not locked, it was not so easily opened. Still, this slight, wiry man of forty had much more strength than one would have supposed, and after a brief struggle the portal yielded with a protesting groan. The doctor peeped in and looked about, a good deal amused in his sardonic way, although the source of his pleasure would have puzzled a stranger. The doctor was, it must be understood, the late Mr. Stuart's heir, a contingency never dreamed of by that old gentleman; but so things had turned out—heir to all that handsome fortune, the beautiful widow, the splendid estate, and finally to a bed in these quiet sleeping-quarters. The two Latin words he therefore applied as a prophecy.

He remounted and rode on again; it was a profanation; but he did not often consider the feelings of the living, no more those of the dead. And just as he turned about the huge monument that marks the resting-place of "Eleanor Digby, a native of England," with the particulars in epitome of her history, he overtook a young woman struggling through the drift, almost riding her down. It was the very person who had written him that letter he had cursed with such vehemence.

She was thinly clad for such bitter weather, and her face was blue and pinched. The rising of one of the dead about her could scarcely have brought such a scared look into her great blue eyes as the sight of the living Dr. Ezekiel, notwithstanding he was the very person she had visited this part of the world to see.

"So you have carried out your threat?" he said, with his malign smirk.

"I have, Maurice," she said, keeping a wary eye upon him as if she half-feared he would do her harm. He was whiter than the snow falling so slowly and sadly about them. "I intend to do all the rest that I said. I have been in the village there long enough to learn everything."

He thought a minute.

"Now, see, Lucy; don't be a fool. It is quite true that I am going to marry this widow; her husband left her more than a hundred thousand in her own right, unconditionally."

"You can't marry her while I live. I am your lawful wife, and I have the certificate," returned the woman, doggedly. "I am going straight on up to the house there and tell her so. The snow can't keep me back. I'll fight the snow, I'll fight you, and I'll fight her, but what I'll have my rights."

"Tut, tut! Now

Lucy, can you listen a minute? We can talk quietly here: I only want you to hear reason. I have never loved any one but you."

Poor Lucy uttered an unpleasant laugh.

"I am going to marry this Mrs. Stuart for your sake. She is delicate, and after I get her money she will not live long; and her little boy is delicate, too. It was I who saved his life at Crystal Spring. When they are both gone, Lucy, it will be Peace and Paradise for us, hey?' and he snapped his fingers. "You shall see, then, whether I loved you."

"I should be a fool, indeed, to trust you again, Maurice," said the girl, shaking her head, but already beginning to waver.

"Ay, without security; but you will have the marriage certificate and can hold it over me—the impending sword. Think of it, child. A hundred thousand—there's a power of diversion in that; dresses, dinners, drives, travel, music and mirth!" and he laughed harshly but gayly. "What say you?"

"I say, no. I am mad, I know; but I'll never willingly give you up to another."

"Then you send me to the State Prison," he returned in a lower voice, bending down from his horse, glancing this way and that. "I've forged a note that falls due next month. A prison for me means poverty—rags and hunger for you, my love. Just look at the dilemma—a palace and a prison on either hand; which will you select?"

The wretched creature looked down and with the point of her shoe poked at the snow for a minute or two, deliberating; and then raising her head, with ever so sad a look upon the thin but still pretty face, said:

"Can you give me some money now? I am staying at the hotel, but have nothing to pay my board."

"Not a penny; but come up to the house to-night and you shall have enough to keep you two months. I keep what I have in my trunk."

"To-night—in this snow?" she exclaimed, aghast.

"You don't appear to be much afraid of the snow," he returned with a sneer. "We have seen deeper in the North when we used to go to singing-school. Come up to the house between eight and nine, and stand outside—there's an arbor; I'll steal out and go back with you. The walk's nothing. It is Christmas Eve, and Mrs. Stuart will have company, and I'll not be missed for half an hour or so. Come through the churchyard here, and don't let yourself be seen. Take thick wraps. You will come, Lucy?"

"Yes, but it is bitter weather to be out."

He leaned down and kissed her, and as they parted she began crying; but he was in haste, and kissing his gloved fingers and smiling, he resumed his way. She looked after him until he had disappeared in the mist, and then started to trudge back to the village again.

Meanwhile, a scene, just as strange in its way as this, had taken place at Red-rose farmhouse.

Five minutes after Dr. Ezekiel had crossed the window, his beautiful affianced sitting before the fire, in a reverie, heard the door open behind her and her colored butler announce:

"A gentleman, Mrs. Stuart."

Mrs. Stuart rose and discovered a figure in the gloom. The butler proceeded deliberately to light the lamp, there being of course no gas in this isolated region, and at the instant it flashed the stranger pronounced the word:

"Madeline!"

He came toward her rapidly, with both hands outstretched; but she shrank back.

"Oh, John! it is you." There was something almost of horror in the recognition.

"It is, Madeline," he answered, stopping short. "You scarcely seem as glad to see me as I expected. At the moment I heard you were single again I left everything and hurried to you."

"I have been single almost two years," she said, with a kind of sob. "I thought you were dead or had changed your mind."

"Changed my mind?" he laughed bitterly. "I was almost cut off from civilization, you must remember. In those mining-camps little is known of what goes on in the outside world, and the mails come and go irregularly. I had no letter from you, and should still have been in ignorance of your husband's death, had I not seen a paragraph in a newspaper speaking of your presence, with your little boy, at some watering-place—Crystal Springs, if I remember aright. But what does it matter, Madeline? You are free, and I have come."

"I am not free."

"Not free!"

"Circumstances have enmeshed me strangely. My heart is as true to you, John, as it ever was; but I have promised my hand."

John Greenlaw dropped into a chair. "You promised it to me long, long ago."

"Don't upbraid me, John; for the sake of the unchanged love I bear you. I have something so singular to tell you that it will sound to your practical ears like a romance; but it is heaven's own truth."

She went quickly to the window and glanced down the road, and then came back.

"I am, I think, the most unhappy woman on earth. You have heard of one person being in the power of another—that is my situation. At my very hearth sits the pale tyrant whose slave I am."

"Madeline, is this a jest you have planned to frighten me?"

"I wrote to you soon after my husband's death, and waited patiently for your reply, but none came. Last May my little Willie was taken ill, and I went to Crystal Springs, a very quiet place, where I knew no one." She was speaking hurriedly, like one who expects every minute to be interrupted. "There were fortunately very few people there, and they, like myself, seemed to have come for rest and retirement. But there was one man"—and she shuddered—"who by imperceptible degrees made my acquaintance, first gaining my attention by the silent interest he displayed in my little boy. This person scarcely looked at me, and never addressed me a word; but I heard through the servants that he was a physician, and had made many inquiries about the child: his name was Doctor Ezekiel. My curiosity was roused, and I observed him more closely. He seemed a thorough gentleman—quiet, well-bred, sensitive, and with something about him that awed other people—the influence that one always observes in a commanding intellect. My boy grew alarmingly worse, and in a moment of terror I sent for Dr. Ezekiel. How the rest happened I cannot clearly recall; but from that first interview I seemed to be under a spell. My Willie grew better or worse just as his physician pleased, and Dr. Ezekiel scarcely left me a moment to myself; when I at length refused to see him, my boy sank to the point of death, and only recovered when this man was once more summoned. I saw by this time that he admired me; but still it was one day a great shock when he said, sitting by the bedside with my child's hand in his: 'Madam, you have seen that I understand my profession pretty well. I can cure your boy entirely for a proper fee. 'Tis a handsome one; but I don't want it till the boy is himself. Be my wife;' and he uttered his strange, harsh laugh. I ordered him from the room; but two hours afterwards sent for him again, and that night before I slept I had sworn to be his bride, as he demanded. Willie recovered almost immediately, and Dr. Ezekiel, who has been living in this house for nearly a month, is, before the close of this Christmas week, to be my husband."

"It shall not be, Madeline!" cried John Greenlaw, striking the table with his fist.

"But I am under oath, taken of my own free will. There is absolutely no escape."

"I shall kill him. Where I have lived for the last five years, when a man becomes objectionable he is removed without much ceremony."

"John, you are speaking under excitement: such things cannot be done here. Would you ruin yourself and me and all? Remember that, all things considered, this man is not to blame. I believe he truly loves me, and it was all chance, and I voluntarily took the risk named in the compact. If Willie had died, the doctor would have lost."

A rapid footstep in the hall arrested her voice, and the next moment Dr. Ezekiel was in the room. He started slightly as he saw John Greenlaw, piercing him with his keen glance; but crossed the carpet to the fire, where, after an introduction, which he acknowledged ceremoniously, he warmed his hands at the blaze.

"'Tis bitter weather, sir;" he said, using the old-fashioned contraction, as was his custom. "We shall see the coldest Christmas ever remembered in these parts, and the deepest snow. You are from the West, sir, I hear? They have deep snows there?"

Greenlaw, obedient to a look from Mrs. Stuart, answered with what politeness he could command; and the doctor related several famous storms he had witnessed in the North.

"This would do very well if it went on," he said, nodding towards the window; "but you'll see that before morning it will turn to rain. Still, for a Christmas snow, I must own 'tis quite presentable;" and he chuckled at the red coals, the shadows playing over his pale face like smears of blood.

Ten rang—it was just six, but had been dark an hour since—and they went out. The doctor continued his reminiscences, eating and drinking energetically, and his gold eyeglasses flashing in the lamplight; and he put a great many questions to John Greenlaw about life in the mining-towns, which that handsome savage answered a little sullenly. Madeline watched the dialogue with anxiety, as she might have looked on at foil exercise between two hot-tempered players. But the Westerner was no match for the accomplished physician, who scored half a dozen palpable hits to the other's one.

So they returned to the parlor, Dr. Ezekiel with a quiet and knowing smile, for by this time he had comprehended the situation exactly—this Greenlaw was an old admirer, and jealous. His extravagances would spice the coming festivities considerably.

"You are to spend the holidays with us, Mr. Greenlaw?"

"Yes, sir: I propose remaining here for some time," said John, sternly and pointedly. "I know of nothing at present that will prevent."

"Even disposed; but I am sure we shall be glad to have you. Do you play cards—whist?"

"I can follow whist; but euchre——"

"You lead at euchre, eh?" said Ezekiel, with his polished sneer, getting up and finding the cards. "'Tis a pretty game; but sadly vulgarized; nowadays the best hands at euchre are generally grimy."

JOHN Greenlaw was by no means a dull man, but he had none of that alertness of mind which distinguished the doctor, and which people must have who hope to hold their own at repartee; and, moreover, he could not keep his temper, which is another thing fatal to wit. So he made no answer to the physician's remark, but looked on with a glum stare while the cards were shuffled and dealt.

The little assembly now proceeded with a three-handed game; but there was not much merriment, or even skill. Cards and one's dinner, to be enjoyed, require the same sauces—appetite and good-humor, and there is no real appetite without good-humor; there is of course, hunger—the animal vacancy—quite another thing. This game played with all interest, and with at least one of the players in a bilious temper, and the others constrained, was a failure.

After a while, John Greenlaw flung down his cards, saying that he could not stand his ill-luck.

"Ay," said the doctor; "luck does seem to be against you, to be sure."

The Westerner flashed a look of hatred at him; if it had been a pistol bullet Dr. Ezekiel would have fallen dead to the floor. But, happily, looks no more than thoughts are fatal, and the doctor, replacing the pack where it belonged, asked for some music.

Madeline played, but her mind was far away. When the performance was over, John Greenlaw expressed fatigue and a wish to go to his room, and this broke the party up, to the evident relief of every member.

It was fast getting on to eight; but Winter nights are long in the country, and ten answers to the city midnight. Cook and housekeeper, having to be up early on Christmas morning, had prudently retired already, and this rambling old farmhouse was silent. John Greenlaw, in his room, sat before the fire, with a flask and tumbler on the table beside him. He had already indulged in a potation of Western strength and depth, and another glimmered luridly in the tankard. His thoughts were boiling and bubbling. That white-faced, smirking adventurer! "What an evening, which I had meant to be so happy! I came on Christmas Eve, delaying expressly, and a pretty end to all my castles in the air! But he has had his laugh—now follows mine, and they say that he laughs best who laughs last."

He stood up and drank his dram, and then took off his coat and boots. What a tall, stalwart, handsome fellow! No match for the doctor, intellectually, I confess; but if there were to be a physical trial of strength, John Greenlaw might get what odds he liked.

He crossed to his trunk and took out something lithe, graceful and sinister—one of those pretty Mexican knives that figure in jealous ambuscades after a ball, sometimes—and hid it about him. He was ready! He opened his door and looked down the dark passage and listened; and then with stealthy foot he went out.

The drama elsewhere had not been standing still. Dr. Ezekiel, having made sure that all the doors and windows below were fast, went whistling softly to his room, the lamp in his hand throwing a glare over his face that gave it a more corpse-like look than ever. There was business before him this bitter night, but you would scarcely have thought so. He seemed more like a man, who, not knowing how to get rid of a dull evening, good-humouredly concludes to spend it in bed.

But at the instant he had closed his door he glanced at his watch, slipped on his hat, coat and rubber shoes, and then took down from a shelf a traveling medicine-chest. The interior disclosed some dozen or two small vials, but Dr. Ezekiel's rapid hand pounced on the one he needed and he slipped it into his coat-pocket.

Then he opened his window. The gale was blowing furiously and the snow still descending like a curtain; a tremendous puff blew into the room sending his books and pamphlets flying in every direction. Outside there was a strange mixture of white and dark—something, indeed, of mystery and horror.

"Hey!" laughed the doctor. "It will turn to rain and sleet after a while, and we shall have regular Cape Horn weather for Christmas Eve."

He extinguished his lamp and got out on the roof of the balcony; with the nimbleness of a cat he glided along, and in ten seconds had reached the ground below.

He glanced up at the angry sky with one of his odd smiles. "A good night to go to heaven, my Lucy!" he murmured, and set out to keep his appointment.

Christmas morning, Jackson, the apothecary in the village, looked at his thermometer and found that it marked seven degrees below zero; and observed that the oldest inhabitant, if a truthful man, could not beat that.

It was indeed the most remarkable Christmas, in respect to weather, ever known. The snow had drifted in some places to a depth of ten and twelve feet, and the rain and sleet which had begun about half-past eight the previous night, had frozen it into solid masses of ice. Many animals had perished; more than one human being, it was conjectured, had shared the same fate. On the neighboring railroad trains had been abandoned at various points, and passengers had taken refuge in the adjoining farmhouses.

On Christmas Day everybody was of course snow-bound: after a path had been laboriously dug to the well and another to the barn, people did not go out, but sat by roaring fires and told stories about previous cold spells, ever and anon getting up and going to the window for a glance upon the cold, white world.

At Red-rose Farm its beautiful mistress was first down after the servants. Then came John Greenlaw, rather pale and sulky; and the grave colored waiter announced breakfast.

"Where is your friend, the doctor?" asked John, with a slight contempt, as he sat down.

"He is usually very early," said Madeline; and she sent the servant to his room.

He came back, and made a startling announcement—the doctor was not in his room, and evidently had not slept there; the bed was undisturbed.

John Greenlaw looked a little confused.

"It is quite true: he could not have been in his room all night," he said, like a man considering something.

"How do you know?"

He waited a minute.

"Well, I may as well be frank. After we had gone up-stairs, last night—less than half an hour, perhaps—I visited his room, and he was not there. I wished to see him to demand some explanation of his conduct towards me during the evening. He had amused himself with sneers, sarcasms and other insults from the time he had put his eyes on me; and it was my purpose, I don't deny, to call him to account for it. But, as I tell you, the room was quite dark and no one there, and I waited till I grew sleepy and then returned to my own. But you need not be frightened, my dear Madeline; he will be sure to turn up, shortly."

She sat with her gaze resting on the damask cloth.

"I don't know—I had a very bad dream; I don't think I was ever so frightened. I fancied that he came to me and told me that our marriage could not take place—that the powers of evil had come for him and taken him away; and with a dreadful smile of horror and despair he vanished."

John laughed. Madeline, with a troubled look, went up-stairs and made a closer examination, and of course discovered that the doctor's hat, coat and rubber shoes were missing as well as himself, rendering it pretty plain that his departure, if not his absence, was of his own volition.

Still, it was strange—what could have taken him out on such a night as the previous one had been? Madeline, for some reason of her own, was anxious and troubled, and sent a servant, if he could make his way there, to the village to inquire. It was something like attempting to reach the North Pole; but the man succeeded and spread his news and asked questions.

Among others who heard was a young woman stopping at the hotel, and who immediately fell into a kind of hysterical fit. She confessed that she had had an appointment with Dr. Ezekiel the previous night in the grounds at Red rose Farm, but owing to the state of the weather had not attempted to keep it. She, too, had had a distressing dream, and was sure something had happened to him. She had seen him held under water by a monster fish. The sages of the village immediately came to a unanimous conclusion—the doctor had been overwhelmed in the snow; it would be hopeless to look for him till a thaw came—and, indeed, impossible.

Christmas Day opened drearily at the Red-rose Farm; an indefinable shadow brooded over the place. Madeline wore the same look of anxiety, and John Greenlaw moped. And so passed the three following days, and then came the thaw. The thermometer ran up to seventy degrees, and the snow melted from the fields and roads like magic, and great floods took place all about.

Stimulated by the offer of a reward from Madeline, searching parties went out to look for the missing Dr. Ezekiel, and every hole and corner was thoroughly explored. The mystery was taken up by the newspapers, and some astounding facts were developed.

A great deal of the previous history of the missing man was brought to light. He turned out to have been one of those spectral miscreants one can scarcely believe in. He had figured under various aliases in many places. In one Northern village he had been tried for his life for poisoning a wealthy old lady who had been induced to make her will in his favor; but his defense, turning upon the nature of poisons, and conducted with consummate ability by himself, had got him off, to the confusion of the "experts" produced by the State. Other frightful stories were told of him, and it was shown beyond dispute that he was one of the most infamous villains imaginable.

All this, however, did not help to explain what had become of him, except among some pious folk, who were satisfied that the Prince of Darkness had carried him off bodily. More skeptical philosophy was disposed to believe that he was still alive, and, snugly concealed somewhere, had the sardonic enjoyment of reading those things about himself, and the endless theories in regard to his fate.

It was beyond dispute that not the slightest trace of him could be found, and, after the most thorough investigation possible, the search was given up.

Meanwhile, John Greenlaw continued to reside at the farm. The weeks flew on, and one day he approached the subject of the marriage. Madeline showed confusion and a disinclination to talk of it; and the same thing happened a few days afterwards.

He went out of the house, and had walked a little way when a thought struck him, and he returned hastily and presented himself before Mrs. Stuart with a haggard face.

"Madeline, I understand you now at last. You believe I know more than I should of the fate of the missing man! Is it possible you think I took his life?"

"Oh, John! forgive me; but every miserable conjecture has crossed my mind. I know he insulted you, and—and you are so high-tempered—and then the customs of the lawless society in which you had lived—and your own confession, that you had visited his room——"

"Well, it is only natural that something of the kind should have occurred to you; still, I swear that more mistaken you could not have been. My instincts told me that he was a scoundrel at the instant I came into his presence, and on Christmas Eve I did go to his room with a knife in my hand to make him apologize for his conduct towards me before you; but he was gone—I did not see him—I saw no one. You can scarcely believe me, Madeline; but it is true."

"If there were only some proof."

"Proof! Is it possible that suspicion has attained that growth in your mind? Is it possible that, living here all this time, I have been looked upon as a murderer? Heaven knows it is time for me to go!"

He perhaps thought she would exhibit some agitation at this threat; but there was no such sign. He was indeed a hot-tempered young man, and his anger grew violent.

"Proof!" he exclaimed. "If people who might be guilty are investigated after this fashion, why should you not stand the test too? You had as much reason to desire his death as I—more! When we come to weigh motives, let us put yours in the balance also. Who knows but God and yourself what were your movements after we quitted the parlor that miserable Christmas Eve?"

She had risen to her feet, white as death. She could not speak, but stood pointing with a tremulous finger to the door.

"Go?" he said. "Certainly I will go; after to-day this is no fit place for me. And now I swear, Madeline, that I shall never come again under this roof until this mystery is cleared up. Farewell."

And he was gone, in rage and bitterness, and pretty nearly hating her. So we see that Dr. Ezekiel, notwithstanding his departure, had left a legacy of mischief, and whatever his bodily fate was, still evidently active in spirit.

John Greenlaw quitted the room fuming. He put on his hat, and, telling the servant that he would send for his trunk, set out to walk to the village.

As it was a pretty long stretch by the high road, people on foot generally took the short-cut through the churchyard. And this, fortunately, was the path chosen by our impulsive friend, John; and, to prolong the suspense no further, I will state at once that it led to the solution of the great mystery.

Just as he entered the little iron gate he met old John Wykes, the sexton, running feebly, with his hands raised in horror, and dismay in his weather-beaten face.

"Oh, sir! For the love o' God, come quickly! He's found the missin' man is found!"

Greenlaw followed him quickly, and in a few minutes they reached the Stuart mausoleum. The door was open, and old Wykes pointed within.

On the floor, with his knees drawn up, and his arms around them, and his hands clasped, sat Dr. Ezekiel, quite dead, and already a horrid object. He was looking straight before him, with the same mocking smirk he was accustomed to wear when anything amused him in life. You would have almost imagined that his disappearance had been a piece of voluntary waggery, and that he had died in the enjoyment of it.

But something beside him told a different story—his handkerchief and a bottle of nitrate of amyle. He had evidently suffocated himself.

The facts were these:

On Christmas Eve the doctor left his room to keep his appointment with his wife, Lucy; but he had no idea of meeting her in the grounds. He pressed on through the churchyard with the design of catching her as she came by. His purpose was to suffocate her with the amyle, which leaves no trace, and bury the corpse in the snow, where, when the storm was over, it would be found and the death accounted for on natural grounds.

The tempest was beyond anything he had ever experienced, and it was only by almost superhuman effort that he managed to get on. Eventually he reached the Stuart vault, and, recollecting his little adventure there that afternoon, he concluded to take refuge within it. He did so, without thinking of consequences, closing the door.

Outside the wind continued to blow and the wind to drift, and in a very little while it was piled to a great height against the vault on all sides; and then began the rain and sleet.

It is difficult to conjecture when the miserable man first realized his situation; but he must have perceived at the moment he tried to open the door that it was hopeless. He was imprisoned by a compact mass of ice, to move which was impossible; he might as well have tried to move the great globe itself. It is not probable that he gave himself up to despair at once; with so hopeful and energetic a temperament the effort to escape must have been tremendous.

He certainly lived through Christmas Day and the day following, no doubt working hard all the time, and waiting for the thaw which he knew must follow before long. But in his position hours were ages, and his sufferings who can imagine? Still, it is probable that not till about the fourth day that, succumbing to horror and despair, he used the amyle to destroy himself. It was in the afternoon of this day that the thermometer began to rise.

Such was the fate of Dr. Ezekiel, so long involved in doubt, and the cause of so much pain and misunderstanding.

John Greenlaw, after looking at the ghastly spectacle for some time in silence, turned away and walked back to the farmhouse.

Madeline from the window saw him coming, and hastened out to the porch to meet him. His countenance told her that he had momentous news.

"He is found!" And in a few words he told the story, holding her hand in his. When he had finished they went silently in together.

Uncle Charley's Christmas Party.

By AUNT FANNY.

ONCE upon a time there lived an old bachelor who loved children! He had a fine house, which he delighted to fill with little ones on every possible occasion. He gave them parties on Thanksgiving Day, Christmas Eve, Fourth of July, and every other holiday he could make for them. In short, he was the pleasantest, kindliest, dearest old "Uncle Charley" of a bachelor that ever turned everything upside down and topsy-turvy to please the small people: and I only wish that all the merry little men and maidens reading this story had known him, so that they, too, might have gone to his delightful parties.

Had known him? Why, bless your dear hearts! there's a chance yet; for he is living and flourishing at this very moment.

And now I am going to tell you of his last Christmas-party, and let you into the secret that there is to be another one just like it this coming Christmas, if all goes right. Perhaps you and I may receive an invitation, and that, you may well believe, would be charming!

But, before I begin, I must tell you how I came to be invited to the last one. I was visiting at the house of a friend, who has five delightful children—Frank, Alice, Becksie, Coaxie, and the baby, who, as yet, has no name at all. One morning we were sitting at the breakfast-table, eating, talking and laughing, when Mary (the maid) brought in four little paper boxes, which she said the postman had just left.

"Why, my name is on one of them!" said Frank.

"And mine on another!" cried Alice; "and this is for Becksie, and that one for Coaxie."

Frank took his box and the others took theirs, amid quite a twitter of curiosity. Off came the covers, and a little flat cracker dropped out of each box at the same moment.

"How funny!" exclaimed Frank—"a cracker! Something's printed on it! What is it?" and he read:

"'On Christmas Eve
Come and see
Uncle Charley's
Christmas-tree!'

"Hurrah!" he joyfully shouted; "it's an invitation to a party at Uncle Charley's! and he has sent it on a cracker!" upon which everybody burst out laughing—for it seemed so droll to bake invitations to a party upon a lot of crackers.

"What shall we do with them?" inquired Alice, But little Coaxie, who was only four years old, knew already what to do. She had privately tasted her invitation, and finding it good, was eating it up as fast as she could, whereupon the rest ate theirs, and seemed to enjoy them very much. The next day I also got a cracker-invitation, which Coaxie obligingly ate up for me.

This was a week before Christmas, and the children did not know how they could wait so long; but it passed very pleasantly, and the crisp, bright moonlight Christmas Eve came at last.

It did seem as if Becksie and Coaxie would jump out of their pretty white dresses, so much joyful jumping did they do, and the eyes of Alice and Frank shone with delightful anticipations. Frank went down-stairs three steps at a time, and Alice danced through the hall to the sleigh, as if she had wings on her feet. As I said, it was a bright, moonlight evening, but very cold. There had been a fine fall of snow, and the sleighing was excellent—so everybody was bundled up as warm as toast, and all the children crowded merrily into the sleigh, pulling me after them, and telling John, the coachman, to hurry, as it was extremely important to be at Uncle Charley's at the very beginning of the fun.

Such a blaze of light as the hall-door of the house flew open! Such a laughing crowd of gayly dressed children as rushed out of the parlor to see who had come next! Such a lot of little mites of children all clinging fast to Uncle Charley as he tried to struggle up to welcome us! And it was really worth a dozen "grown up" parties to see the good man with a very high shirt-collar on and a new white cravat in honor of the occasion; his face all smiles, his great handsome brown beard curling up with good-humor as he kissed the children, and shook hands with me, after which hearty welcome we took off our wraps, and all trooped into the parlor.

It was the front parlor. The sliding-doors were shut and locked, for several of the boys had tried to open them and could not succeed. Then they peeped through the keyhole, and announced to the rest that they saw something shining splendidly between the windows. The girls, too polite to peep, "guessed" that it must be the Christmas-tree, and told each other about the funny cracker notes, and, strange to tell, every one of them had eaten her invitation up, which information caused a merry trill of laughter to run all through the room, and when one of the girls asked Frank what he did with his cracker-invitation, and he shouted out, "I ate it up!" and all the boys hearing him cried, "So did I!" their hearty laughter came in like a jolly chorus.

Just then the front door-bell rang loudly. All the children rushed out, and stared with astonishment as two big Chinese boys entered hand-in-hand, scuffling and waddling up to Uncle Charley, each making three low bows in succession.

They wore long white jackets, or shirts, over embroidered dark-blue petticoats, under which were baggy blue trousers. On their heads were pagoda hats, with a bright button on the top of each. Their hair was shaved off in front, but hung down behind each head in a long plaited pig-tail. On their feet were queer-looking black shoes, with immense white soles and turned-up toes. The boys had yellow skins, broad, flat noses, long nails, and twinkling, slanting black eyes, and they looked for all the world just like the pictures we see upon Chinese fans and tea-chests. After Uncle Charley had shaken hands with them, each said, in a grave tone:

"How do? You belly muchee vell? We velly vell, allee samee."

These boys were the sons of a rich Chinese nobleman, or mandarin. I must tell you here that Uncle Charley had lived many years in Canton, where he was well known and respected, and from whence he had shipped many cargoes of tea. The mandarin had begged Uncle Charley to become guardian to his sons, whom he had sent to our country to be educated in our language and customs. They had been here one month at an excellent boarding-school, and they had received invitations to spend all their Christmas holidays with Uncle Charley.

The children, quite forgetting their politeness, kept looking at them in silent astonishment; then little Coaxie seemed to have something on her mind. Her real name was Eleanor; but long ago she had been called "Coaxie" because she was such a dear, coaxing little thing, and she had kept the name ever since. She went softly up to Uncle Charley and asked him, in a sweet, hesitating voice:

"Uncle Charley, tell me, what for made Dod put the hinges of their eyelids on so crooked?" at which the children could not keep from bursting, out laughing; and as Ah Sin and To-To laughed too, it was considered quite a comical speech.

And now the click of a key in a lock was heard, and the sliding-doors were rolling slowly away out of sight. The children hurried into the back-room, where the brilliant light of a hundred wax-candles amid the branches of a splendid fir-tree caused each of them to utter a great, breathless "Oh!" of delight and admiration. Festoons of Chinese lanters were hung from side to side of the room, at the sight of which Ah Sin and To-To exclaimed, "Melican feast likee Chinee, allee samee. Good!" upon which Frank whispered to one of them, "Did you get your invitation on a cracker?" and he answered, "S'pose this clacker Melican clacker—no allee samee Chinee clacker; he makes fire—go pop!"

"Oh, yes," returned Frank; I know. We have your fire-crackers, too; we fire them off on the Fourth of July;" upon which Ah Sin bowed and said "Tankee," as if he had received a compliment.

But the tree! How heavily the branches hung, laden with beautiful presents for everybody! What lovely and good and useful things that kind old bachelor uncle had provided for his dear little friends! Dolls for the girls, with dolls' houses, resting on the table near—for they were much too large for the tree; skates for the boys, with big sleds under the table, boxes of tools, boxes of building-blocks, paint-boxes, wagons, fire-engines, puzzles, and quantities of books, which, I think, were the best presents of all. For each one there was a tiny lace bag of candy, for Uncle Charley did not wish to ruin the health of the children with too many sweets.

When all the presents had been distributed, and everybody had exclaimed over them and danced around them, the good old bachelor made a little speech.

"Dear children," he said, "to-morrow some—perhaps all of you—will go to church, to celebrate the birth of Christ, and to thank God for His goodness to us all, and afterwards you will dine upon roasted turkey and other dainties. But"—and here his face grew tender and pitiful—"you must know that many a poor child will have no Christmas-present, and very little to eat. There will be no 'merry Christmas' for them. I have tried to remember this, and to-morrow some of these poor little ones are coming to dine with me. They will keep me from feeling lonely in this house, which will seem so big and empty when you are gone. Ah Sin and To-To will stay with me to-morrow; they will see the poor children's Christmas-tree, for they also are to have one. Would you like to look now at the things which are to be put upon it?"

"Oh, yes, yes!" cried all the children.

Then Uncle Charley opened a closet-door, and there upon the shelves were piles of warm jackets for boys, and sacks for girls; nice woolen comforters for their necks, and stockings for their feet. But this was not all. Oh, no. There were dolls, and skates, and balls, and tops in plenty; for, let me tell you, poor children like toys quite as well as rich children do; indeed, a great deal better, for they get so few of them that they prize them accordingly.

The children gazed with the deepest interest upon the presents which, on the next day, were to make so many poor children happy; and dear little Coaxie went up to Uncle Charley, and after taking two gum-drops out of her lace candy-bag, and, dropping them into her mite of a pocket, she cooed out, in her sweet voice:

"Here, Uncle Charley, take my candy-bag and dive it to a poor 'ittle dirl."

Upon which he caught her up, and kissing her rosy cheek, he said:

"God bless my little darling!—so I will."

I think that a tear fell from his kind eyes upon Coaxie's white dress, but I will not be certain. The little child's generous act fired the rest, and every one gave something out of their abundance for the poor children. Ah Sin presented his own private chop-sticks, with which he ate his rice, and which he always kept in his pocket; and To-To took the shiny button from the top of his pagoda hat, as his most precious possession, and put it on a shelf in the closet. It is true that these two were droll-looking Chinese boys with pigtails and slanting eyes; but that was no reason why they should not have hearts as tender as the rest.

After this there came a very great surprise; for, when the closet-door had been closed and the children went back to the front parlor, they found Mr. Punch in his house, bowing and grinning at them. In a twinkling all the chairs were placed in rows, and the play of "Punch and Judy" began. Punch beat poor Judy, and the baby, and the policeman, and killed them all, one after the other, singing a song and dancing a jig as each one fell down dead—to the intense delight of the boys, and the consternation of the girls, who told him with great indignation that he ought to be ashamed of himself to behave so cruelly. The littlest ones were so distressed, that they began to cry, when Uncle Charley hastened to tell them that it was all make-believe. Punch, Judy, the baby and all, were only wooden-dolls, which a man, shut up in a box, held in his hands, and banged about against each other, while he talked for Punch and the rest in a high, squeaky voice; at which the little ones brightened up and were comforted, though not one of them would have banged her doll in such a dreadful manner even if she knew and could realize that it was made of kid and sawdust.

After this entertainment, Coaxie sang this little song in a voice as sweet as a robin's.

"My Kitty is white, with a pretty pink nose;
She sits by the fire and counts all her toes.
Hey, Kitty! he, Kitty! come here and play,
And don't sit counting your toes all day!"

Then Ah Sin stood on one leg, and sticking the other straight out before him, he whistled such a funny tune! He shook his head from side to side, his arms went up and down like pump-handles while he pointed up with his fore-fingers, and every once in a while he twirled round and round, which, perhaps, was when the chorus came in. It was so droll that the children laughed until they were breathless; and when Ah Sin got through he, also, was so breathless, that it would have been quite a boon if Mr. North Wind could have come in at the window and presented them all with an extra breath or two apiece.

Not to be outdone by his brother, To-To started up, and favored the company with this impromptu song in pigeon-English:

"Chinee velly good boys, come to Melliky,
Eat plenty rice—that every day.
Night come; To-To go to sleep quickee,
Ah Sin, he chin-chin on the tum-tum play."

At which Ah Sin laughed heartily, and poked To-To in the side. Ah Sin was very fond of music, and spent his evenings learning to play on the banjo—while To-To went to bed, and snored away like a trumpet for a chorus.

Then Ah Sin, who seemed to have his frolicking machinery wound up so tight that he couldn't stop, said, with the merriest twinkle in his slant eyes, that he knew "A Melican sing-song, velly nice, allee samee." Pointing his long fore-fingers up in the air, he began swinging round till his pigtail stood out horizontally and described a great circle; then, coming to a sudden standstill, he sang in a voice like a distressed cat with the end of its tail shut up in a door:

"Was gal named Moll had lamb,
Fleas allee samee white snow.
Evly place Moll gal walkee,
Ba-ba hoppee long too.

It lun bound to school allee samee one day;
My thinkee this time to rule;
Little chilee makee plenty laugh and play
Allo time ba-ba leadee book in school.

Ole gal scoldee, 'You catchee eclape; gaunt!'
Ba-ba go—thinkee stay near;
Allee samee cuissly, walk 'bout;
Bym-by, Moll gal makee 'pear.

What for makee ba-ba love Moll gal so?
Little chilee allo samee makee cry.
Moll gal love ba-ba velly muchee know;
Chin-chin allee samee lesson why."

This elegant performance was received with shouts of laughter and applause. The Chinese boys became quite the "lions" of the evening—and they learned the American games so quickly. They joined the little ones in "Oats peas beans," and were as good as the best in guessing, "shouting proverbs" with the bigger ones. After playing these games, all were regaled with ice-cream, delicate sponge-cake, and as much lemonade as they wished; and before they had quite finished this dainty refreshment the nurses and fathers came to take them to their homes, and the delightful party was at an end.

"Oh, how I do wish it would begin over again," sighed Coaxie.

"So do I! So do I!" chorused all the others. But that could not be: so the little ones kissed Uncle Charley; the big ones shook hands, and all thanked him for their presents, and the pleasant time they had had, while the Chinese boys, who were to stay, kept bowing like mandarins, and saying:

"Goody-by! I likee you velly muchee. Velly good place, Mellikee. New Yo'k City velly good. Canton City velly good, allee samee. Muchee snow and lain here, makee street velly wet. No snow in Canton City, and velly lit lain. Goody-by," and they kept on bowing and smiling so earnestly that their slanting eyes were nearly shut up.

I wish they could tell you in their comical English, how, on the next day, the house was as full as an egg of poor children, with many of their poor, tired mothers who had long known Uncle Charley as their best earthly friend. The hard-worked women sat resting, and looking so grateful and happy, while the children received their gifts. But how can I picture their joyful, thankful faces when each one was afterwards presented with a warm, handsome blanket shawl! And, oh! didn't the nice hot dinner taste delicious? So much of it, too! Roast beef, chicken-pie, all sorts of vegetables, and good strong tea—which was almost the best of all—it seemed to comfort them so, and then tied up in papers all ready to take away with them, quite a quantity for each, of tea, sugar, and flour. For my part, I really think that this party was far finer than the other. It filled Ah Sin with such admiration for his guardian that he exclaimed:

"Uncle Charley velly good, poor childlun chop, chop, and women chin-chin goss topsidy house for he." (Poor child run very fast, and women pray up-stairs for him), and To-To added:

"He first-class New Yo'k mandarin," both of which speeches were very high compliments in the best pigeon English—which the boys had heard all their lives among the English who lived in Canton.

But they were learning a better English, and as they were very bright, no doubt they will soon talk as we do. And this very coming Christmas, as I told you, there is to be another party. The Chinese boys will be invited. I know that now they wear the same clothes that American boys do. At first they were unwilling to alter their dress; but they were sensible little fellows, and soon discovered that "one must do in Rome as the Romans do"—that is, conform to the customs of the place you are in; so now the long pigtails of Ah Sin and To-To are cut off, and the jet-black hair grows thick and short all over their heads. To be sure, they cannot change their yellow skins and little slanting eyes; but their hearts are just as tender and generous as those of the best of the boys I know who have rosy cheeks and big bright eyes.

Mr. Punch is already engaged, and we will hope to get invitations, which, if not baked upon crackers, will be something just as original, droll, and delightful.

New England in the Olden Time.

IT was in the brave old days, while the names of the brave John Smith and the beautiful Pocahontas were as yet familiar in the months of the sturdy New Englanders as household words, that Rosa Carew, the "White Rose" as she was called, prepared to decorate the manor-house with all the bravery of holly and ivy, for Yuletide was at hand with its gladness, its joys and its greetings. It was Christmas Eve, and she stood in the great hall, her fair cousin Alice beside her, gayly chanting as she flew hither and thither the words of the old song:

"When berries, red berries,
Are hung up on high,
Remember, sweet maiden,
Your lover is nigh,
When berries, white berries,
Hang over your head,
You'll be kissed by the lover
You're fated to wed."

The hall was in a jovial litter. Retainers were busy in nailing up the bright glistening leaves, clotted with red, busy in filling tankards with home-brewed ale, busy in sorting gayly-plumaged game, busy in bearing Christmas greenery, busy in carrying groaning dishes. Rosa stood in their midst issuing directions with laughing graciousness, and was about to fill a flagon with her own fair hands, when her father entered the hall, accompanied by one Master Jasper Mortimer, the very sight of whom caused the fair girl's heart to leap beneath her bodice.

"What is this pretty thing," demanded Rosa's father, with a laugh in his eye, as he held on high a sprig of mistletoe.

Rosa blushed deeply as she smilingly replied: "'Twas sent me, father, to remind me of our Christmas sports in England."

"Oh," laughed the sturdy old gentleman, as, turning to Jasper, he explained. "Hung on high at this season, it confers a pleasant privilege. He who can bring a young maiden under these white berries may claim from her—in all modesty and honor—a salute."

"By my halidom, a gracious custom, if it be observed with due reverence," exclaimed Master Jasper Mortimer, and, placing the bough which he had taken from the hands of his host, he gayly cried: "By your leave, fair Mistress Rosa."

And as the red roses on the lips of the White Rose were kissed, her Cousin Alice sang merrily:

"When berries, white berries,
Hang over your head,
You'll be kissed by the lover,
You're fated to wed."

And that kiss turned the White Rose into Dame Rosa Mortimer.

A Ghastly Revelation.

By S. ROBINSON.

MY friend—ay, friend—George Cavendish, died upon the fourteenth day of December, 1872. We had been flung together upon the world, had fought a heavy fight against desperate odds; fought it boldly and well. He succumbed to brain-fever. Although we had been estranged for some time, I attended him with an aching heart, heard his wild, incoherent ravings, his low valedictory sigh, and received the last look he was ever destined to cast upon this side of his untimely grave, ere he started on that mysterious journey we must all—high and low, simple and gentle—travel, alone.

Unnerved, unfit for work, and with a sense of utter desolation hanging darkly round me like the mourning-cloak which I had worn at the funeral of my departed friend, I rejected all offers of sympathy, all overtures of companionship. I was indeed alone!

Christmas was at hand. Right merrily the standard of holly and ivy was unfurled to the crisp, wintry breeze, and the Christian world, aglow with preparation, was reveling in visions of home mirth and home happiness.

How to avoid Christmas was my one abiding thought.

Remain in London? No!

Accept the invitation of the De Traffords, of Trafford Chase, to a party as joyous as that which assembled at Dingly Dell? No.

I would remain in my chambers, and let my own sorrow eat into my own heart.

Upon the twentieth of December, Humphrey Pallas, a man with whom I was intimate, called to my chambers on a matter connected with a case in which I held a brief.

I was in the act of stepping into the street when I encountered him, and a paltry half-minute would have saved me the interview. If Humphrey Pallas had been stopped by a friend, delayed at a crossing, attracted to a shop-window, the current of my life might have run smoothly on. But it was not to be. It was written otherwise.

He was in deep mourning for his young wife.

"I have shut up the old rookery in Staffordshire," he said. "The word Christmas is absolutely hateful to me."

The tears rushed unbidden to his eyes, and a choking sob bespoke the great grief welling up from his heart.

"Rookery?" I observed, wishing to divert his thoughts into another channel.

"Yes, rookery. It was built in the reign of Queen Anne; and, with the exception of a new wing to replace a portion of the building burned down by the Jacobites in the '15,' it remains, furniture and all, a musty, fusty, tumble-down old place; but I haven't the heart to touch stick or stone of it."

"Have you closed the place?"

"Hermetically sealed it, and dismissed the servants, with the exception of one old crone that Janet, my wife, seemed to have a regard for."

"What are your plans?"

"I have none. Of one thing—only one—I am certain, and that is, that I shall go out of England for Christmas."

The idea came to me that I should like to spend my Christmas at Maberly Hall. My dead friend had passed many a happy day there; had spoken of the quaint old place over and over again, had flung his incoherent thoughts upon it during the hideous ravings of his death-illness.

"I should like to stop at the Hall during the forthcoming so-called festive season, Pallas, if you wouldn't mind it."

"You?"

"Yes."

"Is it possible that ——"

"It is my mood, old fellow, and you will not balk it, will you?"

"Not I, indeed. You are a thousand times welcome, but you'll have a dull time of it."

"Couleur de rose would sicken me just now."

A few words, and the details were arranged. A few words, and the seal was affixed to a resolution binding me, while memory lasts, to one ghastly—Let the narrative speak for itself.

I started upon the afternoon of the twenty-third by the four o'clock train from Euston Station.

A dull, dead, heavy, drenching rain was sullenly falling as I alighted at Stavely Station.

"I require a fly to take me over to Maberly Hall."

"There be no fly here, and there be nobody there," was the laconic observation of the official whom I had addressed.

I resolved upon walking. There was nothing else for it. My luggage consisted of an old-fashioned carpet-bag, into which I had stowed a change of dress, and a packet of private papers belonging to George Cavendish. I had brought these papers with me in order to be enabled to peruse them at leisure, and to place myself face to face with the past by the sad, solemn link of the handwriting of the dead man.

Slinging the bag across my shoulders, and lighting my pipe, I set out into the darkness for Maberly Hall.

The silence of that night I shall never forget. It was unnatural—appalling; not a dog barked, and the plash of a rat into an inky pool alone broke the horribly monotonous muffled echo of my own tramp, tramp. The darkness was intense, and when the road became overshadowed with the gaunt branches of the leafless trees, I was compelled to probe my way with my umbrella, like one smitten with a sudden blindness. Twice I struck a match—once, but not an instant too soon! Another step and I had fallen headlong into a disused quarry-hole, the hideous depths of which my miserably feeble, flickering light utterly failed to fathom.

I reached the lodge at Maberly Hall. My instructions were so complete, that I was enabled to open the wicket gate and pass through, as though such had been my daily practice from childhood.

The avenue leading to the Hall lay before me cavernous as a railway tunnel.

I plunged into it.

Was there no hand to force me back? No signal-pole to denote caution? No red light to warn me of my danger?

I had walked, possibly, about four hundred yards in a darkness so intense that, had I been blindfolded and placed in an apartment from which every ray of light had been excluded, my vision could not have been more securely sealed. I held my bag in my left hand while I groped my way, by means of my umbrella, with my right. My matches had become damp and were rendered utterly useless.

I suddenly stopped, without exactly knowing why or wherefore—stopped, and could feel my heart beating up in my very throat—beating to suffocation.

A strange, sickening sensation crept over me, as though some foul and filthy animal were crawling upon and covering me with its noisome saliva.

One awful second! One flash of thought, and I knew that I was not alone!

I have not been brought face to face with death at the cannon-mouth. I have not been upon the verge of eternity on the deck of the sinking ship. I have not been placed in any of those perilous positions where men are tested to the uttermost limits of their endurance, and therefore I cannot determine whether I am what is termed a brave man or a cowardly one; but that shock, such as startled my very soul, was so fraught with so much mysterious horror that no nature, however bold—no human mind, however evenly balanced by philosophy, or fortified by the sublimities of religion, could have experienced it without recoiling, as in a swoon of an indefinable terror.

This I felt in my soul.

There was something beside me in the cavernous gloom, and that thing was not of this earth!

I called up my reasoning powers to strike one blow in my behalf and crush down the maddening thought by the sheer weight of common sense.

I endeavored to speak, but my mouth was dry and parched and my tongue refused its office. A cold perspiration bathed me from head to foot, and I literally shook in a very palsy of terror—terror, unaccountable terror.

I would have given thousands of golden sovereigns, had I possessed them, for the company of the filthiest plague-stricken wretch ever vomited from prison or hospital—thousands of golden sovereigns for a single glint of God's dayshine. Every instant I expected to be touched by the thing!—every instant that it would reveal its presence in some awful and some freezing manner.

I crouched as if for a spring, every nerve, every fibre, at its highest tension.

Suddenly the impulse came upon me to fly, and I unhesitatingly obeyed it.

I rushed through the darkness with a swiftness that must have destroyed me had I come into contact with any resisting object. A second before, and I had been treading with the caution of feebleness and age. Now I was dashing onwards, with life, dear life, awaiting me at the goal.

The spurt passed away, and I slackened my pace, but the same nameless terror clung to me, for the same presence evolved it. Where was I? Was this avenue interminable, or had I crossed the Plutonian shore, and entered the region of perpetual darkness? Was I doomed? Was I——

At length, when nearly spent, for my heart was in my throat, a dim shadowing told me that the avenue had been passed, and that the deeper darkness ahead was the looming up of the Hall.

I staggered to the steps, reeled up to the great door, and, after a little groping, reached a knocker, which I clutched as a drowning man clutches the plank or rope that is to bear him to safety, and thundered wildly—thundered with a din that would have awakened the dead.

Awakened the dead!

My appeal was responded to. The last bolt had drawn back, and the door was about to yawn for me, when, great God! a clammy, icy hand was laid upon mine, while two soulless, lightless, ghastly eyes, embedded in a green ooze——

My flesh quivers as I recall the supreme ecstasy of the horror of that unearthly gaze.

The old crone, who had flung open the portal as though I had been an expected and honored guest, led me, shaking with the ague of terror, along a series of gloomy passages. This by the aid of a solitary candle, which rather seemed to make the darkness more visible than to afford the necessary adjunct of light. The shadow upon the wall, as we silently traversed the corridors, seemed weird and witch-like, and singularly en rapport with the fever of my thoughts.

How closely I followed that old hag, the touch of her limp garments being priceless companionship.

A bright fire crackled in the huge grate of the oaken wainscoted room, into which she ushered me, and, although I leant over it until I could have fairly shrieked with pain, I could not touch the ice in my heart, the ice in my marrow, the ice in my soul.

Upon a small table, drawn cozily to the hearth, stood a decanter, labeled "Brandy," from which I poured about half a pint, draining it at a gulp. Then, and only then, did I muster up courage to gaze at the back of the hand that had been touched by the thing. Did that awful touch leave any mark? No; my hand, remarkably white, seemed whiter than usual. Was I, then, suffering from a spasm of overheated imagination? Had my senses for a brief interval become unhinged, and my mind loosened from its moorings? Had reasoning power been hurled from its throne, and had thought danced a wild measure in my hitherto unexcitable brain? All these questions I asked of myself, but no answer did I receive, save one.

"The presence is here—is with you. No effort of yours, mentally or physically, can free you."

With something akin to a shiver I perceived that the table was laid for two persons.

Surely the wretched old hag, who was busying herself with the fire, did not intend to plague me with her company. Humphrey Pallas had distinctly informed me that the Hall was untenanted, save by this woman, to whom his dead wife had taken a fancy.

Humphrey Pallas knew, too, that I was in no mood for company.

"You have laid the table for two persons," I shouted into the old woman's ears, for she was very deaf.

"Ees, I heave—that's right," with a hideous chuckle.

"Was the table laid for me?"

"Ees."

"Did you expect me?"

"The measter sent word that you was comin'."

"Is there anybody else coming?"

"Ees."

"Who?"

"One as won't be denied—one who is always here—Mister George Cavendish."

I reeled as if struck by a bullet!

The mention of my dead friend at such a moment! The mention of my dead friend in such a manner!

"Mr. George Cavendish is dead," I cried, hoarsely.

The old woman shook her head slowly from side to side, and, with a hideous leer, meant to convey that she was too wary to be deceived by so weak an invention, chuckled.

"No—no, sir; he beant dead. I seen him this very night," and, lowering her voice to a whining whisper, she added, "and I seen her."

"Her! Whom do you mean?" I cried.

This was the woman's reply:

"She was stannin' on the steps behind him when I let you in."

I sank into a chair. Those soulless eyes, floating in green ooze. That clammy clasp——

I was feebly struggling in an ocean of horrors, every wave dashing me on to the fire-laden shore of insanity.

I dare not question the hag any further—at least not yet.

The woman was sober.

"Remove those," I yelled, pointing to the extra knife and fork and plate.

"He's sure to be here," she mumbled, as she reluctantly carried out my order. "Dead, indeed! There's many alive that's thought to be dead, and many dead that's thought to be alive. And there be many out of their shrouds that ought to be in them, and there be some in them that ought to be hale and hearty and bonnie this awful night."

As she spoke, a gust of wind rattled every door and shutter in the old hall, while a moan, as of a lost soul upon receiving condemnation, made itself heard over the howling and whistling and clattering of the storm.

"Ay, ay, a bad night to be out o' doors. A bad night to be lying in the bottom of the pool amongst the rotten weeds, with horse-leeches twisting in your bonnie brown hair."

The woman was thinking aloud. Then, as if suddenly recalling time and place:

"Will you take your supper now, sir?"

I nodded assent. Anything to get rid of her. Even my own eddying thoughts were preferable to such weird companionship. Supper? I could not have eaten a mouthful to have saved ten thousand lives.

"That's your bedroom—the sheets are well-aired and laundried. They was at the fire all day yesterday, and all day to-day."

She pointed to a door at the extremity of the apartment, a massive oaken door, black as ebony, and overladen with grotesque carving. It resembled the entrance to a vault. The room which I occupied was low-ceilinged but very spacious, with an oaken floor, and wainscoted in oak; the furniture was of the same material. Over the gaping fireplace a small mirror, in an elaborately carved oaken frame, stretching its ornamentation all over the panel, reflected the sepulchral light of a moderator-lamp.

A few portraits adorned the walls, and a well-worn Turkey carpet covered the greater portion of the floor. There were two doors to the apartment, one by which I had entered, the other leading to the bedroom.

The brandy was doing good work, and the blazing fire was aiding and abetting it. As I tasted the one, and gazed at the other, I commenced to almost to realize that the recent horrors were but the outcome of an imagination rendered morbid by grief, coming upon overwork, and I played the realities of the present against the dim unrealization of the immediate past. For a moment I thought of returning to London, but the idea of having to pass through the terrible darkness of the avenue dispelled the intention, while an angry howl of the wind, and the fierce pattering of rain on the window-pane, told me it would be worse than folly to think of stirring upon a night when even a dog would not be turned adrift.

"Pshaw!" I cried, aloud. "What has come over you, John Hallowes? Are you mad, or drunk, or dreaming? Are you awake, man? You have all that you have been sighing for. A lonely Christmas in a lonely old house. Pit into the situation, and make yourself at home!"

Upon opening my carpet-bag, for the purpose of taking out my slippers, I discovered that it was soaked with rain. The wet had penetrated, and such articles as happened to lie towards the outer edges were considerably damped. Amongst these the packet of papers belonging to my dead friend. I instantly hastened to dry the packet, and for that purpose placed it tenderly inside of the fender, but without loosening the string.

Some of the papers curled under the pressure of the heat. One of these would seem to have forced its way almost out of the bundle. I took up the packet for the purpose of thrusting it back into its proper place when the following words, written in George Cavendish's unmistakable hand, met my startled gaze.

"To be read by John Hallowes only, and to be destroyed by him the moment he has finished the perusal."

I plucked it from the packet. This paper was to be read by me, John Hallowes, and then destroyed instanter.

I resolved upon reading it there and then.

Oh, why did I break that seal?

Oh, why did not that icy, clammy, oozy hand intervene between me and that paper, and bear it beyond mortal reach?

A strange foreboding of evil smote me as I broke the seal. I was treading upon the verge of a precipice.

"To you, John Hallowes, I reveal the ghastly triumph of an unprincipled man over a weak, loving and defenseless woman."

These were the words with which the document commenced. These were the words which seared themselves on my brain.

Taking a gulp of the brandy, I pulled myself together and began to read.

"John Hallowes. I am about to tell you all—all, mind you. I write as the thoughts come to me. I attempt no style. I make no effort to shape my ideas. I take them rough-hewn out of the stone, yes the stone, which was once a beating, bounding, palpitating heart, full of red blood, full of the champagne of youth and of love.

"I shall extenuate nothing. I will not go in for special pleading. Special pleading will be of little use to me at the bar before which I shall have to defend myself from her impeachment. What I write is absolutely true. It is the confession of a dying—of a dead man.

"While you read this, John Hallowes, wherever you may be—in palace or hovel, on the mountain side or in the depths of the deepest mine, on railroad or steamboat, on horseback or on foot, in a crowd or alone, in the twilight or moonlight, I shall lean over your shoulder and read it with you, paragraph by paragraph, line by line, word by word."

Merciful heaven! I felt those soulless orbs peering over my frozen body. That clammy, oozy hand stretched forth to turn the page with mine, and yet I must read on.

"John Hallowes, you know the Haymarket Theatre. You know the stage-entrance in Suffolk Place. My friends, the Kendals, were playing in 'Pygmalion and Galatea.' I had accepted an invitation to sup with them, and to take a seat in their brougham to their villa at Kensington. The House of Commons clock had just rung out eleven as I passed up Suffolk Place. I preferred to finish my cigar in the quiet moonlight to entering the hot, unwholesome, saw-dusty, gassy, orange-peely atmosphere of the theatre.

"Would to God I had never learned to smoke! To the cigar I was then carelessly puffing, I—but I shall tell my story by its own detail.

"A young girl came out of the theatre. I see her now—ay, see, John Hallowes—at this very instant, standing in the doorway, with the light of the moon altering her all too lovely face. She pauses to fasten a glove-button with a girlish grace all her own. The button resists, she makes a delicious moue as she struggles with it. She conquers, and smiles as she turns into the street. A man is slouching near at hand—a well-dressed man—in a shiny hat and Poole-cut clothes. He accosts her. She endeavors to pass. He persists. She stands perfectly still.

"'If you were a gentleman,' she cries in hot anger, 'you would not insult an unprotected girl!'

"'Bah!' he retorts, 'our acquaintance must begin somehow.'

"'I desire no acquaintanceship with you.'

"'But I insist that you and I shall be good friends. I am Lord Arthur Fredhaven.'

"'Am I free to pass, my lord?' she says, with quiet dignity, 'or am I to return to the theatre?'

"'You'll come and take some champagne with me, Katie Delane. All pretty girls love champagne.'

"He snatches her hand and attempts to draw it beneath his arm.

"An uncontrollable impulse seized upon me—an unendurable fire of anger blazed up in my heart.

"I sprang forward.

"'Unhand the young lady,' I fiercely whispered.

"He turned and faced me.

"'Who the deuce are you?'

"'I am George Cavendish—barrister, Middle Court, Temple, Lord Arthur Fredhaven. Miss Delane, may I offer you my arm?'

"She was trembling violently.

"'Do not be alarmed,' I whispered. 'It's only cads who insult women.'

"We turned into Suffolk Street, from there into the Haymarket, and on till we struck Piccadilly.

"'You have come quite far enough with me, Mr. Cavendish,' she said. 'I am quite safe, now.'

"'Are you? Don't look round, but a hansom has followed us from the Haymarket, and I've no doubt my Lord Arthur Fredhaven is snugly ensconced inside; so, you see, I am bound to escort you to your residence.'

"'It is awfully far; Knightsbridge.'

"'A charming walk, and such a night, Miss Delane.'

"We chatted gayly, as we lounged along, and the girl told me the outline of her life.

"Her father was dead. Her mother was dependent upon her late husband's father, a well-to-do auctioneer, for support for herself and three girls, of whom 'Katy' was the eldest. She had received but an indifferent education, and was now but seventeen. The manager of the theatre was intimate with her grandfather, from whom he hired drawing-room and library suits of furniture for stage sets. These business relations caused the auctioneer to visit the theatre pretty often, and, when in good-humor, he would take his granddaughter, whom he employed as a polisher in his warehouse, both before and behind the curtain. Katy Delane soon became known to the employees of the theatre, and was allowed access to the stage, where it was her habit to stand at the wings, devouring the performance, actors, actresses, properties, everything.

"I found the girl naive and natural to a degree; light-hearted, and her heart of seventeen full of the sunshine of life in the bud.

"Lord Fredhaven had addressed her but a few nights before.

"'I was standing at the prompter's side,' she said, 'and watching Madge Robertson as Galatea coming to life—isn't she exquisite?—when this man came beside me, and commenced staring at me till I felt my cheeks actually burning. I din't even look at him, but left the wing and went up another entrance. I was alone here, and the fellow followed me. He said something, I don't know what, but one of the fly-men came to speak to me and he sloped off. When I went back to the prompt-wing I saw him in a stage-box with a lot of others, and he put up his glass and kept it there ever so long. But I held to my post, and just showed him that I wasn't going to lose my evening's amusement by his impertinence. As I was leaving the theatre, he was in the passage leading to the stage-door. 'Good-night,' he said, thrusting a piece of paper into my hand. I flung it away and ran like a redshank down Suffolk Place, nor did I stop till I reached Burlington House, thinking he might be after me.'

"Mrs. Delane resided in a shabby little house in a squalid street.

"'Won't you come in, and see mamma? She always sits up for me,' said Katy, as she rang at the rickety bell.

"I was left no option, for the door opened ere I could say yea or nay.

"'Come in, Mr. Cavendish,' she said. 'Mamma, this gentleman escorted me home, for that nasty fellow—he turns out to be a lord—that I was telling you about, stopped me near the theatre, and was very impertinent: and if Mr. Cavendish had not been there, he would have been more so: but I would have,' she doubled up a dainty little fist and clinched her pearly teeth, 'pounded him well, thumped him black and blue. Oh, I would, Mr Cavendish,' nodding her head vigorously.

"'That theatre is no place for you, Katie,' observed her mother, a tall, thin, faded woman, without an ounce of will.

"'Why, it's the only place for me, mamma,' retorted the girl. 'It's the only place I can hear music, I can see acting, I can have real amusement. I rub, rub, rub ricketty old furniture all day till my arms feel ready to drop off, and if I hadn't passages from plays to run over, and the hope of seeing a lot more, I think I would take a dose of French polish and go varnished up to heaven.'

"'She is very self-willed, but very good, sir,' sighed Mrs. Delane, as Katie smothered her in kisses. 'She can do with me as she likes, and she knows it. I wish she had some one to whom she would——'

"'Love, honor, and obey! Thank you, mamma. Not just yet, if you please.' courtesying to the earth, and turning to me. 'That's the way Marie Wilton courtesies in the minuet in the "School for Scandal." Isn't she lovely? Oh, if I could be Marie Wilton or Madge Robertson! But I have no talent for anything,' adding, with a light laugh, 'not even for French polishing.'

"Katie came to the doorstep with me.

"'I like you,' she exclaimed, in her own naïve way, 'and, oh, yes, I'd like to see you again. If I never see you, my heart won't break, and yours is nineteenth century—stern stuff.'

"John Hallowes, as I walked back to the Temple that night, Katie Delane's bright, beautiful, young face confronted me like that glorious portrait, by Sir Joshua, of Kitty Fisher, one which you and I have hung together, and raved and gushed over. I see Katie Delane now—ay, at this very instant! Look at her exquisite, oval face! Look at the dark-brown hair drawn tight from the ivory forehead, fair as May-blossoms. Look at those blush-gray eyes, set wide apart like those of a child, with a tinge of violet! Mark the bashful yet wild look, full of innocent joy and startled love! See that delicate nose, so piquante in its retroussé, those pink, tenderly-carved nostrils! Do you see that mouth? Look at those rich, moist, warm lips—the upper one curling in laughter or scorn, the under one pouting demurely, and all so temptingly! There are teeth! The pearl that Cleopatra dissolved for Antony's sake never was whiter or more lustrous than those teeth! And what a chin! how rounded! how dimpled! Did you ever behold such a type of fresh, piquant loveliness?"

I could almost realize the picture. I knew that he was gazing at it while I read. The letter seemed on fire! Nevertheless, I read on.

"Yes, John Hallowes, I thought of Katie Delane all the way to the Temple, and day was dawning over the stone marked Oliver Goldsmith as I entered my chambers. Upon the following morning I passed and repassed the furniture warerooms of Thomas Delane, and in my mind's eye conjured the naïve girl—her white rounded arm, bare to the elbow, engaged in the dreary and unsympathetic slavery of polishing second-hand furniture into first-class shininess.

"One night—it might have been a week or perhaps ten days—after my first meeting with Katie Delane, I again encountered her, and this time behind the scenes.

"She blushed a rosy red as I took her hand, and I kept that hand in mine; nor did she attempt to withdraw it for some little time, and then it was with a jerk as though the idea suddenly smote her that my hand was not the fitting nest for hers.

"'Are you for a walk to-night?' I asked, as the curtain slowly descended.

"'I don't mind.'

"Again I escorted her home. Again she filled my thoughts as I walked back to the Temple—filled them, John Hallowes, till I brought myself face to face with the picture, and calmly asked 'Whither?'

"I am a Cavendish, of the ducal house of Devonshire. My mother is the daughter of Earl de Grey; my brother is married to an Essex; my sister to a Grosvenor. We are sangre azul to the tips of our fingers, and no mésalliance has sullied the stream of purple blood since we came to the front.

"Could I marry this girl?

"Impossible.

"Then why——

"Why what?—I asked of the devil in my nature and of my conscience; and the devil in my nature—the devil who has dragged me down to hell—hell, John Hallowes, laughed the laugh of Mephistopheles.

"I resolved not to see Katie Delane, and accepted a fishing invitation in Ireland.

"Upon my return, I found amongst my many letters, one which sent a strange thrill through my heart.

"I knew that it was from the girl whom I had at least done something to avoid.

"'DEAR MR. CAVENDISH (it ran)—Why do you never come to the theatre? I want to ask your advice. Do not blame me for writing. Pshaw! I do not care whether you do or not.

"'Yours, KATIE.'

"This letter was four weeks old. Would I reply to it? Why not let her surprise at remaining unanswered turn into anger, anger to contempt?

"It were better——

"Why, on the other hand, humiliate and insult this girl. She might be sorely in need of friendly counsel. Perhaps this Lord Frodhaven had been renewing his audacious and infamous proposals, and her heart had bidden her call upon me to again come to the rescue.

"I turned the question over—debated it in my own mind, and in cold blood finally resolved upon letting our acquaintance go by default. It was a momentary struggle, decided by the arrival of a brief in a very important case—you will recall the case, John Hallowes—Bodfin versus Thistlethank, Queen's Bench.

"For two days I crammed, and on the morning of the third drove to Westminster Hall. As the hansom was dashing down Whitehall I saw Katie Delane walking rapidly in the direction of Trafalgar Square. My heart leaped into my throat. A block took place, compelling vehicles to go at a walk, and as she passed she glanced into the hansom. She started violently, grew deadly pale, looked me full in the face, and cut me dead. I reached Westminster in a state of fever, and how I got through the case is still a puzzle to me. Her pale face and reproachful, yet haughty, eyes, were before me in the Lord Chief Justice, in the jury, in the witnesses and the spectators.

"I dined, or, rather, I pretended to dine, that night at the Club, and eight o'clock found me at the Haymarket Theatre.

"She came in about nine o'clock, and took up her accustomed place at the prompt entrance.

"God! how my heart beat as I approached her.

"'How do you do, Miss Delane?' I palpitated.

"She started.

"How pale and thin and anxious she looked.

"'Did you receive a note from me?' she demanded, in a quick, brusque tone.

"'I did.'

"'And you didn't answer it?"

"And, ere I could interfere by word or act, she had turned on her heel and had disappeared.

"I started after her.

"'Has Miss Delane left the theatre?' I asked of the stage doorkeeper.

"'This instant, sir.'

"I dashed down Suffolk Place, and came up with her as she was turning into Suffolk Street.

"'Miss Delane!' I said.

"'Well,' she cried, stopping abruptly, and facing me.

"'I have been away, and——'

"'But you got my letter.'

"'Only on Tuesday morning.

"'Why did—— Pshaw! Good-night, Mr. Cavendish,' and she turned from me.

"Why did I not let her go? Oh, why did I not let her go on her way, John Hallowes, and why did I not go upon mine?

"The devil had me, body and soul, when my right foot stepped one pace down Suffolk Street.

"I followed her.

"'Miss Delane, I will not allow you to leave me until I explain——'

"'I require no explanation.'

"I do not know what I said. I know that I found Katie Delane's hand in mine, and that she was sobbing bitterly—sobbing as if her heart would break.

"Observing that we were being noticed—this occurred in Suffolk Street—I drew her hand in my arm and turned away.

"'I want to speak to you,' she suddenly exclaimed, after a silence. 'I wrote asking your advice. You must advise me. Mamma is the puppet of grandpapa, so are my sisters. I am to a certain extent, but no further. Mr. Cavendish, grandpapa insists upon my marrying.'

"A subtle sense of relief came to me, a sort of reprieve. A light shone brightly, ever so brightly, afar off, over the troubled waters of my heart. The goal was in sight—I was safe.

"Yes, John Hallowes, as God has judged me ere this, and all hope is burnt out in hell fire, I felt a thrill of startled ecstasy when the girl uttered these words. She relied upon me to advise her, and my resolve was taken instanter.

"'And it is about the best thing you can do, ma mignonne,' I exclaimed, in a tone of half-banter.

"'You say this to——Listen!' and pressing my arm heavily, she went on: 'The man grandpapa wants me to marry is a slim, sleek, canting, sniffing, fair-haired, long-nosed fellow. He reminds me of Stiggins, in "Pickwick." Oh, my! that's the very creature he's like,' and the volatile girl burst into a merry peal of laughter, again and again repeated.

"Somehow or other the laughter jarred upon me. It told me that her heart was not buried 'full fathoms five.' That it needed no very deep diving to reach it. And yet she was only seventeen, when life is like a Spring shower—sunshine through tears.

"'He must have some redeeming quality,' I suggested.

"'Not one—except his money.'

"I employed all the argument of which I was master in an endeavor to induce her to consider before she absolutely rejected this offer. I pictured the result of a refusal.

"Our interview ended thus:

"'I will not marry Stiggins—I swear it. Nothing will induce me. I'd work for mamma and my sisters, but I will not marry that creature—anybody. Good-by.'

"John Hallowes, I was now more in love with Katie Delane than ever, and the question that wove itself with every waking thought was, 'Why not marry her! why not marry her?'

"You remember, my friend, a dinner-party in Brook Street, to which you were invited? You remember that pink-faced doll, Lady Laura Egerton, the second daughter of the Marquis of Abergeldie, who sat opposite you? You chaffed me about her in the smoking-room afterwards. That girl was carefully destined for me by my lady mother. Fortune, family, a pocket-borough in the gift of her father—everything for a rising junior. I flirted, or rather tried to flirt, with Lady Laura, while my very heart-beat was with Katie Delane. I resolved upon traveling the course laid out for me by my family, to extinguish love's light in the lurid glare of ambition, and seize the golden fruit, when I should still have been eating of the green.

"Marry Katie Delane! Impossible! In the first place, there is the difference in social position. Pshaw! did not King Cophetua wed a beggar-maid. My plea was scattered to the winds Then came her antecedents. Could she account to me for her life from fifteen to the present day. Any man who marries must take four or five years of his bonâfide life for granted. It may or may not be a sealed book to him. It may prove a virgin page. It may be smirched by fair flirtation. It may—but why go on. I was between two fires—love and ambition. Love's fire blazed brightly, albeit a little too luridly; while ambition's burnt calmly, suffusing a dull but soothing warmth.

"I again resolved upon avoiding Katie Delane; but, in order to put a break upon the shock of separation, went twice or three times a week to Covent Garden, where I purchased a bunch of violets for her, a flower of which she was passionately fond, and forwarded them to the shabby little house at Knightsbridge.

"Ah! it was a ghastly fever all this. Ambition tugging at my brain—love tugging at my heart.

"And now, John Hallowes, comes the hour, the striking of which doomed my soul to everlasting perdition. I was alone in my chambers. It was near midnight. I was seated in my easy-chair, gazing into the dying embers. I was thinking of her. The wind shrieked and moaned and sought through the dreary and desolate courts of the Temple—shrieked like souls being thrust down, down, down to undying flame.

"A pause in the storm. A knock at my door. I sprang to my feet, a strange warning voice whispering at my heart.

"I flung wide the portal.

"There, dripping with rain, hatless, her glorious hair all over her shoulders, her violet eyes aflame, her tender mouth parted as with a great fear, stood Katie Delane.

"I was to have been married to-night,' she moaned as I led her quivering like an aspen towards the fire, 'but I ran away this morning and—and—I came to you. I have no one else in the world that—that—I care to—' and here she burst into a fit of hysterical weeping."

I, John Hallowes, had proceeded thus far, and was about to continue the perusal, when a shadow as of some person endeavoring to read over my shoulders fell upon the paper.

A delirium of awful fear seized me!

He was in the room! He was standing behind my back!

Oh, for power to shriek!

Merciful heaven—that ocay hand!

Merciful heaven—those soulless eyes!

* * * * *

I became unconscious. When I recovered my senses I was lying upon the hearthrug. The fire had burnt itself out; but luckily, the lamp seemed still full of vitality. With a fearful, shuddering gaze I slowly peered round the room, expecting to encounter I knew not what of horror.

The portraits frowned grimly from the walls. The dark wainscot looked darker, but he was not to be seen. The shadow was from out the room.

Carefully as the starving, shipwrecked mariner reckons his few remaining biscuits, did I examine the condition of the oil in the lamp, and calculated with feelings almost akin to rapture that it would burn to daydawn. Heaping such fuel as I could lay my hands on upon the fire, and finding it unendurably cold—my veins laden with ice, and chilled to the very marrow, I resolved upon turning into bed, without, however, divesting myself of any of my clothes.

Carefully placing George Cavendish's confession in my bosom—I dared read no further—and grasping the lamp in my left hand, I advanced towards the vault-like door, which gave upon my bedroom. I threw it open with a sudden jerk. The apartment was small and wainscoted like the adjoining one. In one corner stood a gloomy-looking, old-fashioned, four-post bedstead, with a heavy canopy and faded silk curtains; in another, a ponderous wardrobe, elaborately carved. The ceiling, representing some event in mythological history, was black with age, and the ebony furniture seemed fitted for the innermost torture-chamber of the Inquisition.

I flung myself onto the bed, where in a few minutes the extreme cold from which I had been suffering exchanged itself for a burning, feverish heat.

To endeavor to sleep was simply a mockery.

Why not finish the perusal of George Cavendish's confession?

I would.

Taking the document from my breast, I drew the table upon which the lamp stood, more closely to the bed. I read the well-known opening words, but ere my eyes could take up the thread of the narrative, the lamp was slowly extinguished.

The agony of being left in the darkness was something terrible. The horror of feeling that the light had been quenched by supernatural agency—that awful link between dead and living, that gulf in whose unfathomable depths lay the secret never yet divulged—was exquisitely appalling.

Like a terrified child, I was about burying my head beneath the bedclothes, when, with a bound, every sense of which I was still in possession concentrated itself in that of sight. My bed faced the door communicating with the room in which I had spent the earlier portion of the night.

That door slowly opened.

The outer apartment was brilliantly illuminated, not by fire, or lamp, or candle, but by a greenish-gray light—a light so ghastly, yet so brilliant, as both to dazzle and to sicken.

Every object in the room stood forth in extraordinary distinctness. The table upon which the supper-tray had lately stood had been replaced by an elegant fauteuil; a small bunch of violets lay upon the floor. I could have counted the petals.

Was I dreaming?

No.

My heart stood still. I felt that the curtain had only risen upon the mystery; that there was yet much to follow.

Clasping the bedclothes with the clutch of a drowning man, and with eyeballs starting from their burning sockets, I awaited the dénouement.

Although my eyes were riveted upon the interior of the outer room, so that no movement, however slight, could, by any possibility, escape me, a female form burst into being, even while I gazed.

She did not walk or glide into the apartment. She absolutely burst, as it were, upon my sight. Her back was turned towards me, and her svelte form was the very perfection of symmetry.

Suddenly, and as if perceiving the bunch of violets upon the carpet, she stooped forward, and, rapidly lifting, pressed them thrice to her lips, and then, whilst tenderly placing them in her dress, she turned her face towards me.

It was Katie Delane!

An exquisite face, the dark brown hair drawn tight from the ivory forehead, fair as a May-blossom; bluish-gray eyes and wide apart like those of a child, with a tinge of violet, bashful yet wild, full of innocent mirth and loving confidence. A delicate nose, slightly retroussé; a short, curling, upper lip, its companion rich, ripe, demure and pouting. Teeth of pearl, and a charmingly rounded chin. I see that face now. I shall see that face even when the hand of death is slowly glazing my eyes. Would that I had never beheld it, even in the adorable freshness of its piquante beauty!

She seated herself upon the fauteuil, and from her anxious glances in the direction of the door, and her heaving bosom and changing of color, it was evident that she awaited the advent of some expected person.

A cloud of anxiety would pass across her fair brow, and the lustrous eyes close as it from a throb of mental anguish, whilst her tiny white hands would continually clasp themselves in that nervous pressure by which even strong men, with impassive countenances, betray their inward emotions.

Quicker than thought, the form of a man presented itself. He was tall and slight. He leant his head upon his arms, which he placed against the mantelpiece, and gazed down into the fire; his back was turned to the girl, and his face was hidden from me by his elbows. The girl started to her feet and timidly approached him, touching him gently as if to induce him to turn to her. He repulsed her with a shrug. She appeared to address him (no sound reached me) earnestly, beseechingly, with all her heart, with all her soul, yet he turned not. She plucked the bunch of violets from her bosom, and in a frenzy of passion cast them into the fire, yet he turned not. She flung herself upon her knees, and with an expression of agony such as the human countenance only assumes in the supremest extremity of mental woe, pleaded to him.

Was it for life? Was it for that which should be dearer than life? God forbid! for there was that in the shrug of the man's shoulder which quenched out for ever the slightest glimpse of hope.

She rose slowly, and with despair enveloping every feature as plainly discernible as the writing on the wall, turned from him and was gone. He still retained the same position, his arms against the mantelpiece, his gaze directed down to the fire. He moved his foot backwards and forwards upon the steel bar of the fender, and then——

Yes, and then he turned, and his eyes met mine—fully, fixedly. My heart gave one beat backwards—my brain was on fire!

The man was George Cavendish!

* * * * *

There was something yet to come! Once more I pulled my quivering nerves together for a supreme effort.

The scene had changed—changed as silently and imperceptibly as fade the colors in the rainbow. The light was more subdued; the fauteuil was replaced by a table—upon the table lay a bundle covered by a sheet.

The same man, or spectre, or demon, stood beside the table. His hair was dishevelled as if he had clutched it in a paroxysm of the wildest passion. His eyes were sunken in their sockets, and encircled by black rings with inner circles of a purple-red. His cheeks were livid, and his blue lips drawn tight showed his white teeth standing out like the skeleton ribs of some animal which had been picked bare by birds of prey.

The man, or spectre, or demon, raised a corner of the sheet, and shudderingly cast a hurried glance beneath it.

Slowly, very slowly, and with averted gaze, he removed the entire covering, as if compelled to do so by some invisible power.

Upon that table lay a dead body—the body of a woman—the body of Katie Delane!

Dead—dead—dead!

Her long brown hair hung in massive tresses over the edge of the table, almost sweeping the floor. Her beautifully-formed hands were clinched, as if the agony of death had been exquisitely bitter. Her violet-blue eyes were wide open, staring upwards, and the white lips, drawn tightly together, seemed as though she had endeavored to suppress the shriek which would have been her farewell to her gay life.

But why did her garments cling so closely to her faultless form? Why did every limb, every curve and contour of the beautiful frame reveal itself? Why did something drip, drip, drip, from her hair, her clothes, like the tick, tick, tick, of the death watch?

It wasn't blood. It was water.

The body, as I subsequently learned, had been found in the inky pool at the edge of the wood. She had committed self-destruction. Hurling her soul from her, with one bound she had leaped into the valley of the shadow of death.

Poor lost child, that last look of despair was easily translated—that superiority of anguish, that climax of unutterable, unfathomable, illimitable woe.

The man, spectre, or demon, turned and gazed at the body of his victim. Remorse was gnawing at his heart.

Heart! Where was his heart when that fair young girl had besought of him to restore that to her which, through him and his devilish fascination, she had forfeited? Where was his heart when, in abject humiliation, she flung herself upon her knees at his feet in that very chamber, and prayed for the miserable, pitiful boon of a single loving word? Where was his heart when he allowed her to go from him to her doom, repaying her life, love, her lost honor, her blanched soul, with a gesture of contempt?

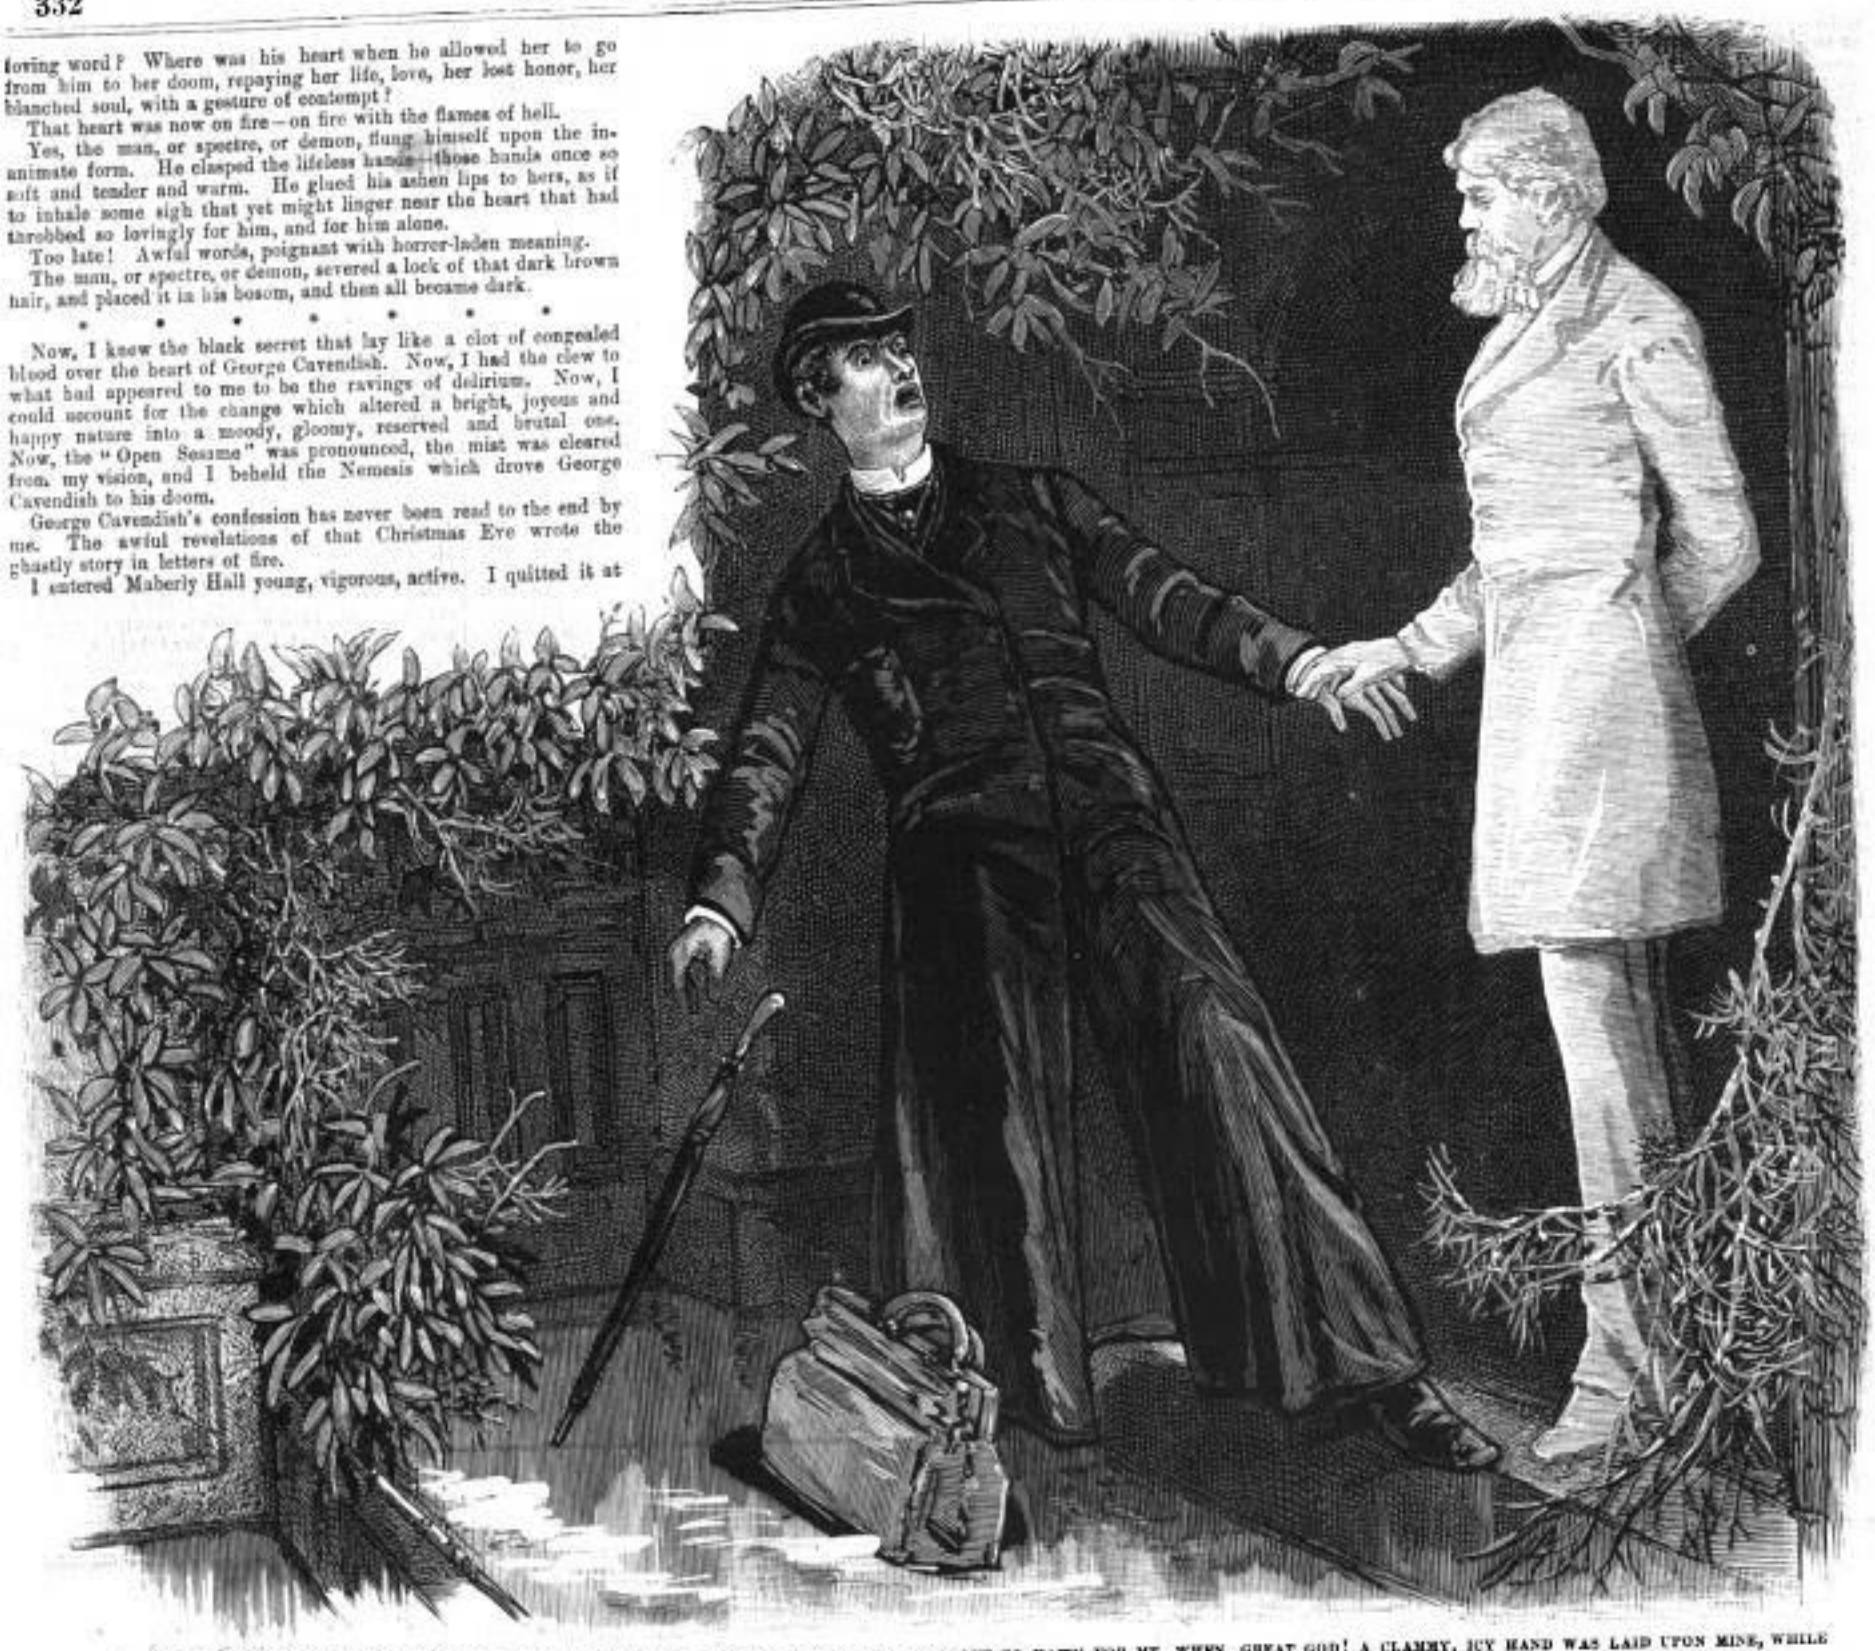
That heart was now on fire—on fire with the flames of hell.

Yes, the man, or spectre, or demon, flung himself upon the inanimate form. He clasped the lifeless hands—those hands once so soft and tender and warm. He glued his ashen lips to hers, as if to inhale some sigh that yet might linger near the heart that had throbbed so lovingly for him, and for him alone.

Too late! Awful words, poignant with horror-laden meaning.

The man, or spectre, or demon, severed a lock of that dark brown hair, and placed it in his bosom, and then all became dark.

* * * * * * *



Now, I knew the black secret that lay like a clot of congealed blood over the heart of George Cavendish. Now, I had the clew to what had appeared to me to be the ravings of delirium. Now, I could account for the change which altered a bright, joyous and happy nature into a moody, gloomy, reserved and brutal one. Now, the "Open Sesame" was pronounced, the mist was cleared from my vision, and I beheld the Nemesis which drove George Cavendish to his doom.

George Cavendish's confession has never been read to the end by me. The awful revelations of that Christmas Eve wrote the ghastly story in letters of fire.

I entered Maberly Hall young, vigorous, active. I quitted it at day-dawn, aged, sapless, withered, having lived a life, ay, a thousand lives, in a few horror-laden hours.

When I close my eyes at night the spectral scene presents itself with all its appalling details, and the words engraven upon my very soul haunt every waking moment:

"To you, John Hallowes, I reveal the ghastly triumph of an unprincipled man over a weak, loving and defenseless woman."

A GHASTLY REVELATION.—"THE LAST BOLT HAD DRAWN BACK, AND THE DOOR WAS ABOUT TO YAWN FOR ME, WHEN, GREAT GOD! A CLAMMY, ICY HAND WAS LAID UPON MINE, WHILE TWO SOULLESS, LIGHTLESS, GHASTLY EYES, EMBEDDED IN A GREEN OOZE——"—SEE PAGE 330.

A GHASTLY REVELATION.—"SHE FLUNG HERSELF UPON HER KNEES, AND WITH AN EXPRESSION OF AGONY PLEADED TO HIM."

OR,

Gilbert Romaine's Christmas Gift.

By AMANDA M. DOUGLAS.

"IT is a sad thing for you and yours, no doubt; but, after all, it is the old, old story. When a man or a boy commits a crime, he knows that he renders himself liable to punishment, and he means to evade it if he can. Still, he takes the risk and he must abide by it. There has been too much maudlin sympathy with criminals of every stamp. Mercy is a very good thing in its way, but justice comes first. I shall let the law take its course. If this story of yours should impress a judge or jury in your brother's favor, well and good. Now, go away and do not bother me any more about it. Not a man on the street but knows that Gilbert Romaine means exactly what he says."

With that Mr. Romaine waved away the suppliant, a rather shabby girl of sixteen or thereabouts, and turned to his books. She left the warm, cozy private office, and seemed to step out into an iceberg of a world, so cold was her soul and her shivering body. How could she go home and tell them that her errand had been in vain, her last frail hope?

There was a little flurry of snow in the air, and the wind seemed to bite and sting. Shop-windows were frosted over, though it was but mid-afternoon, and there were but few people in the streets. Still, the clumps of evergreens at the corners, suggestive of Christmas trees and merriment, sent out an odorous fragrance, and clusters of scarlet berries served to brighten the gray atmosphere.

What did she care. Oh, how passionately she had hoped to take this bit of good cheer home to the others. She had a dim, hazy idea that if Mr. Romaine forgave and withdrew the charge, Tom might come out of the shameful prison, and in some way be clear and free. He had not forged a note—if the whole world said so, still she would believe him guiltless of that intent. Oh, how could she go home, how could she dance to-night with these leaden feet? And there was Mr. Romaine, in his warm, pretty office, with the pot of purple violets on his desk, with everything the world could give, and yet so coldly cruel, so pitiless. "And to-morrow will be Christmas!" sobbed the child.

A GHASTLY REVELATION.—"WHEN I RECOVERED MY SENSES I WAS LYING UPON THE HEARTHRUG. THE FIRE HAD BURNED ITSELF OUT."

Gilbert Romaine bit his lip and drew his brow into a little frown. What was there about the girl—but after all, right was right, and unchangeable. The world was drifting faster over to dishonesty every day, there were defaulters, and thieves and forgers—yes, he certainly was right, and he turned resolutely to his books.

Conyers, the bookkeeper, was going off on a holiday to visit his motherless children in a little country town with their grandmother. He came in now, as he must leave to catch the train.

"Take this to them, Conyers," he said, handing him two crisp ten-dollar notes.

"Thank you, Mr. Romaine; there will be some happy hearts to-night. The books are all in the safe."

The two men bowed to each other in a polite and kindly way.

The twilight dropped down early. Business was through, and Mr. Romaine told the porter to close up, though it was but half-past four. He handed the two younger clerks an envelope himself, and wished them a "Merry Christmas." That was their reward for honesty. If Mr. Romaine was strict and stern with all forms of wrong-doing, he was not a hard master.

Then he put on his handsome velvet beaver, with its seal collar and cuffs, and his warm gloves, and uttered a courteous good-night. Now, the stores were all brightly illuminated, and the children's revel was just beginning. There were gay, glad voices, ringing laughs, questions, answers—here a boy ran against him with a sled, on the other side some one squeaked a toy animal; little girls, with arch, merry faces, not minding the bitter wind that now and then played a prank with a pedestrian's hat or tore apart some poor woman's shawl. He usually took the horse-car, but to-night he walked along the busy street, watching and listening in an unusual mood. How many people there were in the world—how many children—and he, Gilbert Romaine, had none of kith or kin to ask in for a Christmas Feast. Was there not something somewhere about searching the highways and finding the lame and the halt? Why, if he had thought of it he might have given a little feast to—well, the bootblacks or the crossing-sweepers, or send some turkeys to the Children's Home, and make a few happy hearts.

Where did that girl go? he wondered. Her mother was sick and there was some little children, and Tom Wynne was in prison—her brother. He might have inquired where they lived, he might have—were they very poor? he wondered. He would learn something about them on Friday, when he went back to the store.

He turned into a quiet street where there was no glare of shop windows. Ah, how keen and nipping the wind blew! Overhead, in a dull-blue rift, a few wintry stars began to shine. On and on, around this corner, past the church a square or two, and he let himself in a quiet, aristocratic-looking house with his latch-key.

Ah, how lovely, how warm! Hebe here in the hall had her hands full of flowers—heliotrope, spice pinks and tea-roses. He took off his coat, he rubbed his hands, as he lingered a moment over the register. Then he entered the room across the lower end of the hall, and uttered a long breath of satisfaction.

A fire of cannel coal burned in the grate. It was a handsomely-appointed library, with books, pictures, two or three well-chosen statuettes and some bronzes. A white wolf-skin was thrown over the arm of the lounge, a soft Turkish rug glowed in the light of the fire, the curtains of delicate gray, with little flecks of crimson, swept the floor.

On his table lay three parcels and two notes, gifts and invitations to a Christmas dinner. He smiled a little over them, then his own dinner-bell rang, and he went down to his solitary feast.

Such a commonplace, uneventful life as his had been! A poor widow struggling along, supporting herself with her needle and training her little son in virtuous, gentlemanly ways. Then an uncle asking her to come and be his housekeeper, and they two still living quietly; presently, on the death of the old man, falling heir to the house, living on and on, having one bright, passionate, absorbing dream that went out in ashes; prospering in business, losing youth, caring little for society, making no change until the sweet, grave mother drops out of life.

Seven years before he had come to this house which he had planned and furnished to his taste. He was rich enough now for anything. Women of all ages smiled upon him, invited him to their houses, were sweet, gracious, captivating, yet here he was at seven-and-thirty, and for the first time in many years he experienced a peculiar feeling of loneliness. What had he done with his life, except to make money? Given a little here and there, helped a few business friends in time of trouble, surrounded himself with much that was exquisite and satisfying, and yet——

When his dinner was through he came back to the library and lighted his cigar. The bleak night was securely shut out and arrogantly defied by the ruddy blaze of the coal and the soft radiance of the Argand burner. He glanced at the picture over the mantel, through the dazzle of the blaze and the twilight of cigar-smoke. A young girl, with a bright fleecy shawl about her, the white shapely throat and one shoulder visible, but the outline shaded a trifle by two or three pale golden curls, and dark brown velvety eyes glancing shyly from under long lashes. He had stumbled over it in an artist's studio, and bought it because it looked like her.

The church-bell began to ring. He had half a mind to leave this tempting fireside and go round there—kneel as he used to when a little boy, listen to the prayers and the chants and help with Christmas greens. He had seen her first there one Christmas Eve—he was only a lad and she a slim young girl, blushing so easily, smiling with a curious shy sweetness, and with a voice the like of which he had never heard since.

Then he started suddenly, stared at the picture like one dazed, and remembered as a past vision sometimes comes to us with sudden force and vividness. The girl of this afternoon—Tom Wynne's sister—pshaw! what made him think of that? Her eyes were brown, to be sure; lustrous, pleading, tender, and now he recalled the straight, haughty nose, the small mouth and dimpled chin. It was so unlike Tom's rather broad, ordinary-looking countenance, and her manners—a certain indefinable air—oh, what folly! Was he dreaming? The warmth and the vaporous wreath of smoke, and the old bygones had set him astray.

A sharp, vigorous ring at the door-bell brought him back. He was the grave, sensible business man again.

"There is a person here who insists upon seeing you, sir," announced the well-trained James.

"On a begging expedition, no doubt. Stop, James. Inquire if it is for any children's home or——or dinner."

"I asked him, sir, and he said important business."

"Show him in, then."

A rather short, sharp, incisive-looking person, who seemed to peer a moment through the soft radiance and then concentrate his glance on the man before him, bowing briskly.

"Mr. Romaine, I believe."

Mr. Romaine returned the bow with leisurely indifference.

"I have some peculiar and important business with you," he began, nowise abashed by Gilbert Romaine's stately pride. "My time is brief, and I am used to getting at bottom facts as speedily as possible. In the year 18— you were living at 230 Willow Street——"

"Willow Place," corrected Mr. Romaine.

"Street or Place, I suppose it is all one"—rather impatiently. "Fifteen years ago this very night there was a child brought to you, a little girl—left on your stoop. What did you do with her?"

"A child?" Gilbert Romaine gasped. "You are altogether mistaken!"

"I am not mistaken. I have come from the bedside of the woman who brought her here to you, or, rather, where you were living then. You must have been a young man——"

"Do you dare make such a statement to my very face?" and Gilbert Romaine rose, white with indignation.

"Softly, sir, softly! There is nothing disreputable in all this. The child was born in honest wedlock, and, what is more to the purpose, is heiress to a considerable fortune. If she is dead, it goes to other heirs. Now, it was, no doubt, embarrassing to have a baby of a year old or so sent to you, young man as you were then, but my business is to learn what you did with it. If it is dead—well, one's loss is always another's gain, and some half-dozen other heirs will not object to such Christmas tidings, I take it."

LEFT ON A DOORSTEP.—"HARK! SOME ONE FLEW UP THE STEPS, TWO AT A TIME. THE DOOR WAS FLUNG OPEN. 'OH, MOTHER! KITTIE!' WITH A GLAD, GLAD CRY, 'I HAVE SEEN THE MAN WHO GAVE TOM THE CHECK!'"

"A most extraordinary story." Mr. Romaine had risen before, and now confronted the newcomer across the table, studying him with questioning eyes, doubtful of his sanity. "You tell me this child was sent to me, Gilbert Romaine! Pray, who were its parents?"

"Its father was a certain Richard Halford, supposed to be heir to a large fortune entailed as far as American fortunes can be. Unluckily the uncle lost his wife, married a young girl, and had a son, which sent Richard's claim to the dogs. But it died a year or so ago, and Dick is dead. 'His heirs or assigns'—the will reads—and we have learned that he was married. We have traced his wife, who ran away shortly after her child was born. You see the whole thing is a delightful muddle! I have found where she died, and the child was brought to you."

Gilbert Romaine pressed his hand to his forehead, then he stared hard at the man who was noting every expression of his face.

"The mother?" he said, with a long, hoarse breath.

"The mother's name was Ardella Clyde."

Romaine sank back into his chair, and shaded his eyes with his hand. Della Clyde? That old, sweet love who had suddenly played him false, whom he had cast out of his life and memory, save as he liked to study the picture yonder. A runaway wife dying, and her child, her little girl, sent to him. A Christmas gift! How strange it seemed! And yet it had never come to him.

There was a long silence, then he rose abruptly, the fine, healthful color gone out of his face, and his voice strangely tremulous.

"Let us go to her, this dying woman," he said, hurriedly. "There is some mistake. Would to God the child had come to me. Fifteen years ago," he sighed to himself. He and his mother were living alone in that unpretentious little house in Willow Place. And the child had gone somewhere—perhaps to an almshouse or foundlings' home—the child of the fair, sweet girl he had loved.

"Yes, let us go without further delay."

He began to bustle about in a dazed way, getting his coat and hat, while the man picked up a leather satchel he had placed on the library-table.

"It makes no difference, if we can prove that she is dead, you know," said he, carelessly. "Otherwise the estate must be fought over in Chancery until there is nothing more left of it than there was of the famed Kilkenny cats. My clients would prefer that she was safe in heaven, and we thought so until a day or two ago."

The words and tone grated upon every nerve. Gilbert Romaine shivered. Della Clyde's little girl swallowed up in the world's great vortex. She might be living this very Christmas Eve in want and sorrow and shame. And then the pitiful face, that had pleaded with him this afternoon so urgently, rose up before him. Tom Wynne's sister. He might have been a little kinder. Surely this was the season for "good will on earth."

"Come," he said, gruffly, holding open the hall-door, and paying no attention to what the man was saying.

They walked out together. Had there come a strange softness in the air? Surely the stars were out in myriads, and the sky a glittering blue. The man hailed a horse-car, and they rode back to the crowded part, out to the opposite section, and then there were a few blocks to walk. A row of dilapidated frame-buildings, one of which they entered, to find a warm and comfortable room, though very cheaply furnished.

A woman lay in the bed, evidently in the last stages of decline. Another sat by the stove, a clean, wholesome person, who was nurse and friend.

"This is the Mrs. Davis who carried the child to you that Christmas Eve. And this is the Mr. Romaine who declares it never came to him."

The woman raised on her elbow, and stared.

"I took it, sure as God is in heaven, to 230 Willow Street. I rang the bell and left it there, in a big basket. There was a note—she was an hour or two writing it, she was that weak. She couldn't put the name on the outside, but she said it would be all right."

Gilbert Romaine was thinking. He believed he had found the clew to the blunder.

"You said Willow Street, my good woman. Years ago there were Willow Street and Willow Place. An unhandsome jog divided them, but it has been straightened and widened, and lost its high-sounding title. It is all Willow Street now. But I lived in Willow Place then, with my mother."

"Yes, so she said," interrupting him. "A row of small brick houses, the third from the corner. I went out and found it by daylight—230, I am sure."

"You went to Willow Street," he groaned.

"So I told you," rather impatiently.

"You went to the wrong place. I never had the child," he said, in accents of anguish.

"Yet you are Gilbert Romaine."

"Did you ask for any one?"

"No, she told me not. She said you'd take it, and be good to it. You see her husband turned out that devilish she was afraid of him. Her aunt had coaxed her to marry him, thinking he was rich; then the other baby was born, and he was so mad about it he took to drink, and was a brute. She came to me—I had washed for her—and I kept her hid two months, but she was ailing all the time. Then she had bleeding at the lungs, two dreadful spells, the last one in the morning, when she wrote the note and told me what I was to do. And she died that night."

"My good woman, this gossip merely wastes our time," said the lawyer, sharply. "You think, then," turning to Romaine, and eying him suspiciously, "there was a mistake in the house? Do you know of any such neighborhood?"

"I can find it—come," he answered, abruptly. "I shall come back for the remainder of the story," nodding to the sick woman, who now began to cough violently.

"The deuce of a mystery about a young one!" began the man, grumblingly. "Why didn't the woman say she'd buried her with her mother? If I had seen her alone at first—— "

"You will find Della Halford's child, and restore her to her rightful place in the world," was the stern reply.

Daniel Carton smothered an oath. He wondered now that his astute brain had not planned an ending, only he had surely looked to find the child dead.

Back to the old shabby-genteel part of the city and Willow Street. There were rows of brick houses, and stores on nearly every corner.

"The numbers cannot have been much altered," commented Romaine. "You see, when they widened they went straight on from here—230 would be in the block above. The third house from the corner. We have that to guide us."

They found the place. But who lived there fifteen years ago was a profound mystery to the present tenants, who were collected in the front parlor putting up a Christmas-tree.

"But some one must know," declared Romaine. "Are there no old people in the vicinity?"

"You go down to the drug-store," said the oldest woman in the group, "Doctor Gates's mother owned some of this property. She'd be likely to know. Mrs. Gates—they live over the store."

"Thank you," said Romaine. "Is it too late?" glancing at Carton.

"While we're here we may as well look into it," was the rather gruff answer. "What would you give now to find the girl, honor bright? But, after all, she is nothing to you."

"She is something to me," in a deep, incisive tone. "Never fear. You shall be well paid for this night's work. Here we are."

Doctor Gates was in. His mother was home, a feeble, elderly woman, who seldom went abroad. If she was not in bed—but some cousins had come from a distance to keep Christmas, and they were having a merry time up-stairs.

She had not retired, and received her strange guests with a little surprise. They apologized for the intrusion, and stated their errand explicitly.

"To be sure, to be sure," began the old lady, with a confident nod of the head. "I've lived in this neighborhood hard on to fifty years, and 'twould be queer if I didn't know about most of the folks. But laws! some of the houses have changed hands so, 'twould puzzle a lawyer to keep track of them!" and she paused for a quaint little cackle, that could scarcely be termed a laugh. "Now there's next door——"

"The third house in the row," interposed Carton. "Fifteen years ago, this very Christmas, who lived there then?"

"Let me see," studying a figure in the carpet, "that and the second one belonged to old Seth Skinner, and he was rightly named, too. An old miser without a chick or a child, but when he died both places were sold. A young married couple took the third one. Now what was their name? They had a host of little children, you know, glancing around. She was so pretty and tidy. And there was a young man—but he went away somewhere. The husband was killed in an accident—steamboat—up the Hudson. Deary me, how I do forget! But you came upon me so sudden like, and I haven't thought of them this many a day. She kept boarders a while, then the mortgage was foreclosed, and the poor thing had no end of trouble."

"Was there a little girl among them, who might be about sixteen now?" asked Romaine, eagerly.

"Laws! There were girls and boys, a regular little flock of 'em, but I did hear some of 'em died."

"Her name," cried Carton, impatiently, "if you are sure she lived there fifteen years ago."

"Why, she hasn't been gone more'n seven year," resumed the old lady, in surprise. "It was a short name, and I know I can think of it if you give me time. I'm a master hand at remembering when I'm not taken so suddenly. Maybe son Joseph can tell?" an expression of relief lighting up her eyes. "Mattie, run call him up."

Doctor Gates came, and, after a few moments, recalled the family. But the name had slipped from his mind. Perhaps the books might tell.

He turned them back year after year, mentioning bits of gossip about the household of children. There was one very bright little girl he thought. He had only been in practice nine years. At that time the corner building had been altered to a store.

"Here it is," he cried, eagerly. "Wynne! Well, it is a rather odd name. And you want to know where she is now? We will take a search through the directory."

There was only one widow in the list, a Mrs. Mary Wynne. Carton wrote down the address.

"Wynne?" Romaine said slowly over to himself. There seemed something familiar about it, unusual as it was.

"It is too late to go on any further hare's hunt to-night," said Carton, gruffly; and then he questioned Romaine with his eyes. "If you care anything further about the matter, though I can't see as you're connected anyway, as events seem to point——"

"Come to my house to-morrow morning, as early as you can——"

"I shall go there first," interrupted Carton, "and—well, I'll drop in and let you know."

They expressed their obligations to Doctor Gates, and said good-night. It was after ten. The lawyer hailed the first car. Mr. Romaine walked down the street and studied the house again. Had Della Clyde's child found shelter and motherly love here? Oh, where was she now?

And then Tom Wynne's face flashed up before him! How blind and dull he had been! And this girl who had been pleading with him to-day, with those soft, brown, strangely familiar eyes—oh, heavens! what if that were Ardella Clyde's child, sent to him for a Christmas gift so long ago. She might not be Tom's sister.

He stood a few moments like one stunned, then he plunged into a labyrinth of streets. He would know this very night, he would claim her before any other demand was made. He would withdraw the charge against Tom, and if the Wynnes were poor—as they must surely be—she should make them happy by the useless hoards he had been saving up year after year.

He picked his way through places that he had scarcely dreamed of, meeting roystering parties, poor women hurrying home with loaded market-baskets, and a few waifs who had neither home nor friends this Christmas Eve. Here the streets were rather more tidy and quiet. He found the number, and knocked hesitatingly.

A man answered the summons gruffly, "What did he want?"

"Mrs. Wynne——" and the well-trained voice and bearing had its effect.

"Up-stairs—the back room. No bad news of the young un, I hope. One's gone to jail, as mebbe you know," leering sharply at him.

Romaine stumbled up in the dark, and knocked softly. After a moment the door was timidly opened by a girl of twelve.

"I am Mr. Romaine," he said, with the softened grace he used toward society ladies. "I should like to see your mother. Your brother Tom was in my store——"

"Will you please walk in? Mother is ill in bed, and Della——"

Then it was she! He stared at the child, who wiped some tears from her eyes, and placed a chair for him. Was it all a dream—was he walking in his sleep, and should he wake up presently to find himself before the grate-fire, studying a picture.

"Mother, it is Mr. Romaine."

That recalled him. He glanced around the neat, orderly room, then into a smaller one adjoining, where a woman lay in bed.

"Is she ill? Will it disturb her to ask her a question or two?"

"Oh, sir, my poor boy!" cried the feeble voice. "Have you brought any good news?"

What a selfish brute he was, thinking only of his own great pain and uncertainty. "Glad tidings of great joy," that was what was going all over the land. Had he none for this poor woman? Ah, if her son might be born again, free from the shadow of crime!

"I was unnecessarily harsh this afternoon," he began. "I have come to tell you that I will do all in my power, that if I can withdraw the charge he shall have another chance, that—will you answer me one question truly before God? Was the girl who came this afternoon your own child, or was she sent to you, fifteen years ago, one Christmas Eve?"

Mrs. Wynne sprang up to a sitting posture. Her thin face was deadly pale, and her eyes quite wild. She clasped her hands passionately.

"Oh," she moaned, "is it some more trouble? Is she——"

"It is no trouble, but good fortune, rather; if she is the child for whom search is being made. Good fortune to her, to you and yours——"

"She was a strange Christmas gift fifteen years ago, but I have loved her as my own. She never knew, the others never dreamed, and when death took some of my own, I was glad God had given me her. Oh, sir, if you have wrested this secret from me for any evil purpose——"

"Rest assured, I have not." There was something in the gladness of his tone that touched her. "I only knew a few hours ago that she was alive, that she—oh, my good woman, will you believe that I have a more than ordinary claim upon this child, that your care and love shall be repaid an hundredfold. And now tell me what moved you to take her in? Surely you could not have known her story, or her mother's hapless lot."

"Kittie, bring a chair for the gentleman. We were not always so poor, sir. Years ago my husband lost his life by an accident, and then our little savings were swept away by a fresh misfortune. I have tried my best to keep the children honest and respectable. Last Fall I was ill a long while with a fever, and then, when I was just getting about, this trouble happened to Tom. Oh, sir, believe me, he is innocent!" and she wrung her hands imploringly.

"We will try to prove him so. There, do not weep. I may have been cruel, unjust, but this Christmas Eve will turn a new leaf in my life. And now let me hear your story. Your door-bell rang, and there, in a basket on the doorstep, you found this little girl."

"Oh, you know that much? Whose child was it? For we never heard of Gilbert Ray after that, and we thought it so strange."

"Gilbert Ray?" he ejaculated, in surprise. "Is there still another mystery?"

"What became of him?"

"Indeed, I have never seen him. But tell me your story. I am all impatience."

"Gilbert had been boarding with us rather more than a year. I'm sure we always thought him a nice, steady fellow, but there had been something on his mind. He threw up a nice position and went West, promising to write, but he never did, at least no word ever came from him. Tom was turned of two, and there was a new baby in the cradle this Christmas Eve. We had just filled Tom's stockings and hung them up, when there was a ring at the door, and Mr. Wynne went. He came, bringing back a great basket, and there we found the pretty little one, with some clothes that were nice and fine, a locket and chain around her neck, a little parcel containing a plain gold ring and some papers, and a letter that had no direction on the outside, but when it began, 'My dear friend Gilbert,' we knew who was meant. The poor mother had just died, and with her last breath she implored him to care for her child, and keep it out of harm's way, for it seems her husband had been very cruel. We always thought she was an old love of Gilbert's. Well, we took her in, she was so sweet and pretty, and we looked to hear from Gilbert; but month after month no word came, and by that time we had grown to love her, and would not have sent her away. Then, when my own little girl died, I could not have spared her. We lost two after their father's death, and we've seen many hard times, but none so sad as now."

Gilbert Romaine's face was buried in his hands. By some strange freak of fate, the child's coming to Mrs. Wynne had an air of plausibility about it. For years little Della and he had been but a few blocks apart. The childhood he was to watch over, the love he could not give the mother, and that had been asked for her, wasted selfishly all these years!—everything going awry, all his desires thwarted, except the one great aim of money-making.

"The child was left to me," he said, hoarsely. "I lived then at Willow Place. You may remember how it was before they joined the two streets. This child's mother"—well, why should he be ashamed now? yet his voice faltered noticeably—"was my boyhood's love. There was no vow between us; we were both young, and I was somewhat dependent upon an uncle, but at the same time I was straining every nerve to gain something to offer her. She went away for a brief visit, and married a dashing young fellow. Ah, how angry I was! How I taught myself to despise her, or fancied I did. I heard afterwards that her husband had been cruel, and she was dead. To-night, to my great surprise, I learned that a fortune awaited her, and that the woman who brought her to your door, through a great mistake, should have taken her to me instead—Gilbert Romaine, Willow Place. It was easy for the similarity of names to set you astray, but your friend, Gilbert Ray, knew no more of it than the child herself."

Mrs. Wynne stared incredulously, and her head dropped back on the pillow. Was she listening to the real solution of the mystery, or some fanciful tale that was to deprive her of the child of her love? Would this grave, honorable-looking man deceive her?

"The letter was for you, then! Kittie," to the girl, "give me the box out of the bureau-drawer yonder. Turn the key, child, my hand shakes so. Here is the locket, and"—fumbling about in a blind sort of way—"the letter. Put the lamp on the table, Kittie."

The letter had turned yellow with time. A very weak, tremulous hand had penned it. He was never to know how it had been written at intervals, brief as it was. In a maze of bewilderment he read:

"MY DEAR FRIEND GILBERT—When you read this, the hand that wrote it will be cold in death. I think you loved me a little. It is pleasure and pain to believe it in my dying moments, though for a brief while I was mad with doubt and jealous despair, and in that mood was over-persuaded to go to my doom. I know now, thank God, that it was a lie, but the knowledge came too late to save me. Whatever tenderness you may have had for me, bestow, I beseech of you, on my child. It is a strange Christmas gift, but your mother is good and kindly-hearted, and you, oh, Gilbert, be generous enough to forgive my sad, sad mistake! Keep my child from her own father, her worst enemy. He does not know that I am dying among strangers, and would care little if he did. My love and prayers go with her.

"DELLA CLYDE H——."

Some tears dropped upon it, and Romaine sat silent a long while. Then he opened the locket. Yes, that was Della Clyde as he had known her. Dead—fifteen long years, but her child, her child!

"I am the Gilbert meant in the letter," he said, at length, in a strange, broken tone. "And the child was given to me. Where is she?" glancing suddenly around.

The pale face of the sick woman flushed scarlet, and the thin fingers worked nervously with the counterpane. The clock struck eleven.

"Oh, she ought to be here," Mrs. Wynne cried, anxiously.

"But where is she? Where did she go? Surely she is not out alone?"

"Not alone. No. I may as well tell you," in a slow, faltering way. "You see, she and Kittie sew most of the time, but it pays so poorly, and it is so tiresome. So just now, during holiday time, there were girls wanted at the theatre. One of our neighbors in the house belongs to a company, and she found Della a place. It is two dollars, and only two hours' work in the evening. We were so poor—she would do it."

Gilbert Romaine groaned aloud. She picking her way through that underworld, and he rolling in riches!

"It has been so hard for us since poor Tom went away——"

"Yes—yes. Tom shall come back, I'll take her word and his that he is innocent."

Then he rose and began to pace the floor, asking what time they generally came home, and watching the clock-hands in their slow march, and Kittie sewing.

"Was she not tired?" he asked.

"She should get sleepy if she did not sew. She had promised Dell to keep awake. They meant to go to the midnight service in the little church down the street, and see the Christmas greens," and a big tear stood in the child's eye. It would be their only Christmas festival.

Half-past. Then they were all alarmed.

"She never staid out so late before!" cried Kittie.

The streets grew stiller, and steps more infrequent. They strained their hearing to catch every sound that passed, and waited with tense breath for the next. Oh, where could she be? Had anything happened?

"I might go and look for her," said Gilbert Romaine. "Tell me which way she comes."

Mrs. Wynne had put on her wrapper, and walked out to her arm-chair in the sitting-room. Her meek face was filled with apprehensive terror.

Hark! Some one flew up the steps, two at a time, the door was flung open.

"Oh, mother! Kittie!" with a glad, glad cry, "I have seen the man who gave Tom the check! He was at the theatre. I kept my eyes on him all the evening, and then we ran around, Jenny and I, and watched the people out, and found him, with a beautiful young lady. So then we took the same horse-car; he never noticed us in the crowd, and we followed him home with her; but it was getting late and I told a policeman presently, who said he would find out all for us, and I am to go to-morrow. And then Mr. Romaine will know that Tom told the truth! Oh——"

She stopped suddenly, flushing scarlet. Yes, he could see now that she had a little of her mother about her. How dumb and blind he had been not to remark it this afternoon.

There was a strange silence in the little room as her eyes fell upon Mr. Romaine.

"Oh," she said, presently, "did you come to bring us 'good tidings'? We were going to church, Kittie and I, to pray for it."

Was it good tidings to her or to himself? Was his solitary home to be glad on the morrow? Was this young girl to come into his life—her own mother's gift to him so many years ago?

Some way the story was told, in a broken, incoherent fashion, with many questions and much wonder, and not a few tears. Della was incredulous, and the possible fortune seemed like a fairy dream, too good to be true.

Gilbert Romaine left them at length, and walked slowly homeward under the stars, and the bit of pale moon sadly on the wane. Christmas morning! All this had happened in the course of a few hours. There was his chair as he had left it, but the grate-fire was sleepy, and even the brown eyes of the picture looked drowsy. Della Clyde's child. He said it over and over.

Worthy Mrs. Rose was much amazed at her master's orders the next morning, and when James drove the elegant barouche, full of lovely warm robes, down the dingy street where the Wynnes lived, it made a Christmas brightness. Mrs. Wynne was bundled up, the two girls, with George and Nat, stepped into the Cinderella carriage, and were driven off to a Christmas dinner at the Pierce's, it seemed.

Best of all, before the day was over, or any of the stories had grown old, the policeman came with his tidings.

Poor Tom Wynne had been the victim of much suspicious evidence. As errand boy, he had often gone to the bank, so this day when he presented a check it was cashed with no question. Two days later it was pronounced a forgery. Then it came out that Tom had amused his fellow clerks by a skillful imitation of each one's penmanship. His story that he had taken the check for a friend, who had paid him ten dollars for the transaction, was but little in his favor, since his friend could not be found. Indeed, he had said to Tom that he was going West. How he had come in possession of one of Romaine & Co.'s checks was another mystery. But when the policeman recognized him as a sort of genteel swindler, who had become an object of suspicion in more ways than one, Tom's chances of proving his innocence brightened.

In any case, Mr. Romaine would have befriended him. For, if he took Della from them, surely he must make all the amends in his power. And though Mr. Carton would come to-morrow with the fortune, his claim would be first, strongest, for he had won not only Della's forgiveness, but her favor.

The Christmas bells rang out cheerily. "Peace and good will," they said, and Gilbert Romaine wondered that his ears had been deaf to their sound all these years. And in the churches, sweet voices had sung reverently, "Unto us a Child is born."

Was it a child, or the old love come back, clothed afresh with youth and sweetness for the coming years? Watching Della there in the shadow of the firelight, Gilbert Romaine dreamed a Christmas dream.

CHAPTER I.—DOES HE MEET HIS FATE?

IT is noon in the City of New York.

It is very warm. Foot-passengers warily select the shady side of streets, and those of the sterner sex may be seen darting through half-closed doors into bowers sacred to iced and cooling drinks.

Ancient men carry open umbrellas, and some of the younger ones, in dread of spoiling complexions, bearing the indelible stamp of quill-driving, affect dainty parasols, when a little browning would make them more like men, and less like seamstresses in male attire.

The swing-doors of the well-known monster establishment of Messrs. Narrowbraid & Woolstuff are thrown open to their utmost limits. The interior is cool and inviting.

Aristocratic-looking men, attired in black frock-coats, move languidly from counter to counter, taking hasty surveys of their persons in the surrounding mirrors, the while handing lady-customers to the stereotyped red-plush revolving chairs, and uttering that word which has led so many heroes to victory, "Forward." It is a remarkable fact that each of these gentlemen is afflicted with bunions, and each adorns his coat with a shabby flower which has been nurtured upon the dust thrown up by the revolving wheel of the horse-car, or the playful evolutions of the resident juvenile suburban population.

Two ladies enter.

One is fat—not fair, and over forty. Her hair is gray—her chignon raven black.

Mental anxiety, or constitutional debility, has preyed upon the front and spared the back hair.

Lightning has been known to blast the trunk, and leave the upper portion of the tree unscathed.

The elder lady is very warm, and seemed to doubt the capacity of the revolving chair.

The younger——

How shall we describe her?

Golden hair, the color of wheat ere the reaper lays it low.

Digitized by Google

Blue eyes, the color of an Italian sky (we have never seen an Italian sky, but will take it for granted it's all right).

Red lips, the color of a blushing poppy, always provided a poppy can blush.

White teeth, the color of—of—yes!—cold veal that has been done to a turn.

A form resembling that of Hebe, and a voice like that of a nightingale in the habit of being asked out for its singing.

Both ladies are richly attired.

"Forward!" cries the gentleman in the frock and bunions, "forward!"

The gentleman in the frock and bunions influences nobody's mind but his own.

"Forward there?" he cries in an angry tone; "What's the meaning of this? Mr. Cassidy, forward, if you please."

From behind a grove of stockings marked "a dead bargain—only twelve and a half cents per pair," the head and subsequently the body of a young man present themselves. The young man has been relating to another young man, with great naïveté and sprightliness, how he had "done" a gentleman connected with the blanket department out of "a glass of lager," and so pleased is he with the success of his little game that the aristocratic personage in the frock and bunions has to appeal to him by name, in order to recall him to a sense of his situation, to the startling fact that there are other parties to be "done" as well as confiding and unwary gentlemen connected with blanket departments.

It is but just to Mr. Philip Cassidy to say that he obeyed the word of command with the alacrity of a boarder to his hash at the summons of the gong.

His eyes fell upon the elderly lady, and to her he spoke these remarkable words:

"What do you wish to be shown, ma'am?"

Mrs. Tumtint—for this is the name by which the fat lady is known in society—did not reply.

She was mopping her inflamed visage with a handkerchief.

Philip Cassidy turned for the first time towards the young lady.

It might be as well to say that she is the daughter of the fat one.

Age—eighteen years.

Tangible fortune under approbation of parents—$15,000.

Expectations upon said parents becoming defunct—$20,000.

Philip Cassidy's eyes met hers.

He fell back against a glove-box.

He injured his head against the brass handle thereof.

A cold perspiration bedewed him.

He had come face to face with his fate.

Vox faucibus hæsit. If Messrs. Narrowbraid & Woolnut had called him into the extra private office, and then announced their respective intentions of making him a partner, he could not have felt more "milly gollified," which is a Japanese word expressive of the "happy dispatch" from a playful point of view.

Oh, Love, here is thy sting!

Oh, Love, here is thy victory!

Philip Cassidy stood staring at Miss Tumtint with his mouth open, displaying a dollar tooth, which had been inserted by a cunning dentist, owing to its predecessor in office having resigned in consequence of a somewhat forcible ejection—stood gazing his whole soul out, totally oblivious of surroundings totally forgetful of the possessor of the frock and bunions, and utterly unmindful of the fat lady, who plaintively demanded a view, on approbation, of cambric pocket-handkerchiefs.

"I wish to see some cambric pocket-handkerchiefs," says the fat lady, tapping upon the counter with a fifty-cent piece to attract attention.

Mechanically Philip dropped his right hand beneath the counter, his eyes all the while riveted upon the object of his adoration. Mechanically the right hand came to the surface, surrounding a dainty box in which lay ensconced the articles required by the half-dollar-tapping female.

She pinched them, held one up to the light, examined the hem, and finally demanded the price.

"Two-fifty, madam," murmured Philip Cassidy.

The fat lady gave an oily squeak, expressive of discomfiture at the value set upon the desired article.

"I'm afraid mamma would consider that sum too extravagant," observed Miss Tumtint, coming to the rescue of her over heated parent.

Fearing she would leave the counter, and, as a natural consequence, take her daughter with her, "She shall have them, miss," says Philip, with a gasp; "I made a mistake—they are only one-fifty."

The accusing angel, with extreme officiousness, flew to heaven's chancery with this mistake of Philip Cassidy's, and the recording angel mended her pen ere she entered it to his debit, in the hope that he might repair his error ere she wrote it down, not having at that particular moment a tear at command wherewith to blot the record out for ever.

Mrs. Tumtint closed upon the box of handkerchiefs, leaving Philip Cassidy to pay the difference to the firm, which it is but justice to mention that he did, and that, too, upon the spot.

"Anything else to-day, miss, gloves, carpets, trimmings, flowers, boots, umbrellas, oilcloth?" demanded Philip, with great earnestness and volubility, in the eager hope of detaining his adored one upon the premises, and gently touching upon the leading articles in each department with a view to helping the memory as to requirements.

Both ladies graciously but emphatically negatived his propositions, and, although he lugged down box upon box of gloves, offering them at prices that would have involved four weeks' salary at the very lowest computation, they resolutely declined, which was somewhat lucky for this love-stricken wight.

"What name, ma'am, if you please?" asked Philip, whipping out a pencil from that mysterious recess in his raiment peculiar to the employés in monster establishments.

"It doesn't mind," replied Mrs. Tumtint; "I shall take the box with me."

Mrs. Tumtint feared a changeling should she trust to the parcel being sent home.

In vain Philip tried it on in every way.

The heat—the trouble—the size—the pleasure the firm felt in sending things home, et cætera.

His anxiety on the subject trebled her suspicions, and she resolutely abided by her decision.

Philip took at least ten minutes to tie up the box, and ten minutes more in getting the necessary change.

"Allow me to bring it to your carriage," says Philip, as a last resource, and outraging all the laws of the establishment by the proposition.

"I am not driving," says the fat lady, somewhat sharply, still under the impression that she would be done out of her bargain.

Philip sighed heavily as he handed her the parcel.

His eyes met those of Miss Tumtint, who regarded his pertinacity with some curiosity.

It was a full-bodied glance, such as Juliet bestowed on Romeo at their first meeting.

The Vesuvius of Philip Cassidy's heart destroyed the Pompeii of his common sense.

They both saluted him and went their way.

"Can I go out for twenty minutes, sir?" says Philip to him of the frock-coat and bunions.

"Certainly not, sir," replies that dignified functionary.

Philip said nothing. Every second was worth a life. He glided towards the door, and artfully taking up a straw hat, marked thirty-five cents, as if for the purpose of commercially examining it, gained the street.

"Did you see a fat lady, and a young one dressed in blue, pass?" asks Philip of a gloomy official, in an overcoat paved with metal buttons.

"Yis."

"Which way did they go?"

"They got into a hack, and druv that way," giving a flourish of his arm towards the right.

"Do you know the number of the hack?"

"How the deuce could I?" retorted the official, angrily and disrespectfully.

"Would you know the hackman again if you saw him?"

"I might, an' I mightn't," was the surly and unsatisfactory response.

Philip Cassidy sat at the open window of his small apartment, gazing gloomily out into the night and into the adjoining chimney-pots. His heart was full of a new joy, but his mind was weary, very weary. He cursed the bitterness of a fate that denied him the privilege of disposing of himself according to his own will. He railed at a system that deprived a man and brother of the rights of both, reducing him to the level of a chained cur. He raved over the beauty of the fair unknown, over the few small words she had emitted from behind her white teeth, over her last but fatal glance, and soothed his troubled soul with the faint hope of meeting her again, and of one day or other achieving name and fame and fortune to lay at her dainty feet.

"A letther, Misther Cassidy," says a greasy old female, thrusting herself sans cérémonie into the apartment. "Ye ought to get out this heavenly evenin' on the sthrand at Coney Island, instid of sittin' here like a jackdaw that tumbled down the chimley."

Philip Cassidy did not reply, but took the letter, and, glancing at the superscription, recognized the handwriting of his father.

Mr. Cassidy, senior, is a small farmer, residing at Millerstown, Westchester County, N. Y. He came to the country in '48, and is more Irish than when he quitted the paternal acres at Ballynacrokery. He is supposed by his neighbors to be a classical scholar of the most scholarly type, and regarded therefore with awe and veneration. His wife is the soul of charity, combined with common sense, and both are extremely proud of having their only son doing business in New York.

Having dismissed the greasy but good-natured Hebe, Philip Cassidy proceeded to read his father's letter.

He opens it languidly.

He commences to peruse it with a tardiness amounting to indifference.

"Hi!"

He clutches it tightly, and recommences it.

"Ha!"

His eyes are riveted upon the paper.

"Ha!" he finishes it.

"Hurrah! hurrah!" shouts Philip at the utmost limits of his lungs.

The letter ran thus:

MILLERSTOWN, June 21st, 1877.

MY DEAR PHIL—Your poor uncle Tim has just died—Requiescat in Pacey. He told me before the rattles got a grip of him that he left you the mines at Deadwood. Yer in luck, my son. If they're worth a fardin, they're three thousand pound a year. Come here at wanst; yer presence at this crissis is the grand disidarium.

Your fond paper, in a hurry.

JOHN JOSEPH CASSIDY.

POSTSCRIPTUM—Your mother would write, but she is busy preparing to wake poor Tim.

POSTOBITSCRIPTUM—I send you three pound—I mean $15—for fear you'd be minus the auricula.

"She is mine," cries Philip Cassidy; "no power on earth shall tear her from me—she is mine!"

* * * * *

Two months are supposed to have elapsed since Mr. Philip Cassidy surrounded the legacy bequeathed to him by his uncle.

In addition to the mines in question, he was left in ready money about $70,000.

Phil did not give himself up to intense grief. He bore his uncle's departure nobly, heroically, and arrayed himself in the glossiest of sable, the whitest of linen, and shiniest of patent-leather boots, at least three sizes too small for him.

What pen can describe the concentrated essence of pride and pleasure permeating Phil Cassidy's mind upon entering the establishment of Messrs. Narrowbraid & Woolnut, in order to purchase gloves at the very counter he had so often crossed with acrobatic agility?

The throb of grim delight that assaulted his heart upon cutting the gentleman in the black frock and bunions, and in being enabled to utterly disregard the words "Forward" and "Cash here," which heretofore were to him the watchwords of his life?

How glorified he felt upon receiving the envious glances of the gentlemen in the blanket department, who pretended not to see him, but nevertheless communed in whispers at the back of large bales of those comfort-giving articles, glancing occasionally from behind them, and wishing in their inmost souls that some relation, or, indeed, stranger, would shuffle off this mortal coil, remembering them in a somewhat similar graceful and affecting manner.

Phil strolled through the whole establishment with a desperate attempt at nonchalance, especially whilst passing the ladies'-own-material-made-up department, where a certain young lady, who had snubbed our hero upon his displaying indications of an amorous appreciation of her charms, spent the greater part of her waking hours.

"You won't pass an old friend, Mr. Cassidy?" says the young lady, thrusting her black eyes right through the somewhat green optics of Phil Cassidy, and smiling like a sunflower.

"How do ye do, Miss Brown Jones?" replies Phil; "I hope you're salubrious. I'm in a hurry; good-by" (consulting an exceedingly handsome gold watch for the one hundredth time since his entrance to the establishment); and as he rushed from her, the young lady was heard by the precocious ready-reckoner of a small boy, who dwelt in the adjacent financial pulpit, to murmur "Vulgar beast."

Phil Cassidy arrived at the summit of satisfaction when he stumbled upon both Mr. Narrowbraid and Mr. Woolnut, who were engaged in holding a council of war upon the somewhat delicate subject of reducing the rations of the young gentlemen attached to their establishment.

Mr. Narrowbraid perceived him; and this great man, who used formerly to address our hero as "Mister," or "You, sir," actually crossed the entire store to greet him.

"My dear Cassidy; I'm so glad to see you. Why, you are looking charming. Come and dine to-day at seven o'clock. You know our little place on the Boulevard. 'A family dinner. I'll introduce you to my wife."

He did not add "daughter," keeping his trump card, as is elegantly termed, "in the heel of his fist."

Phil Cassidy knew the "little place" referred to but too well, having, during an illness which prostrated Mr. Narrowbraid, been dispatched every morning for a week with letters, but never succeeded in penetrating further than the hall, where he was left to shiver until his teeth rattled like castanets, and until the dollar one was in imminent danger of losing its hold for ever. He would gladly have availed himself of the invitation, but feared the ice in the nor'west passage that lay before him in the conventionalities appertaining to an entrée into select society.

Mr. Narrowbraid would take no excuse.

"Drop in here at 6:30, Cassidy, and I'll drive you out. Quite a family dinner, my boy. No dress."

Phil tremblingly accepted, and hurried to the nearest bookstore, where he invested in a "Guide to the Dinner-table," which purported to afford the most practical and extensive information to diners-out of both sexes, who, from chance, habit, or otherwise, were precluded from joining in that very essential ceremonial, and driving to his hotel, the Fifth Avenue, surrendered himself to an acute study of this valuable work with as much of earnestness as though he were cramming for the civil service, or a collegiate pupil of jovial and anti-industrious habits preparing in feverish haste for his "little go."

A little before the appointed hour Phil Cassidy arrived at the rendezvous.

He arrayed himself in black trousers, patent leather boots, which pinched his corns in a delirium tremens of agony, black frock-coat, black tie, and, although in mourning, a plaid silk waistcoat with gilt buttons, the fascinating influences of which he could not find it in his heart to resist.

How his "bosom's lord" swelled with pleasure when Mr. Narrowbraid took his arm and handed him into a well-appointed open carriage. How radiant he felt as they whirled away under the very noses of his late associates, two of whom were engaged in the humiliating process of removing for the evening some artificial flowers and ladies' corsets from the public gaze.

Half an hour brought them to Grasshopper Lodge.

"My dear," says Narrowbraid, to a tall bony female, hung in black silk—"my dear, this is a young friend of mine whom I have asked to take pot-luck. He must take chance; I hope you have some dinner for us."

Mr. Narrowbraid had sent out a special messenger to inform Mrs. N. of his intentions respecting Phil, and impressed upon his spouse in his note the necessity of having Tossie (their mutual daughter) especially presentable.

The bony female shook our hero's hand with great warmth, expressing herself charmed to see him, but fearing he would get a very bad dinner.

"I don't care, ma'am," says Phil, "I took a snack at Dorion's off the gridiron."

"I'll take your hat, please, sir," whispers the man-servant into Philip's ear.

"Oh, thank you," replied Phil, in the same confidential tone, "I'll take care of it myself, I won't trouble you," and he brought it into the drawing-room, and placed it carefully beneath the silken chair upon which he in vain endeavored to fasten his frame, so slippery was the new black cloth which surrounded him.

"My daughter, Mr. Cassidy."

A young lady, in a faultless Summer toilet, entered at one of the windows, a basket of freshly-cut flowers upon her arm—the handle of the basket was black—the arm white.

Phil remarked the contrast. It was intended he should do so.

"I hope you get good health, miss," says Cassidy, advancing, and wringing her by the hand.

She wrote him down a brute.

Her hand would be red all dinner-time.

Would she have a moment to powder it?

"Dinner is served," groaned the servant, in that solemn tone peculiar, and, indeed, suitable, to so important an announcement.

Phil Cassidy handed Mrs. Narrowbraid in to dinner, having very successfully entangled himself in both mats whilst crossing the hall, thereby causing that lady a considerable deal of uneasiness on his behalf, being for a moment under the impression that he had taken a little something by way of companionship to the snack at Dorion's.

Phil sat about as far from the table as he conveniently could, the feet of his chair sticking out behind like a pair of man-traps.

The servant, with a jerk, shoved in the chair.

This jerk brought Cassidy's chin into violent contact with the table.

"What the dickens do you mean?" cries Phil, in his wrath. "Couldn't you leave my chair alone? How busy you are."

When he remembered his whereabouts, he grew apopletic with confusion, and uttered a mental invocation to the floor to open and swallow him up.

Narrowbraid was equal to the occasion.

"When I was a young fellow the same thing occurred to me, Cassidy; but I didn't act with so much prudence. I jumped up, and egad, ha, ha! I knocked the servant under the table."

This little anecdote, expressly compiled for the occasion, brought Phil together, and by way of appearing quite cool and collected, and as if dining à la Russe was his everyday habit, he challenged Miss Narrowbraid to take wine.

Miss Narrowbraid opened a very fine pair of eyes to their utmost limits.

"Right, Cassidy, keep up the good old fashion," cries papa.

"Your health, miss," says Phil, as he tosses off a glass of Madeira.

The dinner was à la Russe, and as extensive as a Tartar steppe.

Phil partook of every dish presented to him, invariably requesting to be permitted to retain his knife and fork.

Phil drank of every wine, invariably declining to change his glass.

Now, whether it was due to the wine, or the flowers, or the entrées, or the general air of grandeur that pervaded the whole business, or to a combination of all together, Cassidy began to feel quite at his ease, and, in a parallel line with this agreeable sensation, a feeling of admiration for Miss Narrowbraid.

She sat opposite to him.

When he looked that way he found her pensive eyes riveted upon his, and then demurely lowered in bashful confusion.

At first Phil was unable to account for this semi-official inspection.

There was a tender appeal in the look, which forbade the idea of ridicule.

"She has very beautiful eyes," thinks Philip, and he breaks a champagne-glass.

"That is a dozen to the lady of the house, Cassidy," laughs Narrowbraid, feigning a jocosity he was far from participating in.

"She shall have five dozen—ten dozen, sir," says Phil, slapping the table, in order to add emphasis to his announcement. "I've lots of money, and she shall have the glasses. Is there anything you would like thrown in, miss?" he added, with a languishing look towards Miss Narrowbraid.

"N—nothing, thanks," replied that young lady.

"Do, now," pleads Phil. "Anything in the old man's store. You've only to say the word, He'll give them to me wholesale. I know the private mark."

And Phil was under the pleasing impression that he was fascinating them.

Oh, my brother!

When the ladies stood up to leave the room, our hero resolutely maintained his seat.

"You're not both going?"

"I expect to see you in the garden immediately. Don't let papa keep you too long over your claret," lisps Tossie.

"I won't take any at all. I don't care for wine," cries Phil, which statement, considering the large quantity he consumed during dinner, would lead one to conjecture what amount he would have imbibed if wine were included amongst his favorite beverages.

Philip gallantly quitted the room with the ladies, knocking over two chairs and breaking a claret-glass in his exit.

"He'll want a lot of rubbing down," whispers Narrowbraid, to the partner of his joys.

"Tossie will do that for him," responds Mrs. N., in an exceedingly self-satisfied tone.

"If Tossie plays her cards well, Christmas Day will find them united."

"I guess so."

In the lovely Summer night light Phil Cassidy reclines upon a garden-seat beside Miss Narrowbraid.

Her Indian muslin skirt has been swept into a splendid fold, which covers at least five yards of the closely-shaven grass, concealing most completely Philip's patent leathers, and, indeed, the greater portion of his frame.

She gazes at him in that languid manner so effective when the eyes are large, well-lashed and expressive.

The mitrailleuse was at work.

What male heart could withstand thirty-four darts per minute, well-directed, straight from the bow of Cupid?

Not Phil Cassidy.

The bright vision of Miss Tumtint was forgotten.

Philip was as a fly struggling against the spider of destiny.

Both were silent.

"That's a choice article, miss," says Cassidy, taking a small portion of the Indian muslin between his forefinger and thumb; "wholesale, seventy-five cents; retail, two dollars ninety-nine."

Miss Narrowbraid shuddered.

"Don't be so awfully commercial, Mr. Cassidy. Let us speak of something more interesting—more sublime."

"Certainly, miss," responded Phil, with alacrity; and, with a view to the reception of her suggestion, asked her the following sublime question:

"Do you walk on Fifth Avenue on Sundays?"

"I hate Fifth Avenue," says Miss Narrowbraid, pettishly.

"Do you often go to Coney Island?"

"As often as I can."

"Coney is a nobby spot," says Phil.

"I love the sea, the open sea, the ever free—

"Roll on, thou deep and dark-blue ocean.'

You remember the lines?"

Phil said he did, but he didn't.

"Have you a yacht, Mr. Cassidy?" asks Miss Narrowbraid, innocently.

"Me?" cries Phil.

"Yes, you—why not? A gentleman with your fortune should have his yacht in Summer to cruise about in."

"I could easily get one, I suppose," says Phil.

"Of course you could. I should so like a sail—won't you give poor little me a sail in your yacht, if you get one?" murmurs Miss Narrowbraid.

"Sail! You must come and sail in her every day," responds our hero.

"Then you will buy one?"

"I'll buy one to-morrow," cries Phil. "Blow me, but I'll buy a cutter to-morrow, a regular mizen, top-rigged schooner-cutter, and nothing else."

And they sat side by side far into the night.

Doubtless Mr. and Mrs. Narrowbraid had forgotten them.

Of course they had.

* * * * *

Upon the morning succeeding the little dinner at Grasshopper Lodge, Mr. Philip Cassidy arose somewhat earlier than usual, and breakfasted upon a tumbler of ice-water, from which premises it may be safely inferred that he had partaken too freely of the contents of the cellar of Mr. Gimp Narrowbraid.

His head ached as though a Nasmyth hammer was specially engaged in the painful task of beating out his skull by infinitesimal degrees, and a nutmeg could have been satisfactorily grated upon his parched and stubbly tongue.

He lay upon a sofa, and gave himself up to meditation, not quite after the fashion of those pious men whom the ancient masters have handed down to us, arrayed in sackcloth, and refreshing themselves with a stony gaze at a human skull carefully placed upon a very brown bank, and within easy reach of the gazer's hand.

No!

Philip Cassidy thought of his promise to Tossie Narrowbraid—his promise to invest in a cutter, and he groaned in spirit.

He never broke his word in his life, and he was not going to do it on this occasion.

Now it so happened that Phil had never been on board of a yacht during his natural life, and for that matter a ship either.

His nautical experience dated from the Fulton Ferry and a Rockaway steamboat, consequently the promise of the purchase of a cutter opened up a field of thought of so extensive a nature as to bewilder and reduce him to the verge of raging lunacy.

Where was the cutter to be found?

He had pledged himself to a cutter.

This word was familiar.

He used it when a boy, in connection with the rule of three and a slate—a slate-cutter was one thing, but a sea-cutter was another. Phil Cassidy's ideas as to the exact formation of this class of vessel were extremely undefined. Had she one or two masts? Perhaps three? He began to hope that cutters were made in sizes like gloves.

"But what is my size?" asks Cassidy, thinking aloud. "What is my size?"

"PHILIP CASSIDY'S EYES MET HERS. HE HAD COME FACE TO FACE WITH HIS FATE."

WHICH OF THEM WILL HE MARRY?—"'AHOY!' CRIED PHIL; 'STRIKE YOUR JIBBOOM! HAUL AWAY YOUR MARLINGSPIKE! LET GO THE TOPGALLANT SAIL! KEEP YOUR BOWSPRIT! SPLICE YOUR RUDDER.'"—SEE PAGE 334.

"PHILIP MECHANICALLY WENT ON DECK. HAPPILY TOMKINS WAS ENGROSSING TOSSIE. MISS TEMPINT WAS ALONE AT THE BOWS."

"About five foot seven and a half," cries a voice close to his ear.

Phil sprang to his feet.

"Horsechin, I'm delighted to see you; sit down: I'm in a hobble."

"What's up?" says the individual thus addressed, pitching one portion of his body upon a chair, and the remaining portion, namely, his feet, upon the table. "What's up? I want the two I's, a light and a liquor."

It might be as well to observe that Mr. Horsechin is a drummer. Although American born, he was raised in Manchester, England, where he served his apprenticeship to a cotton-house, from whence he emerged in course of time a full-blown commis voyageur. He does the United States, or, as he terms it, is on "the American mail."

He attends races with the punctuality of a professor of a thimble-rig, and takes the odds upon any and indeed every sporting event. He dresses "horsey," and displays diamond shirt-studs and diamond rings in daylight, which everybody knows is not done in upper circles—although considered very elegant and becoming in commercial ones.

He considers Cassidy worth cultivating, and Phil regards him much in the same light as Mr. Lorillard or Mr. Belmont is regarded by young Harvard men enjoying stable proclivities.

"Now, before you begin to howl, let me have a B.-and-S. And you'd better get into another," said Mr. Horsechin.

"I have a headache, and am——"

"Not fit to carry fish to an otter—quite so. Was it supper?"

"No, sir, it was not supper."

"Dinner?"

"Well, I think it was. Peas always sicken me."

"Of course. Take S.-S"—whereby he meant sherry and seltzer—"and a good dose of open air."

The proposed liquids having been produced and disposed of, Mr. Horsechin demanded the cause of Philip Cassidy's mental anxiety.

Phil felt very like a fool, and blurted out:

"I want to buy a cutter."

"A what?"

"A cutter—a yacht—a schooner—a——."

"What the deuce do you want with a yacht?"

"To sail about in, of course. The fact is, I promised Miss Narrowbraid to buy one, and—and—I must."

The commercial gentleman bestowed a facetious wink upon Phil, and then gave vent to a whistle akin to the performance of Mr. J. L. Toole in "the Artful," after he has announced his intention of proceeding to the Colonies at the expense of the Home Government.

"Up a tree, by gumbo!" cried Mr. Horsechin, opening another bottle of seltzer, and dexterously sending the cork flying into the street, where it alighted upon the bald forehead of an elderly gentleman who happened to be passing, hat in hand, at the moment, and who gazed ferociously up at the window, from whence the drummer saluted him with great politeness and urbanity.

"I'm not up a tree, but I want to buy a yacht," said Phil, doggedly.

Mr. Horsechin bethought him that a yacht would be about as pleasant a medium for enjoyment as he could possibly possess, feeling that he, as a matter of course, would be the actual, whilst Cassidy would be the nominal, owner.

"Right, my boy: right you are—I like to see such nobby tastes, Cassidy; you must have some purple blood in your veins."

"My mother is distantly related to Alderman ——," said poor Phil, delighted with the perfumed oil wherewith the wily bagman greased the wheels of his fancy.

"I thought so; and now to business. What sized boat do you require?"

Phil's ideas on this point were dim, but, not wishing to appear ignorant upon so vital a subject, carelessly exclaimed:

"I'm not particular to a yard or two."

"I suppose something easily handled—say thirty ton."

Phil did not see how thirty tons could be easily handled. He was of opinion that thirty tons could not be handled at all.

"You want to race her?"

"Oh, Lord, no!" cries Cassidy, whose ideas on the subject of racing-yachts were connected with decks being more than half under water, and the copper in close proximity to the keel manifesting itself in a manner ghastly to behold from land.

"Put on your nutshell, and we'll drive to the Ashland House: Macpherson is stopping there. He travels for a Scotch house, and, being a Clyde man, will give us a tip." So saying, Mr. Horsechin adorned himself with his nutshell, alias hat, and our hero having gone through a similar ceremonial, and the commercial gentleman having whistled between his fingers for a hack, they dashed through Broadway to the Ashland Hotel at the most astonishing space.

Mr. Sandie Macpherson was alighted upon in the act of transferring a somewhat complicated order, with which he had been favored by an unwary customer, from his order-book to a sheet of paper, the back of which was adorned with the name of the firm for whom he scoured the country, which relieved him from the tiresome duty of writing their address.

Mr. Macpherson did know a party willing to dispose of a yacht. He was not certain, but he thought she might be found in New York Bay—the upper bay.

"Bide a wee, messrs.," says Sandie, "and I'll go yon wi' ye."

A soothing liquor was proposed by Mr. Horsechin at our hero's expense, and disposed of whilst the Scotch gentleman transferred his hieroglyphics for the edification of his employers.

Another drink, and they catch the 3:30 Staten Island boat.

"Boat, genlmn," utters a gruff voice from behind a blue gauzy, besmeared with tar; "row yez over; only a dime a piece."

Disregarding this seductive blandishment, the trio proceeded direct to a saloon, where Mr. Macpherson addressed the genteel-looking and polite bartender thus:

"'HURRAH!' SHOUTS PHILIP, AT THE UTMOST LIMITS OF HIS LUNGS."

"Young mon, can ye tall us if yon cutther is the Dandie Deenmond?" pointing in the direction of the Narrows.

"Yes, I guess so," was the reply.

Having succeeded in ensconcing themselves in a boat, the triumvirate proceeded to board the Dandie Dinmont. The owner was on deck, and did not seem at all charmed to see Mr. McPherson and his friends.

Mr. McPherson drew him aside, and whispered a few words.

Whatever he said, immediately produced a talismanic effect.

Mr. Samuelson invited them into the cabin for a few minutes.

Cassidy bonneted himself during the descent.

The water of anguish ran from his eyes.

All hands were piped for grog.

Phil, with a view to showing how hardy and fast a fellow he was, took his after the method adopted by the rest of the company—namely, in one gulp.

More tears of anguish.

The object of the visit was brought upon the tapis.

Mr. Samuelson wouldn't sell, but he had no objection to hiring the Dandie Dinmont for two months, at two hundred dollars per month.

Phil, or, rather, Mr. Horsechin, closed on the offer.

Another glass of grog.

More bonneting of Phil Cassidy.

Dinner at the Brunswick.

Phil paid for it, as a matter of course, and, by way of compensation, had his health proposed and pledged in a bumper of genuine Chateau Lafitte of the '54.

Phil thinks he went to sleep.

You who would virtuously sneer at his modest supposition, bear in mind these two words: "Cras tibi."

TALKS ON TIMELY TOPICS.

ILLUSTRATED INTERVIEWS WITH EMINENT PUBLIC MEN.

—No. 10.—

INTERVIEW WITH SECRETARY THOMPSON.

The Secretary Means to Americanize the U. S. Navy.

BRITISH SYSTEM PERFECT.

Portions of it Adopted for Training Ships.

BOYS CONTENTED AND DEVOTED TO THEIR PROFESSION, AND NO DESERTIONS.

IN a palatial apartment in the Department of State, at Washington, overlooking the gardens attached to the White House, I found the Secretary to the Navy, R. W. Thompson. His "workshop" is the most commodious, the most elegantly proportioned, the most superbly finished, and the best furnished, of any of the bureaus of the chief officers of state. The floor is of red pine, covered with Axminster rugs—clots of color. The lounges and chairs are upholstered in gray leather and brass-nailed. A rich dado runs round the walls, which are of a delicate pink, broken by fluted columns, gilt. The ceiling is resplendent with gilding, and the chandeliers are of the mediæval, in brass. The fireplaces, of which there are two, are also brass mediæval-pattern, and tiled; while the mantel-pieces are surmounted by magnificent mirrors, the golden frames being carved symbolically. There are bookcases, globes and telephones, and the private secretary occupies a desk table at a respectful distance from his chief. The Secretary sits at a desk about the size of a small room, laden with maps, charts, reports and letters. On the occasion of my visit, a set of improved cutlasses relieved the general sameness of the impedimenta.

Mr. Thompson is a tall, thin, white-haired, spectacled gentleman, of a quiet, impressive manner. He was dressed in black, and smoked a genuine Reina all through our interview.

"You are quite right in saying that I take an especial interest in the question of the nationality of our navy," said the Secretary. "I want the American Navy to be sailored by Americans, as the British Navy is sailored by Britons and the French Navy by Gauls."

"How does it stand at present, Mr. Secretary?"

"Seven-tenths are foreigners, picked up in all parts of the world, who are not even naturalized citizens of the United States."

"Then you hope to remold the American Navy through the new system of training-ships?"

"Undoubtedly."

"What is the present numerical strength of the boys on the training ships?"

"Twelve hundred. Congress authorized me to raise 750 more, thereby increasing the strength of the navy from 7,500 to 8,250."

"At what age do you take in the boys?"

"Between fifteen and twenty-one years. Each boy upon presenting himself for enlistment must be accompanied by his father, or by his mother in case the father be deceased; or by his legally appointed guardian in case he has no father nor mother, their signature being required on the Shipping Articles to perfect enlistment."

"What is the course of education?"

"The education of the boys will comprise the elements of an ordinary English education, alternating with practical seamanship and other professional occupations designed to prepare them for sailors in the navy. The prime object is to place in the naval service, with the consent of their parents, such good and deserving boys as will elevate its standard and make the navy more reliable as an arm of the national defense. Boys who have been convicted of crime cannot, therefore, be received, as it is not advisable that they should become the associates of the better class."

"Do you pay the boys when enlisted, Mr. Secretary?"

"The boys are enlisted as third-class boys, at the rate of $9.50 per month and one ration. While serving on the training-ships, they may, if deserving, be promoted to the rating of second and first-class boys, at the pay of $10.50 and $11.50 per month, respectively, and on cruising-vessels will be entitled to higher ratings, at the descretion of their commanding officers, as a reward of proficiency and good conduct."

"They gain a knowledge of practical seamanship through cruising?"

"Yes. They are placed on training-ships till they develop qualities to justify the belief that they can be trusted as seamen at sea, when they are distributed amongst the cruising-vessels where they have the benefit of association with more experienced seamen."

"When a boy enlists do you supply him with an outfit?"

"He is furnished with an outfit of clothing, the cost of which is charged to his account, or his parents may purchase the necessary outfit from the paymaster of the ship, and give it to him."

"Are the boys permitted to allot any of their pay?"

"Boys enlisted to serve until twenty-one years of age will not be permitted to allot any part of their pay to parents or guardians, nor will they, for this purpose, be allowed to draw any money from the paymaster. They will be allowed to draw monthly, from the paymaster of the ship, one dollar for pocket-money, if out of debt, and will be allowed liberty to go on shore, at the discretion of the commanding officer."

"What becomes of the boys when they reach twenty-one?"

"They may or may not re-enlist—the probability is, that nine-tenths of them will re-enlist. If recommended for honorable discharge upon the expiration of their enlistments, they will receive continuous service certificates, which will entitle them to three months extra pay of their rating when discharged, and to the addition of one dollar per month to their pay, provided they re-enlist under such certificates for three years within three months from the dates thereof. Those who do not re enlist will go back into the country with the benefits of travel. They will compare our institutions with those of other countries, and discover that they are better off here than they would be in China or Japan. This will infuse a new element into society, and an important one. The object of my convening the ships at Hampton Roads, recently, was purely on a matter of business in order to bring all the officers together for conference and consultation. I held a meeting at midnight on the ships. In the meantime I had obtained from an officer whom we sent to London an insight into the British system. That report we have here, and at this conference at Hampton Roads we made a comparison between the British system, which is, in a great measure, perfect, and our system, so far as it has gone, with a view to ascertain to what extent we could benefit ours by embodying such features of the British system as might be considered applicable to our condition."

"Might I ask the result of that conference?"

"After a general interchange of opinion, and full discussion, we were constrained to reach the conclusion that, while the British system in all its entirety might not suit our navy, there were portions of it which we could profitably introduce. Based upon the conclusion thus reached, our system will be immediately established upon such a foundation as shall secure the object designed, in the best and speediest mode. It will be applicable to the boys now enlisted, some of whom are already competent to go to sea, until the whole of them are so, when they will be sent into the cruisers, to make room for others; but if in the meantime the system receives the further approbation of Congress, and authority is given for the purpose, the enlistments will continue until the navy is thoroughly Americanized."

"Will you discharge boys before they reach twenty-one years of age, Mr. Secretary?"

"No, sir. Boys will not be discharged from the service until they have reached twenty-one years of age, except upon a medical survey, inaptitude for the service, or for misconduct; while those injured in the service, or having contracted a disease in the line of duty, will be entitled to the benefits of a pension."

"Do you experience any difficulty in getting boys?"

"None whatever. We are very particular about the class of boys. We decline to receive them from reformatories, and endeavor to procure them from the better classes of the community with a view to introducing a safer and more moral element."

"Have you succeeded?"

"So far, admirably well. The boys are healthy, satisfied, and in good spirits; do their work cheerfully and seem devoted to it. They progress with wonderful rapidity—so much so, that during the recent mustering at Hampton Roads, while they were required to go through divers naval evolutions—hauling canvas, firing off big guns, passing in review in military drill at the fort, running up the masts and shrouds of the ships, setting and hauling in sails, and everything pertaining to the duties of a seaman, not a single mistake was observed, and not a single boy was hurt. The military drill held at the parade grounds of the fort, where there were over one thousand boys present, was not only a beautiful sight, but entirely satisfactory, eliciting the approbation not only of the officers of the navy, but that of the officers of the army who witnessed it."

"Have you had any deserters, Mr. Secretary?"

"The percentage is not one-tenth in proportion to what it is in England. It is only now and then that a boy deserts."

"How about your punishments?"

"The punishment is on a much lesser scale than in the army. We have no severe punishments. We seek to govern by mild means, taking care never to break a boy's spirit, or crush his ambition. Our instructors," added the Secretary, "are most carefully selected, having regard to special attainments, and they need not necessarily be officers in the United States Navy."

In conclusion the Secretary said: "As the system is now necessarily crude, and as there has been no effort made till this recent one to throw it into harmony and produce unity of action, it is proposed, with as little delay as possible, to give it that harmony by establishing regulations and rules which shall control the working on all the ships, and make the training of all the boys the same, so that, although they may be trained in different ships, when they come together on the cruisers they will find that they all work alike and have had the same tuition. Yes, by this system, sir, we will thoroughly Americanize the navy."

Mr. Secretary Thompson is intensely in earnest, enamored of his subject, and resolved, so far as it lies in his power, to sustain the project so successfully begun.

RECEPTION OF GENERAL GRANT IN PHILADELPHIA.

IN view of the vastness of the demonstration in honor of General Grant in Philadelphia, it was a most fortunate thing that Tuesday, December 16th, was a clear and pleasant day. The programme, as announced in our last issue, was carried out. Mayor Stokley and the reception committee met the city's guest at Germantown Junction, and formally bade him welcome. At 10:20 General Grant and the Mayor entered a handsome barouche, drawn by four blooded bays, caparisoned in white harness. A coachman and footman, in full livery of blue, occupied the box. On the left lapel of the General's overcoat was pinned a copper veteran badge. The route was taken up to Broad Street, where the barouche stopped. At 10:38, two minutes before the fixed hour, a battery which had been stationed on the heights near by thundered forth a salute of twenty-one guns, and the head of the procession began to move. The moving column, which was more than twelve miles in length, was admirably managed. It occupied six hours in passing any one point. The military display included about seven thousand men, and the Grand Army of the Republic turned out eight thousand strong. Much of the success of the parade as a pageant was due to the thorough preparation of the committee, many of whom were old army officers. The route led down through Thirteenth Street for a few squares, so that the column could be brought to pass before the Union League Club's building, on the corner of Broad and Sansome Streets. Opposite that point a reviewing stand was erected, at which General Grant arrived at 2:38, and alighted. He was received by George H. Boker, President of the Union League Club, assisted by James L. Claghorn, of the Guests' Committee. As the parade swept by for two hours longer, loud cheering was indulged in by the men composing the column in the belief that the city's guest was there. The fact was, however, that, fatigued by the labors of the day and oppressed by cold, General Grant had been considerately conducted through the crowd at 4:32 to the Union League Club House, where an impromptu reception was accorded to a few friends.

A feature of the first portion of the procession—one in which General Grant evinced special interest—was the Pennsylvania soldiers' orphans, a large body of tiny soldiers, who marched and saluted like little veterans. The Second Division comprised the veterans of 1812, toothless old fellows, who pulled their hats clear off their heads when they saw the General, and a seemingly unending string of the Grand Army of the Republic Posts, white and colored. Nearly every man carried a banneret, which gave a very pretty general effect. One of the local posts had "Old Baldy," General Meade's warhorse, now twenty-six years old, walking with them in line, saddled and accoutred, but riderless. The Third Division was composed of the show wagons and employés of the manufacturers of textile fabrics. The Fourth, of political and social clubs. The Fifth, of workers in iron and steel. The Sixth and Seventh, of ship-builders. The eighth, of other workers in wood. The Ninth, of representatives of the clothing, boots and shoes, millinery and tobacco trades. The Tenth, of paper manufacturers and kindred trades. The Eleventh of pottery and brick-makers and marble-workers. The Twelfth, of the paint, oil and soap dealers. The Thirteenth, of the employés of the State, National and Municipal Governments. The Fourteenth, of secret, religious and benevolent organizations. The Fifteenth, of temperance and similar organizations. The Sixteenth, of workers and dealers in produce. The Seventeenth, of brewers and distillers. The Eighteenth, of butchers. The Nineteenth of telegraph and express employés. The Twentieth, of citizens generally, in carriages, on horseback and on foot. The employés of the Philadelphia Mint had with them the first steam coining-press used in the Mint. They struck off and distributed among the crowd copies of a medal, bearing on one side a bust of the General, surrounded by the words, "Ulysses S. Grant," and on the other the following inscription, "Struck and Distributed in the Municipal Parade by the Employés of the United States Mint, Philadelphia, December, 1879," surrounding the coat-of-arms of the city. A feature of the procession, which required the raising of several arches and telegraph-wires, was the huge model, built in six days, of the steamship, City of Paris, on which General Grant returned from Europe. This was constructed at John Roach's shipyard, in Chester, and was followed by 1,000 employés and a fine military band.

The confectionery trade was well represented by a wagon drawn by four gray horses, on which was all the machinery for making candy in active operation. With long white apron and paper cap, the man drew out link after link of sweetness, and distributed them to the eager throng. Unique chromo-cards, drawn expressly for this occasion, were also scattered broadcast. The well-known firm of Croft, Wilbur & Co., of 1,326 Market Street, the largest manufacturing confectioners in the country, and employing 300 hands, deserve great credit for the display.

In passing the hardware house of Lloyd, Supplee & Co., near the corner of Sixth and Market Streets, General Grant was saluted by a ringing serenade, furnished by several hundred bells in the hands of the people, who filled every window of the four-story structure. It was a surprise to the General, and he smiled as he raised his hat.

Henry Disston & Sons uniformed all their employés, to the number of 1,200, and paraded three wagons, showing their saws. On one wagon, drawn by six gray horses, was the famous Centennial saw, 100 inches in diameter; on another, was their show-case, which was at the Paris Exposition, where they received the first prize awarded to saw manufacturers. The circular saw in the centre, shown in our illustration, was in motion. There was a hose-carriage, with a revolving circular and a "one-man cross-cut" in rapid motion. A portable steam engine, with a bell and steam whistle, cleared the track.

A centre of attraction for the sightseers was Wanamaker's arch, and the profusely, lavishly, decorated store, which, in a front view, is partially concealed, but which was one of the finest spectacles on Chestnut Street, near Ninth. The arch, measuring thirty feet in the clear, was covered with white muslin, which served merely as a ground-work for the greetings and the green; on the east side, inscriptions relating to the completion by the city's illustrious guest of his journey round the world, and to the sincerity of the popular welcome. These greetings read thus: "Philadelphia's farewell, steamer Indiana, May 1st, 1877—To-day completes the journey round the world—and Philadelphia's glad welcome, December 16th, 1879." Underneath was suspended a horseshoe made of evergreens. On the west side were the words, "To the honors of Europe, Asia and Africa and the affections of America"; below was a wreath containing the letter "G"; and above the arch floated a banner bearing the words, "No place like home."

In front of John Wanamaker's Grand Depot, at Thirteenth and Market streets, a large platform, holding about 2,000 persons, was filled with the employés. The decorations on this building were tasteful and elaborate, and reflect credit on Mr. W. P. Miller, who is specially employed by the house in its art department. On the side of the arch not shown in our illustration, the motto was: "All Honor to the Hero of the Nineteenth Century." The white marble front of the carpet warerooms of McCallum, Crease & Sloan was very conspicuous on account of the exceeding modest taste in its decoration. A compact group of very large flags—American, English, French, Danish, Swiss, Brazilian and German—was draped over the front entrance, and in the large windows some of the finest color effects in stuffs and carpets, of their manufacture, served to show the character of their goods as well as the entire absence of any desire to use the occasion for advertising purposes.

A. L. Heimbold's Temple of Pharmacy, opposite the Girard House, was sufficiently superb to do honor to the occasion, though the crowd of beautiful ladies and bright-eyed children behind the large plate-glass windows prevented the passing throng from looking at the artistic appearance of the interior. As the procession halted from time to time eager glances were cast to the immense fountain where soda in Summer and famous hot coffee with cream in Winter, are dispensed in such quantities that the door is often blocked. In one of the windows over this store Mrs. Grant viewed the greater part of the parade. At no place along the entire route was the crowd more dense than at the corner of Eighth and Market Streets. The immense building of Strawbridge & Clothier, which firm is both the A. T. Stewart and the Macy of Philadelphia, towering high above the other buildings, made a striking background to the moving picture. A large flag floating from a flag-pole on the top, and one draped in the form of a shield in the front, were conspicuous though modest. The windows were filled with the employés and their friends, and, as they waved bright-colored and white handkerchiefs to do honor to the "Nation's Guest," it seemed as if the building itself was alive and in motion. The Girard House, at the corner of Ninth and Chestnut streets, now in charge of Mr. McKibbin, for many years the proprietor of the old Merchants' Hotel, was covered with flags and bunting. From nearly every window the national emblem waved; every balcony and even the roof was utilized for seating purposes. A large portrait of General Grant on horseback hung over the front door, surrounded with laurel and evergreen.

The display of the Schomacker Gold String Piano Manufacturing Company is shown passing the warerooms on Chestnut Street. It was headed by a full brass band in uniform, followed by two hundred of the employés in line. Then came a handsomely decorated car, drawn by six white horses, and bearing a magnificent grand piano, finished in the most elaborate style, of polished inlaid hard wood. It was built to order at a cost of $2,500. The display of this company attracted great attention throughout the route.

In the evening the streets were brightly illuminated by calcium lights, and crowded with people. General Grant and his wife dined with Mr. and Mrs. George W. Childs, where they met a number of the ex-Presidents's old Cabinet. An informal reception was then held, after which the General and wife retired to their rooms in the hotel.

BRIGHT-EYES.

BRIGHT-EYES, the eloquent daughter of the Poncas, lounged, after the fashion of Sarah Bernhardt, in a large easy-chair, in a cozy parlor of the Fifth Avenue Hotel. She was attired in a blood-red morning wrapper, which draped itself in willowy curves over her lissome form. At her neck hung an ivory cross; on two of the slender fingers of her left hand were rings of plain gold. Her face is a delicate oval, her complexion olive, her hair the color of the raven's wing. Her eyes are black and lustrous; her lips red and delicately curved, while her teeth are simply perfection. She is eighteen years of age, two of which were spent at school in New Jersey, during which she learned to speak English quite accurately. She received me with indolent grace.

"The story of the wrongs done by the Government to my people I never tire of repeating," she exclaimed, and she narrated in burning words how the Poncas had been driven by the Government from the reservation, and compelled, because they were the weaker tribe, to give up the homes of their fathers to the Sioux. That four treaties, entered into between the Poncas and the United States Government, had been shamefully broken, and that Standing Bear—who, by-the-way, sat in the room like a waxen figure during the interview—had been put in irons for endeavoring to return to his home with some thirty of the children of his people, in order to escape the terrible disease that was ravaging the country to which it pleased the Government to drive the Poncas.

"All we want is justice," passionately exclaimed Bright-Eyes. "We want to be protected by the laws, and to get legal possession of the lands that have been always our own. We are the only tribe that has no title to the land. We want a title such as the Union Pacific Railroad has. I am here with Standing Bear to appeal to public opinion, and public opinion will force Congress to yield us justice. General Harney," she added, "says that he never knew an Indian tribe to break a treaty, and never knew the Government to keep one."

Passing to less exciting topics, I asked Miss Bright-Eyes if she would wish to live amongst us here.

"No, no, no!" she cried, clasping her hands together—her voice is low and musical—"You are very grand down here, but all that man can do never can equal nature. I long for the prairie, for the glorious abandon of my home-life."

"You do not wear the Indian garments?"

"No; my father wishes us to wear those of civilization. My mother wears them, though, and last harvest we girls put them on as they are so much more comfortable to work in. You should see our boys—our bucks—at a meeting at the mission-school. It is one garden of color, beads and feathers and blankets. Oh, they look splendid, they do!"

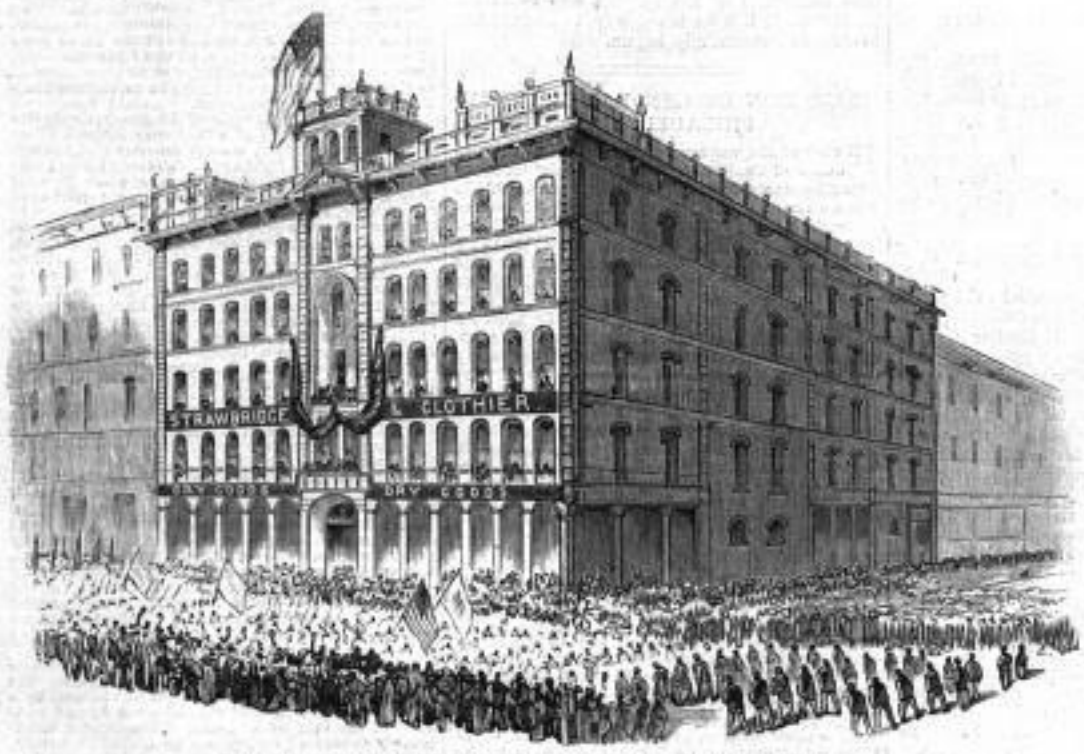
"Would you object to marrying an American?" I asked.

"What a question!" bursting into a fit of ringing laughter. "Well, I think I would prefer to marry one of my own people. We Indian girls are kept awfully strict. We are not allowed to speak to any man save our father, uncle or brother; but," she added, with an arch smile, "we manage to do so."

"How is that done?" I asked, becoming deeply interested in the subject.

"Well, suppose a girl has to go to the well for water, or outside the village for a walk. We generally go about in twos and threes. When a girl is being courted, and the parents of the boy are willing, his parents send horses to the girl's parents, which are returned when the girl goes to her new home. She always goes to the home of her husband's parents at first. A present of an animal, ready prepared for eating, is sent with the bride—generally a deer; but as our boys have not been on the hunt for the last three years, a sheep is substituted. Then a dance follows."

"I suppose the Indian girls talk about a coming dance as our American girls do?"



"Just as much, and probably more," laughed Bright-Eyes. "Oh, how delightful it is to go on the hunt!" she enthusiastically exclaimed—"to be away from two to three months riding after the buffalo. And then, in the evening, to sit by the fire and listen to the boys telling stories of the hunt, while the children play around—all the while on the lookout for the Sioux, who are at war with us. Our people have given up hunting," she said, sadly. "Every year there are more houses and more white people, and the Indians do not want the white people."

Having alluded to the recent Ute trouble—

"The Indians only scalp those whom they kill on the battle-field. All captives are treated well. We know that Miss Meeker and that party were quite safe once they were made captive."

She laughed scornfully when I spoke of the efforts being made by the Department of the Interior in behalf of the Indians, and flouted the notion of the Indian police.

"We have had Indian police for ever so many years, and what good have they done us? A hundred horses have been stolen by white men in two years from my tribe and my father knows the white man who has stolen a favorite hunter. The Sioux have had a thousand horses stolen. Bah! Indian Bureau! Mr. Schurz is an ignoramus!"

After a very pleasant chat on many topics, I took my leave of Bright-Eyes, and, as I descended in the elevator, I thought of John Smith, nor wondered that he had been so badly hit by the bright eyes of Pocahontas.

"WATER-TOWER" FOR FIRES IN HIGH BUILDINGS.

A NEW apparatus has been adopted by the Fire Commissioners of New York City, designed to enable firemen to control the flames in the upper part of high buildings which the longest ladders will not reach. It consists of a number of tubes working one within the other on the telescope principle, supported on a heavy truck. Reaching the scene of a fire in upper stories, the tubes are projected to a sufficient height, connection is made with an engine by hose, and the water turned on. The "water-tower," as it is called, is easily controlled by the men.

The Moneyed Classes.

STATISTICS lately collected in one of the oldest New England cities showed that ninety-four per cent. of the leading men of this city were either farmers' boys or poor boys in the cities and villages. The list included all the bank presidents, the railroad magnates and the leading manufacturers and merchants. Forty years ago "the moneyed class" of one particular city were hoeing corn, or tending lathes, or peddling newspapers: forty years ago these "bloated bondholders" were not a plethoric race, and it is highly improbable that any considerable portion of the money which they now possess will be in the hands of their grandchildren. The "moneyed aristocracy" of the next generation are growing up now on the farms and in the factories.

What is true of this one city is substantially true of every other city. The fortunes that are continued in the same family for a hundred years are very few: what one generation gathers another generation scatters: the wealth of the land is constantly changing hands, and the boy who belongs to what are called the working classes has quite as good a chance of becoming a "bloated bondholder" before he dies as the boy who is born with a silver spoon in his mouth.

With these facts in view, is it not rather wicked for demagogues to try to excite the alarm of the people who work with their hands, lest they should be enslaved by this formidable and tyrannical "moneyed class?" There is no such "class." A consolidated and hereditary aristocracy of wealth does not exist. The great bulk of the wealth of this country is now in the hands of men who were born poor. Is it likely that they will combine to oppress and enslave those who are toiling up from the level on which they started. Is it possible that they should so combine, in any effectual way, seeing that their future control of the property which now they call their own must be so very slight?

And would it not be a foolish and suicidal thing for the poor men of this country to combine to overthrow a system of government which promotes such a rapid distribution of wealth, and which offers such abundant chances to them and their children? When the Communists and the Socialistic reformers urge that all property rights must be annulled and that some new industrial and proprietary scheme must be inaugurated, just call their attention to the facts recited above and ask them whether under any other system the children of the poor would have a better chance than they have under the present system.

A Great River in Alaska.

ALASKAN explorers report one of the largest rivers in the world, the Yukon, as navigable for steamers 2,500 miles, and at 500 miles from its mouth it receives a very large navigable tributary. The basin formed by the confluence is 24 miles wide. The Yukon is nearly as large as our Mississippi. Indians are everywhere, and war between tribes is continuous. There is snow for six months, and without roads dog-sledges find good traveling. Game abounds and Indians have an easy life. From seven to nine dogs make a team, the odd one being the leader. The driver has to watch this dog. If it get on the scent of game it is off, and the whole team is demoralized. Off they scamper through woods and thickets, upsetting the load, smashing the sled, tearing the harness, and giving the driver days of hunting to restore the status quo. So vast a country, traversed by navigable waters, will soon tempt restless and speculative adventurers to explore it.

French Country Life.

FRENCH country hospitality differs in many respects from English. More is made of each guest, and he or she is allowed greater personal liberty. Nobody is bound to come down to an early breakfast. The host and hostess are not expected to show themselves before the bell rings at eleven or half-past eleven for déjeuner. If you see a lady muffled up walking in the grounds you are not to get in her way unless she comes toward you; and in walking with her you are not to offer her your arm. The reason she is to be avoided until she shows herself sociably disposed is based upon the supposition that she is not, perhaps, made up for the day, and has, while the femme de chambre is preparing the war paint and arranging the artificial tresses, run out with a cordnse thrown on her head to enjoy the dewy freshness of morning. In France there is a well-bred fiction which is generally acted upon by millionaires who invite you to their country seats. It is that in accepting the invitation you do him the greatest honor. You may be poor as Job, and known to be so, without in the slightest degree ceasing to benefit by this fiction. French society, when seen at its best, practices equality. All rise early, the mornings are very fine, and there are delightful walks and drives in all directions. The déjeuner is served at little oval tables in a great dining room. When there are from thirty to forty persons to be served, this is more sociable and jolly than ample board. Talk can be brisk and lively without becoming noisy. Mere acquaintances become easily a good deal more. If your vis-à-vis be charming and sympathetic, he gives out what is most taking in the inner man. He is less constrained than if exposed to the scrutiny of two scores of eyes. At those little tables birds of a feather do flock together. There is the same concert pitch; and where there is opposition it does not induce discord.

The Remembrancer—A Novel London Official.

AMONG the numerous staff of officers reveled in by the Corporation of London is one designated by the curious name of Remembrancer, an officer whose duty it is (in addition to "remembering," or reminding the mayor of his appointments, from which the name) to attend in Parliament daily during the session to watch the city interest, and to see that no bill affecting the Corporation in any shape or form is allowed to pass without being submitted to the judgment of his employers. This officer is highly paid; his salary is £1,500, but in addition to that he is allowed very large sums of money, which he expends in the interest of the city in pursuit of his vocation. These allowances of pocket-money range between £2,000 and £4,000 a year. In the city accounts no particulars whatever are given which would show how this money is spent. But the fact is, we believe, that the principal part of it is spent down about the House of Commons in entertaining members. In the year 1694, Sir John Trevor, Speaker of the House of Commons, was expelled from that House for accepting a present of £1,000 from the city for his exertions in passing a Bill promoted by the Corporation—and most properly, too. The spirit pervading the Corporation remains ever the same; and though they dare not at this day put a thousand-pound note into the hands of a member, they fancy that a luncheon or a dinner will answer the same purpose. That this city officer should be allowed the use of the dining-rooms of the House of Commons for the purpose of enlisting defenders of what he and his employers deem the privileges of the city by so contemptible a means as "feeding," is not very creditable. And that there are to be found members who are ever glad to accept this subordinate's invitation does not add to the dignity of the House. Nor is this business solely confined to the Remembrancer. It was only during a recent session that the sheriffs (in the exercise of an ancient privilege) went down in state to Westminister to present personally to the House a petition against a motion down in the paper in the name of Mr. Charles Lewis and relating to the Irish Society, which having been done in "solemn form," they invited a large number of members to dine with them within the precincts.

A Rubber-producing Insect.

AN insect which produces a species of India-rubber has been recently discovered in the district of Yucatan, Central America, by an American explorer. It is called nen, and belongs to the Coccus family; feeds on the mango-tree, and swarms in these regions. It is of considerable size, yellowish-brown in color, and emits a peculiar oily odor. The body of the insect contains a large proportion of grease, which is highly prized by the natives for applying to the skin on account of its medicinal properties. When exposed to the heat the lighter oils of the grease volatilize, leaving a tough wax behind, which resembles shellac, and may be used for making a varnish or lacquer. When burnt, this wax produces a thick, semi-fluid mass, like a solution of India-rubber, and it is expected that this glutinous liquid will be very valuable for cement and water-proofing.

Old Glass.

THE oldest specimen of pure glass bearing anything like a date is a little molded lion's head, bearing the name of an Egyptian king of the eleventh dynasty, in the Slade collection at the British Museum. That is to say, at a period which may be moderately placed at more than 3000 years B. C., glass was not only made, but made with a skill which shows that the art was nothing new. The invention of glazing pottery with a film or varnish of glass is so old that among the fragments which bear inscription of the early Egyptian monarchy are beads possibly of the first dynasty. Of later glass there are numerous examples, such as a bead found at Thebes, which has the name of Queen Hatasso or Hashep, of the eighteenth dynasty. Of the same period are vases and goblets and many fragments. It cannot be doubted that the story prepared by Pliny, which assigns the credit of the invention to the Phœnicians, is so far true that these adventurous merchants brought specimens to other countries from Egypt. Dr. Schliemann found disks of glass in the excavations at Mycenæ, though Homer does not mention it as a substance known to him. That the modern art of the glass-blower was known long before is certain from representations among the pictures on the walls of a tomb at Beni-Hassen, of the twelfth Egyptian dynasty; but a much older picture, which probably represented the same manufacture, is among the half-obliterated scenes in a chamber of the tomb of Thy at Sakkara, and dates from the time of the fifth dynasty, a time so remote that it is not possible, in spite of the assiduous researches of many Egyptologers, to give it a date in years.

How Long Animals Live.

THE average age of cats is fifteen years; of squirrels and hares, seven to eight years; rabbits, seven; a bear rarely exceeds twenty years; a dog lives twenty years, a wolf twenty, a fox fourteen to sixteen; lions are long-lived, the one known by the name of Pompey living to the age of seventy. Elephants have been known to live to the great age of 400 years. When Alexander the Great had conquered Porus, King of India, he took a great elephant, which had fought valiantly for the king, and named him Ajax, dedicated him to the sun, and let him go with this inscription, "Alexander, the son of Jupiter, dedicated Ajax to the sun." The elephant was found with this inscription 350 years after. Pigs have been known to live to the age of twenty, and the rhinoceros to twenty-nine; a horse has been known to live to the age of sixty-two, but averages twenty-five to thirty; camels sometimes live to the age of 100; stags are very long livers; sheep seldom exceed the age of ten; cows live about fifteen years. Cuvier considers it probable that whales sometimes live 1,000 years. The dolphin and porpoise attain the age of thirty; an eagle died at Vienna at the age of 104; ravens frequently reach the age of 100; swans have been known to live 300 years. Mr. Malcolm has the skeleton of a swan that attained the age of 200 years. Pelicans are long-lived. A tortoise has been known to live to the age of 107 years.

The Population of Africa.

IT cannot be expected for many years yet to have anything like accurate statistics on the population of Africa. Several regions, the population of which is certainly great, will probably long escape anything like a thorough examination. There are, for example, in the regions of the Great Lakes, countries quite as thickly peopled as many of the States of Europe. Stanley tells us of countries of relatively small extent, and which yet possess millions of inhabitants. When we shall have succeeded in making an approximate census of all the populations, we shall probably reach a figure considerably higher than the present estimate. Some authorities accord to Africa not more than 100,000,000 inhabitants; others less still. German geographers suppose that Africa contains somewhat more than 200,000,000 inhabitants; the latest English publications estimate the population at 186,000,000, which, for an area, of 11,500,000 square miles, gives an average of 16 inhabitants per square mile, or a specific population 11½ times less than that of France. Africa, which has 57 times the area of France, has probably scarcely 8 times the population. The suppression of the slave trade and the influence of European civilization may lead to an increase of population very rapid and very great. It should be observed that the approximate figure of the specific population, applied to the whole of the African continent, will not give a just idea of the compact character of the population of the interior. According to Behna, the negro regions are by far the most populous parts of the continent. If the populations are sparse in the desert parts, they are very dense in other regions. Thus, in the Soudan, the population is estimated at 80,000,000, or about 53 per square mile; the town of Ilida, on the Niger, has a population of 80,000 inhabitants. The population of East Africa is estimated at about 30,000,000, and that of Equatorial Africa at 40,000,000. One of the latest authorities divides the population of Africa as follows among the great families into which ethnologists have divided the peoples: Negroes, 130,000,000; Hamites, 20,000,000; Bantus, 13,000,000; Fulahs, 8,000,000; Nubians, 1,500,000; Hottentots, 50,000. This would give a total population of 172,550,000. These figures are, of course, only approximate, and may be much modified by new and more precise information. The Bantus, for example, who, according to F. M. Müller, form at least one-quarter of the population of Africa, might be found to number 50,000,000.

Chambers of the French Senate.

THE Luxembourg Palace, where the Senate of the French Republic met for the first time in November, was built in 1612 by Marie de Médicis, and made over by her to her son, Gaston d'Orléans, when she was sent into exile through the influence of Cardinal Richelieu. At his death the palace became the property of his daughters, Mlle. de Montpensier and Elizabeth de Guise, by the last named of whom it was made over to Louis XIV., and so became crown property. The regent, Duke of Orleans, allowed his daughter, the Duchess de Berry, to occupy it; and from 1733 to the Revolution it was the residence of several princes, the last occupant being the Comte de Provence, afterwards Louis XVIII. When he fled from France, the Palais du Luxembourg was converted into a prison, and among the persons confined there, and afterwards guillotined, were the Vicomte Beauharnais, first husband of the Empress Josephine, and General de Broglie, grandfather of the present duke; while a year or two later it was from the Luxembourg that Danton, Camille Desmoulins, and others were led out to execution. The Directory had its official residence there in 1795, as after the ninth Thermidor the Luxembourg had ceased to be a prison; while, after the eighteenth Brumaire, Napoleon had the words, "Palace of the Directory" effaced and "Palace of the Consulate" engraved in their stead over the central portico. Soon afterwards the decree of the Council of Five Hundred allotted the Luxembourg as the seat of the Conservative Senate; and when, in 1814, Louis XVIII. re-established the Chamber of Peers, the Luxembourg was chosen as their residence, and up to 1848 the palace was used for the same purpose; while after the coup d'état of 1851 the Imperial Senate held its sittings there until the war of 1870 and the revolution of September 4th swept away empire and Senate together. A great deal of damage was done to the palace during the Communist insurrection, since which time it has been the official residence of the Prefect of the Seine; and within the last eight years a sum of £60,000 has been spent upon repairs and alterations. The return of the Senate to Paris has necessitated the further expenditure of £30,000, most of which has been required for fitting up the chamber in which the Senate will sit, and for providing committee rooms and accommodations for the press. The grand staircase, leading to what was formerly the throne-room and to the senatorial chamber, has been redecorated, and the imperial eagles have been replaced by the letters R. F. (Republique Française).

An Electric Executioner.

THE adoption of electricity as a mode of capital punishment has enthusiastic advocates in Germany, as well as in France and the United States, as witness the following imposing description of a method proposed by a German writer: "In a dark room, draped with black, and which is lighted only by a single torch—the chamber of execution—there shall stand an iron image of Justice, with her scales and sword. Stern justice is popularly supposed to have no bowels, but the German goddess will carry a powerful battery in her inside; and this battery will be connected with an armchair—the seat of death. In front of the chair shall stand the judge's tribunal, and only the judge, jury, and other officers shall be present with the criminal during the ceremony of the execution. This will consist in the judge reading the story of the crime committed by the prisoner, who will be rigidly manacled to the aforesaid armchair, and when this is done, the judge will break his rod of office, and toss it into one of the scale-pans of justice, at the same time extinguishing the solitary torch. The descent of the pan will complete the electric circuit, and shock the wretch into the next world."

Heidelberg.

AS AN educational resort Heidelberg is unrivaled. The best instruction in every branch of science, literature and art may be obtained there at a comparatively nominal cost, varying from a florin to a florin and a half per lesson, and the same consideration for limited budgets is observable in the charges for medical attendance, the fee of an ordinary practitioner being thirty kreutzers, and in no case exceeding a florin. Provisions are fairly good and cheap. The most delicious breakfast-rolls I ever tasted are made by a baker in the vicinity of the Prinz Carl Hotel, and in the season hares, partridges, and even quarters of chevreuil are hawked about the streets in abundance; fruit (especially grapes and black cherries) and vegetables are plentiful and moderate in price; and meat, though as a rule answering to what the French butchers term the "second category," is certainly not inferior to that usually met with in other parts of Southern Germany. Fish, on the contrary, is scarce and dear; the small supply of trout from the Wolfsbrunnen, and the few samples of Rhine salmon that occasionally find their way into the market, being entirely monopolized by the hotel proprietors; and with respect to poultry, unless the present specimens have forfeited the reputation of their predecessors for ubiquity and toughness, perhaps the less said the better. The ordinary wines of the country, Markgrafler and Affenthaler, are wholesome and palatable, and average from 12c. to 20c. a bottle; and it is worth while to dine now and then at the Prinz Carl, for the sake of indulging in a peculiar nectar of which that far-famed establishment has the specialty, called Foster-Tramin. A serious item in the family expenditure during the Winter months is that of firewood, which is brought into the town in carts from the neighboring woods, and sold at the rate of about 30 florins a load; fresh supplies of this indispensable commodity arrive daily from September to April, and the wood being drier and cheaper at the commencement of the Autumn than it is towards Christmas, prudent house-holders are in the habit of laying in a stock long before they are likely to require it.

England's Day of Trouble.

A LONDON correspondent writes: "England is having some severe lessons in all directions. None severer than those which America is teaching her. The ship-loads of live and dead stock which continue to arrive from the United States, the cargoes of canned meats and other foods that pour in upon us from the West, have helped to bring about a condition of things in the agricultural districts which presents a problem no one seems to understand or be able to solve. Farming no longer pays in England. Growing wheat is a losing game; there is no profit in grazing; American beef is as good as English. It is cheaper, and finds as ready a retail sale as English. Foreign wheat keeps down the price of English, however bad the season may have been. Farmers are going to the wall all over the land. There have never been known so many bankruptcies among corn-growers and cattle-producers. In addition to foreign competition, the seasons have been destructive. Roots have failed, beans have been cut up by Winter winds, lands have been flooded. The prospects of the next season do not improve. Landlords here and there are reducing their rents. Laborers are emigrating. Agriculture is passing through a crisis. When it is over many small farmers will have been utterly ruined, and possibly large capitalists will take their places, and the holdings be largely increased. It will be necessary that landlords shall generally reduce their rents and foster their farms by a better equipment of them, and a broad and liberal encouragement for tenants to put their money into the soil in the way of drainage and manures. The Earl of Aberdeen has set a good example by making an abatement in the rent of his grass lands of from 20 to 40 per cent. The system of revaluing farms on the tenants improvements will have to be revised, and a generous system of 'live and let live' must prevail before the English farmer can begin to compete with the agriculturists of Western America, with their almost free prairie lands. As in manufactures, so it must be in agriculture—a long course of economy and industry alone will put the farmer on a level with his American competitor. Improved machinery, large holdings, better buildings, a more scientific treatment of the land and its produce, lower rents, a freer labor, a more independent peasantry—these are the leading features of the new method which alone can overcome the present gloom, the present stagnation and depression."

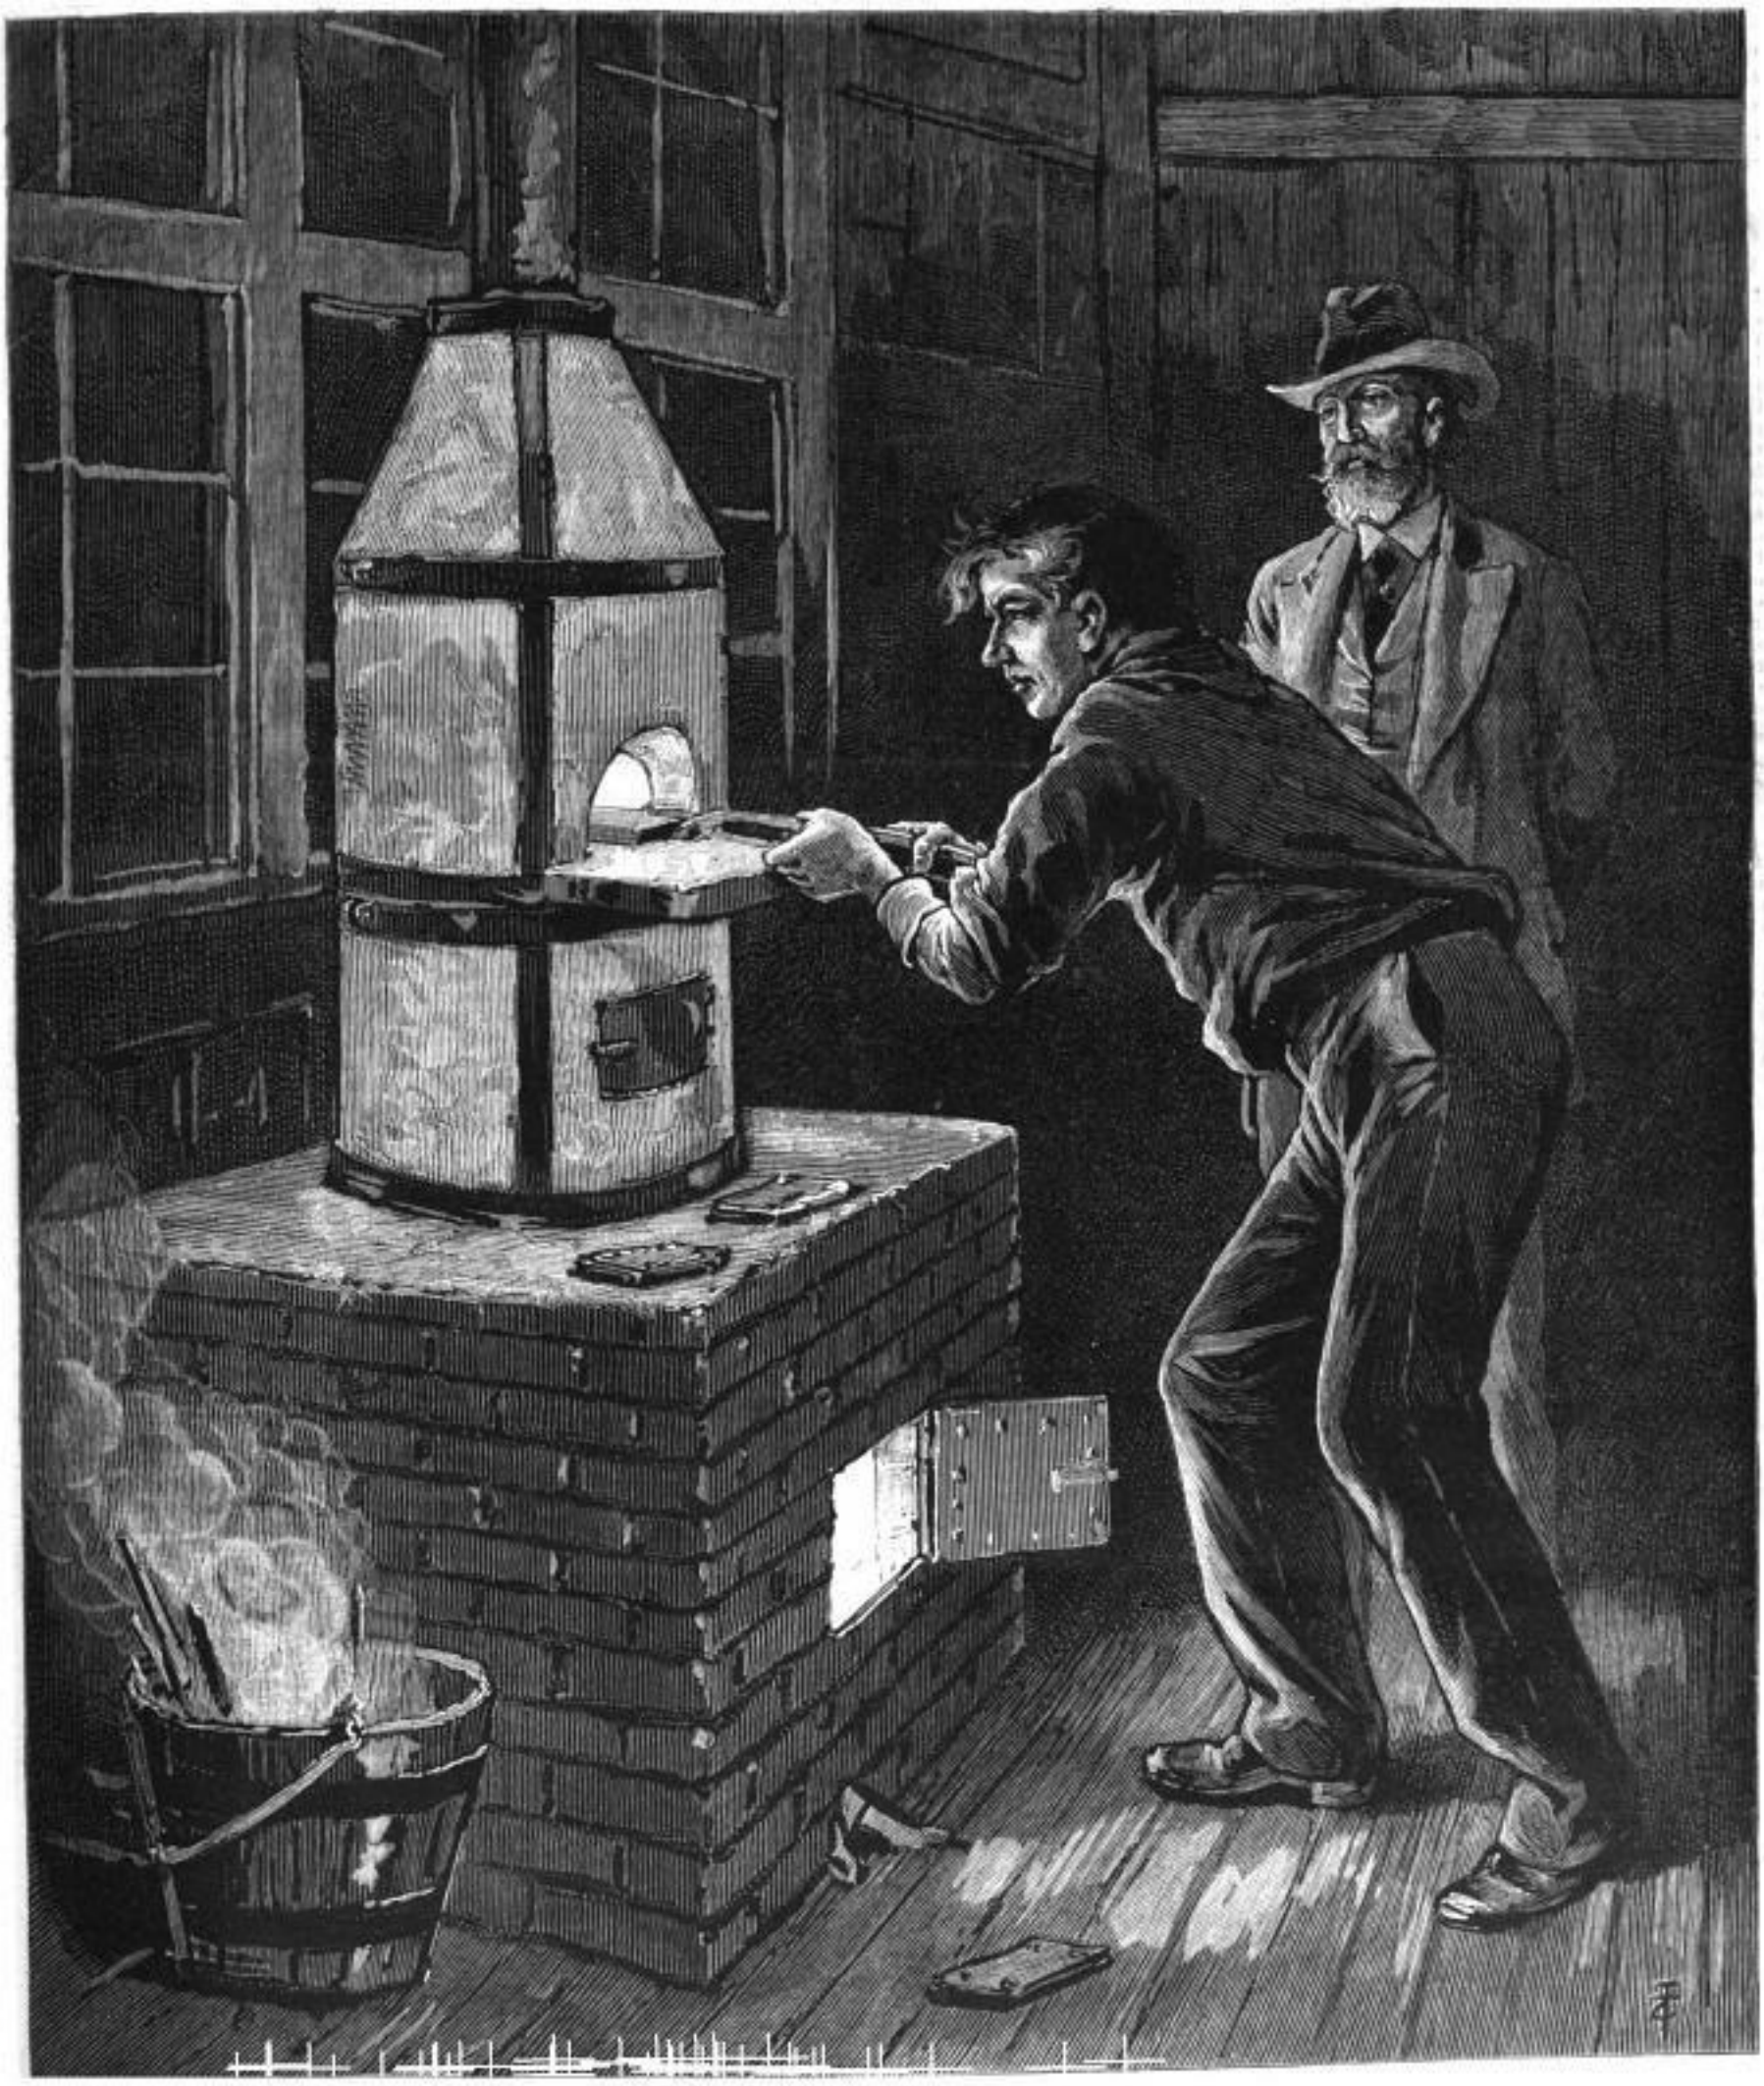
Glass Wicks for Lamps.

A WICK for lamps is now manufactured entirely of glass by an establishment in Hanau, Germany. It is designed chiefly for use in petroleum and spirit lamps; and, with an equal amount of the wick turned up, it gives a much brighter light than cotton wick. In the spirit lamp, too, it is found to greatly increase the heat of the flame. No sparks are given off by this incombustible wick, nor does the light flare in draughts to the extent which it does with a burning wick; hence it makes the lamp safer. The smoking is also reduced, and it is stated that ten per cent. of oil is saved by its use. Of course, the disagreeable task of trimming the lamp is rendered unnecessary, for, being of glass, the wick does not consume, but wastes away very slightly by fusion.

On the Education of Princes.

GREAT attention is now being paid all over the Continent to the education of princes. It is felt everywhere that kings are no longer reverenced simply for being, and that they must possess, if not great qualities—which, unfortunately for monarchy, cannot be put into human beings by any machine, however skillfully devised—at least the capacity to make the best of what they have. The tendency, therefore, is to over-educate, to teach too many things, to utilize time too much, and, above all, to impart too many languages. The "Governors" are too conscientious, and too much penetrated with admiration for the knowledge which they seldom themselves possess. The effect of the system, which has occasionally, as in Austria, been carried very far, would be to produce student kings or literary kings, who would be very dangerous rulers, but that fortunately the two families, Catholic and Protestant, who compose the royal caste, have a fine resisting-power against instruction, and are not likely to be over-educated for their intellects. We may get here and there a Prince Albert on the throne, which would be a good thing, and here and there an efficient legislature, which would be an excellent thing, but the majority will be very like average young officers weighted with some sense of responsibility. But the courts of the Continent, though not very successful in their efforts, have seen that mental force, much knowledge, much experience, much habit of reflection, are the powers which are useful to kings, and would regard the theory that it was useful to teach the ruler of the fourth of the world how to hold on aloft, at the cost of years of time and separation from men and the educational machinery of his time, with amused amazement; and if Germans, perhaps with a query whether the 'Vikings' days were expected back again, or whether Rolf the Ranger would win a sovereignty now. The English think them wrong, but it may be feared they are right, and that the only advantages gained by making heirs-apparent into sailor boys are, that in England their future English subjects like it, and that sailors very rarely catch the royal mental disease which Englishmen, loyal as they are, would scarcely bear, solidarismus.

The Cologne Cathedral near Completion.



THE Cathedral of Cologne is at length approaching completion, and it is confidently stated that August next year will see the mighty minster finished. Begun in the very midst of the "ages of faith," when monarchs beggared themselves to raise magnificent structures, of which only picturesque ruins now remain for the world to look at, this extraordinary temple of the Christian faith lagged behind all its contemporaries in the work of construction, saw them reach their mature glory, decline and sink to ruin, itself being all the time an unfinished fabric. The first stone of Cologne Cathedral was laid in 1248, about the time when all the grandest ecclesiastical edifices now left, perfect or ruined, in Europe were either just finished, or, like Notre Dame in Paris, were in rapid progress; but while the most elaborate of them took only three centuries to bring to perfection, Cologne Minster has absorbed more than double the time, and is not finished yet. It is unnecessary to give all the reasons of this delay. Suffice it to mention that a "personage" not to be mentioned without extreme caution to ears polite hindered the work from the beginning with a pertinacity only natural, perhaps, under the circumstances, and that this supernatural "obstructionist" succeeded so far that only after the lapse of 632 years will the great fabric be hailed as a perfect Christian temple. It took nearly three centuries—that is, from 1248 to 1517—to complete the choir, and since that date it has required liberal aid from nearly all the sovereigns of Europe to keep the construction going. The cathedral is 510 feet long and 230 feet broad; the nave is supported by 100 columns, the four central of which are no less than 40 feet in circumference; the choir is 160 feet in height, and the two great towers are each 500 feet high. What now remains to be done is the last stage and crowning decoration of the stately towers. The massive caps of stonework have to be laid on, and then on their summits have to be fixed the gigantic "foliated crosses," almost 30 feet high, which are to crown the towers and proclaim to all the world the faith to which the work is dedicated. That done, Gothic architecture will be able to point to an acknowledged masterpiece, and the bones of the 11,000 virgins may rest quiet in their shrine.

The interview with Mr. Thurlow Weed, which links the past with the present, will be read with interest. His prognostication that the dark horse from the Illinois stable will win the Presidential race is worthy of note, while his recollections of "Gerrymandering," as applied to the Maine troubles, bear their own moral. New York seventy years ago, as described by Mr. Weed, is indeed a quaint old picture.

THE CIVIL SERVICE

CIVIL SERVICE, with its present abuses and needed reforms, forms no inconsiderable chapter in the recent Executive Message to Congress. The President points out that the gravity of the evils now afflicting the service has time and again been referred to in Executive messages; that they have frequently been discussed upon the floor of Congress, and that all political parties, acting in conventions, have, on more than one occasion, admitted the pressing necessity of reform. He draws a line of distinction between civil officers elected by the people and those appointed to fill subordinate stations by the Executive and heads of departments. The President and others holding elective positions—members of Congress, for instance—stand charged with the governing policy of the country, and are responsible to the body of electors, but the appointed subordinates under Government—the clerical force, in fact—are responsible to none except their superiors in official station. It is the duty of the latter, as the President holds, to obey the legal instructions of those upon whom authority devolves, and their best public service consists in the discharge of their functions irrespective of partisan politics. The duties of subordinates are the same, whatever party may be in power and whatever policy prevails. "As a consequence," says the President, "it follows that their tenure of office should not depend upon the prevalence of any policy or the supremacy of any party, but should be determined by their capacity to serve the people most usefully, quite irrespective of partisan interests." The President very properly insists that the authority of appointment and removal is not a perquisite which may be used to aid a friend or reward a partisan; that, on the contrary, it is a trust to be exercised in the public interest under all the safeguards which attend the obligation to apply the public funds only for public purposes.

While it is a principle of republican constitutional government that majorities should rule, or, in other words, declare and execute the policy of the country, yet minorities have a like interest in the Government, and rights which cannot be justly set aside or ignored. Hence, in discussing Civil Service Reform, the Executive declares that every citizen has an equal right to the honor and profit of entering the public service of his country and discrimination should only be limited to the measure of his character and capacity to make that service most useful to the people. The President clinches this truly fair proposition by saying: "Except in cases where upon just and recognized principles, as upon the theory of pensions, offices and promotions are bestowed as rewards for past services, their bestowal upon any theory which disregards personal merit is an act of injustice to the citizen as well as a breach of that trust subject to which the appointing power is held."

The Civil Service ideas promulgated by the Message are, in the main, judicious and worthy of wise statesmanship. Church and State are very properly divorced by the Constitution. In our judgment quite as good reasons exist for divorcing the Civil Service of the country from partisan politics. Parties are a necessity in the political world, even as sects seem to be a necessity in the religious world. Mankind are not so constituted as to be unanimous in tastes and opinions, and it is only through the discussion of differences that right can be made apparent and truth be made to prevail over error. But why should a political party control and monopolize the Civil Service any more than a sect, able to outvote all others? Why should the passport to Government employ lie through the Republican or Democratic parties? True, one or the other of these parties, as the majority, must give direction to governmental policy; but there the mission of party, as in the earliest days of the Republic, should end. The Civil Service, devoted as it is to carrying on the business details pertaining to the Government, belongs to the country, and should be managed for the good of the whole people rather than for the benefit of the party temporarily in power. The men who formed our system of government never intended, as proved by their subsequent practice, that party should appropriate the subordinate civil offices as spoils.

The Civil Service of the country, as we view it, has not the remotest connection with questions of public policy. The duties of department clerks, custom-house and postal employés, etc., are not varied by any change in the public mind as respects protection to industry, the issue of paper money, the utility of national banks, and like matters of public import. Now a corporation may change its elective officers on a mere question of policy, but no wholesale discharge of capable and experienced employés follows any such change. And wherein, it may be asked, does the business matters of the Government vary from those of a corporation? Honesty, capacity and experience are just as essential in the one case as in the other.

The modern doctrine that "to the victors belong the spoils" has had a most pernicious effect upon the Civil Service. It has had a tendency to make that service insecure, inefficient and costly. The writer has filled a position in the Civil Service, and, in the course of that connection, has seen men forced into department positions who did not possess one redeeming qualification, or one grain of fitness for the places they were appointed to fill. But they were blatant partisans, and, having rendered service in political slums, received the backing of their senators, representatives, or local party committees. More than this, owing to the want of a system such as the President recommends, members of Congress, in some instances, have billeted women of the demi monde upon the departments and made them a charge upon the public treasury. These are crying evils and can only be removed by the strong hand of reform.

There is every reason why the Civil Service should undergo a reformatory process. The country cannot have economy, purity and efficiency in its business affairs until the views urged by the President are made effective. The present system, as the Message truly remarked, does not secure the best men, and too often not even fit men, for the public places. The President lays down as primary rules for the conduct of Civil Service the following:

First—The abolition of the partisan spoils system.

Second—The non-interference by members of Congress with department appointments.

Third—The institution of competitive examinations for appointive positions, the same to be free for all candidates.

Fourth—Promotion and tenure of office to be dependent upon efficiency and strict attention to the duties imposed.

We agree with the President in deprecating the malign influence of partisanship over civil appointments. With him we believe that mere partisan appointments and the constant peril of removal without cause naturally leads to an absorbing and mischievous political activity on the part of those thus appointed, which not only interferes with the due discharge of official duties, but is incompatible with the freedom of elections. According to our way of thinking, the President is justified in assuming that the true cure for partisan meddling and removal without cause is to be found in providing and enforcing a just and definite test for administering the public service, as well as in the matter of making promotions.

The President can, as he admits, by a proper exercise of power, do somewhat towards restoring the efficiency and purity of the Civil Service; but without the hearty co-operation of Congress, and an intelligent support from the people, nothing adequate can be accomplished. Reform is needed, but whether or not the present Congress will second the efforts of the President to bring it about is still an unsolved problem.

THE NEXT PRESIDENTIAL COUNT.

IT is admitted on all hands that the machinery created by the Constitution for the election of President and Vice-President of the United States works less satisfactory than any other part of that instrument. The theory and intention of its authors have been nullified in its practical operation under this head. Already has one amendment been adopted with a view to the correction of the electoral evils and perils disclosed by the Presidential election of the year 1800, when for months the country trembled on the brink of anarchy. And at the last electoral count for the two highest offices in the people's gift, we were again reminded that, whether for defects in its structure or in its administration, this part of the Constitution works with a friction and uncertainty which threaten it with a complete break-down in the popular confidence.

It is safe to say that the questions of substance and the questions of form involved in the counting of the electoral ballots a little less than two years ago, were not settled in a way which gave satisfaction to a majority of the American people. While all good citizens held it, under the circumstances, the part of duty and of public safety to abide by the verdict reached in the premises, a painful impression was none the less left behind in the minds of Mr. Tilden's supporters that he and his party had received something less than justice at the hands of the Electoral Commission to whose adjudication the pending questions were submitted. And that the device invented for the purpose of turning that sharp corner in our political annals was more crooked than straight is proved by the fact that nobody in any party proposes to recreate it for the settlement of similar problems in the future.

In the meantime, if our legislators in Washington are not at their wit's end in dealing with this subject, it is at least no less than just to say that they bring very little wit or wisdom to its discussion. That the subject is difficult and perplexing we frankly concede, but its difficulties are greatly enhanced by the fact that the leaders of both parties seem incapable of considering it in any other light than that which is shed upon it by calculations of party advantage in the next Presidential election, or the next electoral count.

That such a state of incertitude about the Chief Magistracy of the country should spread like a contagion, and work a distemper in the public mind, is no more than was to be expected, especially in a day like this, when each party seems to thrive rather on the imputed vices of its adversary than on its own virtues. Each party is swift to charge that the other means to "capture the Presidency" by stratagem or by fraud. We know full well that it is the weakness and inefficiency of our present arrangements for choosing a President and for counting the Presidential ballot which enter largely into the plans of those who cherish for themselves, or who suspect in others, a disposition to lay violent or cunning hands on the spoils of Federal place. But recent events of sinister omen in our political history have come to emphasize the popular apprehensions on this score. We do not refer now to the electoral disorders which attended the last Presidential election in States like Louisiana and Florida. The disorder then witnessed in those States, whether, as charged by the Republicans, alleging intimidation and violence against the Democrats, or, as charged by the Democrats, alleging fraud and subornation of perjury against the Republicans, were sources of grief and shame to every patriotic heart. But in some extenuation of these disorders it might be pleaded that they were the natural sequelæ of a great civil and social convulsion, and that they had, for years, been endemic in those States before they entered as the decisive factor in a Presidential contest.

But in the State of Maine there is no pretense of this kind. And though nothing but the offices of a single State are contingent on the result that has there been reached, it is not possible to confine within the narrow limits of a single State the agitation that has been produced by it. It is as a "sign of the times" that it awakens solicitude. Even so judicious a Republican as General Garfield does not hesitate to insinuate that it is but part of a comprehensive plan concocted by the Democrats for capturing the next Presidency. We do not share these suspicions. Our observation teaches us that the world, especially the political world, is not so much governed by preconcert and by management as the theorists and philosophers are inclined to suspect. Such critics do not allow sufficient play for the force and influence of private motives and of local opinion. It would be unjust to the Democrats of other States to suppose that they are acting in collusion with Governor Garcelon and his Council, and this injustice is only the greater in view of the fact that the most enlightened exponents of Democratic opinion disavow all complicity with the surprise which has been temporarily sprung upon the people of Maine, and express the hope that the Legislature will do the substantial justice which Governor Garcelon and his Council have failed to do in obedience to what they call the letter of the law though in defiance of its spirit.

But we know of no better way in which the Democratic party of the nation could give solid proof of its good faith than by laying righteousness to the line and by setting judgment to the plummet in the matter of the next Presidential count. When the country was extricated from the perils of the last Presidential contest as by the skin of the teeth, it was held to be a matter of primary and indispensable duty that the Congress should guard against the recurrence of those perils. The presence of a Democratic majority in both Houses gives weight to this obligation, for the presence of that majority will be used to barb and envenom the arrows of Republican suspicion and accusation until the arrows are made pointless and harmless by the passage of a law in the premises which shall be so demonstrably fair and just as to allow no room for invidious criticism.

In the meantime the shadows of the dead past should not be evoked as spectres to startle the people from their propriety. The evil that was done three years ago in Louisiana and Florida is no excuse for the evil that has been done in Maine to-day, and the evil that has been done in Maine is not to be set as a precedent for observance in the future, but is to be cited rather as a warning. Let there be an end of strategy and finesse among the leaders of both parties, and let there be an end, too, of crimination and of recrimination; for deplorable is the condition of a country in which men lose their faith in the public virtue. Such a loss of faith is the sure precursor of a public decadence, and begets the very evils which it seems to deprecate.

NEW YEAR'S DAY.

NEW YEAR'S DAY is in many respects a meritorious day. The only real fault that can be justly found with it is that it is the right day in the wrong place. The necessities of almanac-makers and tailors require that there should be a day on which to begin the calendar and to send in bills. The moral nature of man also requires a day on which to resolve to give up smoking, and to begin to keep a daily memorandum of expenses. Were New Year's Day to be shifted to June, it would be, in its way, as able a day as Christmas. The lack of judgment which placed it within a week of the latter festival is, however, greatly to be deplored.

In a household where children abound, New Year's Day is a faint and sickly reflection of Christmas. The children have had their Christmas candy, and the doctor has put their stomachs in good repair. A week later more candy must be lavished on the insatiable infants, and the subsequent carnival of colic, and its accompanying doctors' bills, seem to all judicious parents to be uncalled for, and almost unpardonable. Even the hard-worked head of the family does not enjoy his New Year's holiday. It comes too closely on the heels of Christmas, and he feels that it would be far better if it could be postponed for a few months, and thus become an oasis of rest in the dreary work-day march from Christmas to the Summer vacation. In short, New Year's Day is felt to be a wanton waste of a holiday, and we almost resent its appearance at the very time when a holiday is least needed.

It is estimated by accomplished mathematicians that in the United States alone, on New Year's Day, seven hundred and nine thousand men make good resolutions, of which number all but five and a fraction break them within the next three days. This is a terrible picture of moral weakness, and it further suggests that something is wrong with the day. No one doubts that good resolutions ought to be made, that there ought to be a day expressly devoted to their manufacture. Every smoker feels that he is a nobler, better and more economical man when he resolves not to smoke for a year. Every man who "swears off" the use of ardent spirits on New Year's Day gains a new feeling of self-respect. When we make our annual resolution to get up early every morning; to devote a certain amount of time every day to study, or to some other method of self-improvement; when we promise ourselves that henceforth we will keep a daily and truthful list of our expenses, in which neither alleged "missions" nor apocryphal "charity" shall be used to cover a multitude of extravagances, we know that we have done well, and that we deserve the admiration of our fellow-men. And yet on January 2d we find our resolutions converted into paving-stones, and devoted to filling that interminable contract for grading, paving, guttering and sewering a road on which none of us wish to travel. These annual breakages of good resolutions weaken our moral tone—so say the moralists—and if this is true, the moral tone of the American people grows weaker every successive year.

All this failure to keep our annual good resolutions is due to the reprehensible custom of celebrating New Year's Day on January 1st, and in the coldest part of the year. Climate and temperature have a vast effect upon morality. For example, it is much more difficult to tell the truth in warm weather than it is in cold. The amount of veracity in proportion to the population is sixty per cent. greater in Norway and Sweden than it is in Italy,

Greece and Spain. As we go further north, we find that every man, woman and child in Iceland tells the truth; while, on the other hand, when we get as far south as Egypt or Mexico, we find that the truth is spoken only at rare intervals, and in exceptional circumstances. In fact, no well-established instance of veracity in Mexico has occurred within the last twenty years; and at Panama, just under the equator, no man has told the truth since the foundation of the city. On the other hand, cold climates foster vices peculiarly their own. The loathsome vice of playing the accordion prevails north of the thirtieth parallel of north latitude, and is almost unknown south of it; and the degrading habit of drunkenness is, to a very great extent, monopolized by the inhabitants of comparatively cold countries.

Now there can be little doubt that we break our New Year's resolutions mainly because New Year's Day comes in the depth of Winter. We could stop smoking with ease in June, when the smoking-car becomes close and stifling and the Summer air is laden with the scent of flowers, but we naturally find it hard to give up the pipe or cigar that assists us through the long Winter evenings or tempers the keen morning air of January. The cold depresses our nervous energies, and renders it unusually difficult for us to brace ourselves up to the point of keeping expense books, or getting up early in the morning; whereas no man cares to lie in bed in June, and there is not a man living who doubts his ability to begin to keep an expense book next Summer. It is clearly the cold weather which chills the life out of our tender, young New Year's resolutions, and the fault is not ours, but belongs to the short-sighted astronomers who undertook to begin the year on the first day of January.

We ought, in the interests of morality, to begin the year on the first of June. There is no scientific reason why we should not make the change. As the earth revolves in a circle, the year, strictly speaking, has no beginning nor end, and the selection of the first of January as the first day of a new year was a purely arbitrary one. If we have our New Year's Day on the first of June, we shall avoid the present reckless waste of two holidays within a week of one another. We shall be able to make just as many resolutions as we make now, but in the milder air of early Summer we shall be able to keep them. The sooner Congress makes the change the better; and if other nations fail to follow our example, we shall, at any rate, have the proud consciousness that we are always seven full months ahead of time.

EVENTS ABROAD.

THE Spanish Cortes having dissolved until January 10th, the Abolition Bill, which passed the Senate, and which provides for the gradual emancipation of the slaves in Cuba in 1886, 1887 and 1888, after eight years of provisional servitude under present masters, cannot come up for decision until that date, during which, as the West Indian members of the Chamber of Deputies declare the measure both impotent and unsatisfactory, it is not unlikely that the Bill may receive severe outside handling.

King Humbert is coming in for his share of the honors intended to be conferred upon the monarchs of Europe by Nihilists, socialists, and other ists. A dispatch from Rome to the Evening Post reports that King Humbert was going on a hunting expedition, when the gendarmes who preceded him encountered a crowd who refused to disperse, and fired on the gendarmes. The latter returned the fire. An active search for the culprits is in progress.

Dispatches from Constantinople state that a Mussulman priest has been sentenced to death for assisting to translate the Bible into the Turkish language. Sir Austen Layard, the British Ambassador, has demanded the priest's release, and it is believed that Germany will support the demand. What has Germany to do with the case? Once Prince Bismarck gets his blood-and-iron hand on the Commander of the Faithful, the services of the British physician will be dispensed with, and the "Sick Man" will be put under a course of German treatment.

The agitation in Ireland has assumed a practical shape. The Dempsey family, who were evicted at Balla for non-payment of rent, have been reinstated, their rent having been paid by subscription. This is cheering news for the landlords, who have only to evict to have their rents paid.

The Parisians are between fire and ice. Fire in the Chamber, water in the shape of ice on the Seine. Two sensations. Paris is happy. Jules Simon or Gambetta? Nothing but a coup d'état will fling Gambetta to the front. He needs red fire as much as does Mephistopheles.

Three Queens ill—England, Russia and Italy—England caught cold in Scotland, Russia in the Crimea, and Italy in the Alps. Three royal noses a blowing at New Year's. Catherine II. of Russia was in the habit of using candle-grease on the bridge of her nasal appendage. I wonder is it court etiquette still?

An almost continuous fog has prevailed on the Thames River during the last three weeks, the consequence being that a fleet of inward-bound ships has been detained.

Advice from Valparaiso states that the port of Iquique, Peru, has been opened to commerce, the only restriction being in respect of arms and ammunition. The President of Peru is marching with a force upon Lima, expecting the Chilians to attack Callao and the capital. It is reported that the Bolivians sacked the town of Tacna, Peru, and threatened Arica, in the same republic.

The Nihilists are not only making a terrible mistake by attempting to use brutality in order to put down brutality, but, as they themselves admit, and even claim, they are putting themselves on a level with that which they most condemn in so acting. On the other hand, the Government are not only making a terrible mistake when they suppress evidence of the misery of Russia—when they suppress newspapers for publishing that evidence—but in doing so they are sitting on the safety-valve at the very moment of expressing their horror of the devastation caused by the explosion of the steam. Russia is in the throes of a horrible agony, and the latest intelligence but serves to render the gloom of the situation still deeper.

If England imagined she could fight the Afghans without a religious crusade being preached against her by the Moollahs, she has simply gone into the struggle blindfolded. And, as if to incite these fanatic preachers to the uttermost bounds of passion, General Roberts and his subordinates have taken to hanging these Moollahs, making martyrs of them, and the memory of their wrongs a battle-cry for the survivors. General Roberts has his work cut out for him, and if it will take 30,000 men to conquer Afghanistan, and 10,000 to keep it quiet, his situation is more than perilous.

SECRETARY SHERMAN has become convinced of the impossibility of successfully floating a loan for refunding purposes at a lower rate of interest than four per cent.; but Fernando Wood clings to his scheme for refunding the six per cent. bonded indebtedness which falls due next year with a new 3 1-2 per cent. loan, and thinks he can show the Secretary that this can be done, and without any commissions.

THE Chinese in Brazil are working between two fires, which may in time unite. Desirous of extending the tea and silk industries, the Government encourages their immigration, while the masses of employers, as well as the people of the interior, oppose them on the ground that a knowledge of their being welcome there will prevent the influx of the more desirable class of emigrants from the northern States of Europe.

THE Mussulman priest, who has been sentenced to death for assisting in translating the Bible into the Turkish language, should have an advocate in every Christian in the world. His crime was simply that of revising and correcting the translations which have been made by a body of clergymen who represent the leading nations and the largest denominations of the West. The Sultan will scarcely dare refuse to order the priest's release, upon the demand of the entire diplomatic body at Constantinople.

THE Board of Pilot Commissioners of New York have picked up the gauntlet thrown by the ocean steamship companies in the matter of employing "steam" pilots. They have decided to prosecute the owners or consignees of any steamship whose master employs Pilot Sisco. Any attempt of Mr. Sisco to pilot a ship into this port will be a criminal offense, punishable with either sixty days' imprisonment or $100 fine, or both. As many of the companies had agreed to stand by the pilots of the steamer Hercules in the event of this very emergency, knowing ones begin to see many breakers ahead.

AMBITIOUS statesmen still fight shy of the English and Russian missions, a very unusual proceeding. It is currently believed that the post of Minister to the Court of St. James has in turn been tendered to ex-Governors Morgan and Fenton, of New York, ex-Governor Bullock, of Massachusetts, ex-Senator Frelinghuysen, by whom it was declined when General Grant was President, and Cortlandt Parker, of New Jersey. All of these gentlemen have declined the honor. For the Russian Mission equal difficulty has been experienced by the President and Secretary Evarts. Hon. Galusha Grow, of Pennsylvania, has been urged to accept the post, but his friends want his services in the political contests of his State, and it is reported that Governor Van Zandt, the third-term Executive of Rhode Island, has been promised the appointment if he will accept. A member of the Cabinet says, "It is very embarrassing to the Government to have these important missions go a-begging." And so it is. But there are two great considerations that have to be weighed in connection with them. One is the climate, which in St. Petersburg killed Mr. Burlingame, while acting as Chinese Ambassador, and James L. Orr, who had been settled but a short time as United States Minister, and which at London is found by Americans to be extremely severe on persons afflicted with pulmonary complaints. The other is the inability to properly maintain the dignity of the office upon the salary allowed, $17,500. To these considerations a third may be added, as it seems understood that a reduction in the amount of salaries now paid will be made before long. Under these conditions it is not strange that there should be difficulty in securing gentlemen of culture, social standing and public consideration, to accept these foreign appointments.

THE situation in Maine now bears a more peaceful aspect. There was a temporary excitement in Bangor on Christmas Day, when Adjutant French attempted to remove a quantity of guns and ammunition from the arsenal for shipment to Augusta, and wisely desisted in the face of a multitude of demonstrative citizens. More sober counsels are being taken. On the 24th ex-Senator Morrill addressed the Governor an earnest appeal, in which he urged him to submit the law points of the election cases to the Supreme Court for decision. The following day Governor Garcelon replied, asserting that nothing would give him greater pleasure than an authoritative opinion upon points involved in the present condition of affairs, and also upon such as might be likely to arise. He also requested that Senator Morrill would indicate the points that had occurred to him, and expressed his confidence that they might be able to secure a satisfactory solution of doubtful complications, or, if not satisfactory, at least such as may be deemed authoritative. The publication of these letters has had a quieting influence. Senator Morrill will submit the points, and Governor Garcelon, it is believed by the best men of each party, will then agree to refer the matter to the courts.

SINCE one of the Glastenbury Smith sisters died, and the other married, the famous cows have not figured in the executions for non-payment of taxes. But New England has still a martyr to the odious assessors and collectors, and an exceedingly determined and philosophical one. John Brown Smith, of Northampton, Mass., has now suffered imprisonment for a number of weeks for refusing to pay a poll-tax. He is offered release if he will pay, for he is luxuriantly eating his head off in his cell, surrounded by newspapers, books on philosophy, political economy, and kindred subjects, to the pecuniary burden of the city, but he remains obstinate. In his defense he says:

"My motive in refusing to pay the poll-tax is because I am a self-sovereign individuality, and consequently am an alien to the town and commonwealth and neither give my consent nor recognize the jurisdiction of the town to levy a poll-tax on my person. I decline to pay the tax because of the principles involved. I have conscientious scruples against paying taxes levied by force, as I believe in voluntaryism, attraction or love as the true basis for society. I entertain especial scruples against paying a poll-tax for the privilege of voting for officials, unless the productive forces of earth, such as air, sunlight, water, minerals, lands, etc., are recognized as the common property of mankind. I believe that self-government is one of man's inalienable rights which cannot safely be delegated to legislators, congresses or officials; therefore, the present basis of society is in error in using force when love is so much more effective."

The officials are begging him to pay up and go, for they are tired of supporting him while doing nothing but "enlarging the sphere of his understanding"; but he calmly tells them he will part company only when they give a pledge never to permit a poll-tax to be levied upon him. This they cannnot do; the other he will not do. Hence he still eats and sleeps and has his washing done at the expense of the city.

LAST year the Commissioners of Immigration of New York called the attention of the Legislature to the oppressive and unjust features of the general laws under which their work was being carried on. A Bill, covering these points, and designed to provide for the better protection of immigrants, and at the same time relieve New York State of the unjust portion of the expense, has been submitted to Congress. From 1847 to 1876 the New York State laws provided that a per capita tax should be levied upon the immigrants as they came through this port. The tax varied from $1.50 to $2.50, and the fund which was raised from the tax took care of sick and injured immigrants. If immigrants returned here any time within five years, sick or unable to take care of themselves, the Commissioners were obliged to attend to them. The New York State laws at that time also ruled that criminals, idiots, etc., who were brought here, should be carried back to the places whence they came at the expense of the steamship companies. In 1876, upon an appeal of the steamship companies, the Supreme Court of the United States declared the laws existing in New York null and void, and, in consequence, the State each year has been obliged to appropriate about $150,000 to take care of the sick and injured, etc. The other States have sent nearly all the weaklings, unsuccessful and sick ones back here, and upon New York has fallen the great burden of caring for unfortunate immigrants. The framers of the present Bill want Congress to authorize the expenditure of $250,000 each year in taking care of sick and disabled immigrants, the share of the appropriation which goes to each port to be regulated by the number of immigrants arriving at the port. This will go far towards providing proper care for all the sick, and New York will be obliged to take care only of its own. At the same time it is held necessary that two vital points should be settled beyond any misunderstanding: First, whether States have the right to compel the steamship companies to take back criminals, idiots, and so forth, shipped from other countries to get rid of them; and second, whether the time during which the New York Commissioners are responsible for the care of immigrants cannot be limited to one year instead of five, as at present. If this Bill becomes a law it will certainly effect a great saving to the State of New York.

NEW YORK CITY.—STUDIO OF H. HUMPHREY MOORE, THE DISTINGUISHED AMERICAN PAINTER, NO. 11 EAST FOURTEENTH STREET.

MADAME BLANCHE ROOSEVELT.

"WHAT a handsome likeness of Nilsson!" was my involuntary exclamation as I sat down to have a chat with the gifted Blanche Roosevelt.

The youthful prima donna—she is only three-and-twenty—was born at Sandusky, Ohio, and is the eldest daughter of a distinguished statesman and Senator, the Hon. William H. Tucker, of Virginia. Her mother, whose maiden name was Roosevelt, is a writer of no ordinary culture, while her sister, Fannie, is a budding littérateur. Very early in Blanche's life her family took up their residence in Chicago, and the Garden City, with becoming pride, claims the brilliant songstress as its child. Madame Lucca, having heard Miss Tucker, gave her a letter of introduction to Madame Pauline Viardot. Miss Tucker proceeded to Paris, where she was immediately placed under the care of the Hon. E. Washburne, our Minister.

"Christine Nilsson taught me every note of 'Hamlet,'" she exclaimed. I shall only string together what Madame Roosevelt said. "My voice is a very high soprano. I sing 'Hamlet' in the original key, also the 'Magic Flute.' Viardot was my teacher, with Madame Leonard. My French was studied with Labbache's daughter. I have been studying six years. I do all my singing without a piano, and have made myself an independent musician, as I can do without it. Rubenstein said to me, 'Your notes come out like those of Adelina Patti's; but you must study.' I study alone. I sing all my pieces at mezza voce. I only sing at full pitch for forty minutes during the day. I never sing in the evening except on the stage. My répertoire consists of sixteen Italian operas and of nine in French. I was afraid to sing at the Grand Opera, because it is so much easier to make a fiasco than a success. I learned 'Faust' in forty-eight hours, with the exception of the 'Jewel' song, which I already knew. I got my book on Saturday evening, on Monday attended rehearsal, and on Tuesday made my début. In May last I commenced my rehearsals for the new troupe I was going to bring here with M. Coulon. It was to have been called the "Blanche Roosevelt" Company; but Coulon died. This was in the middle of August. I met Mr. Arthur Sullivan in Paris, and he spoke to me about singing in English opera. 'I am bound to go to America, Mr. Sullivan,' I said, 'as I long to get back to the dear old country.' He then said that he would write to Mr. D'Oyley Carte. When I arrived in London Mr. Carte asked me if I had any objection to sing in English opera, and this is how I became Josephine. Mr. Gilbert and Mr. Sullivan both taught me. Mr. Sullivan is a splendid instructor, and Mr. Gilbert a magnificent stage-manager. Mr. Sullivan wrote 'Pinafore' in six weeks, and scored every note of it himself. I came on on the four hundred and twenty-third night of 'Pinafore' at the Opera Comique, in London. I was an immense success, as I sang it exactly as the author and composer considered it should be sung."

"Has not the new opera of the 'Pirates of Penzance' been written expressly for you, Madame Roosevelt?"

"It has; and, oh," clasping her hands enthusiastically, "the music suits my voice to perfection. It is a charming opera as a composition, while Mr. Gilbert is at his very best; indeed, both Mr. Sullivan and Mr. Gilbert are at their best in this opera. I have gotten all of my dresses for it from Madame Latreille, of the Rue Lafitte, Paris. Returning to 'Pinafore,' do you know how it came to get that name?"

"No."

"Well, then I'll tell you. Mr. Gilbert was writing and Mr. Sullivan was standing by. Mr. Gilbert exclaimed, reading from the manuscript:

"'Then here's three cheers, and one cheer more,
For the gallant captain of the ——.'"

"What rhymes to 'cheer more,' Sullivan? 'Pinafore,' laughed Mr. Sullivan. 'Take it,' cried Mr. Gilbert, and that is how 'Pinafore' came to get its name. Mr. Gilbert went down to Portsmouth to the ship Victory—the ship that Nelson died on at Trafalgar—and made his studies there. He draws every figure on paper, and then places them on the stage. Mr. Sullivan scores every good thing Mr. Gilbert says. To be in their company and intimate with them is a veritable treat."

Of Madame Roosevelt's success in the rôle of Josephine, and of her grace and beauty, it is not necessary to make more than mention.

MADAME BLANCHE ROOSEVELT, THE AMERICAN PRIMA DONNA.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY MORA.

THE STUDIO OF H. HUMPHREY MOORE,

NO. 11 EAST FOURTEENTH STREET, NEW YORK.

ONE moment and I was in the "roar" of New York: the next, far from the madding crowd, in a very dazzle of glowing color in the æsthetic studio of H. Humphrey Moore, 11 East Fourteenth Street. The transition from the rush of the highways to a luxurious apartment in the very heart of the Alhambra recalled the magic carpet of the "Arabian Nights," and, as I gazed dreamily around me, I fully expected to find the Oriental hangings thrust suddenly aside to admit either some female slave of surpassing loveliness, or, perhaps, the Caliph Haroun Al Raschid himself. Color everywhere—from the walls, from the floor, from the ceiling. Yellows such as one only beholds in sunny Spain; scarlets reminding one of the blossoms of the pomegranate; greens "deeper than lichens lives"; blues of the Italian sky. Clots of color. Color glory! Now reflected from Spanish interiors, now flashing from Moorish arms of quaint design, now coming to me like sensuous vapor from pictures vivid as from the sun-dipped brush of Fortuny, whose secret of marvelous coloring Mr. Moore has wrested so masterfully. Caressing divans, Persian rugs, Saracenic head pieces, mirrors set in amber satin, Moorish saddles, Mauresque pottery, Algerian matchlocks, Japanese umbrellas, Afghan tulwaurs, Russian samovars, Riff powder-horns, Coptic rosaries, and bits of bric-à-brac that would cause M. Tissot to part with tufts of his hair in paroxysms of impotent envy. Art in the very atmosphere. Art wooing one after her own seductive fashion. Mr. Moore is devoted to his mistress, and she repays his devotion by revealing dazzling glimpses of her secret treasure-house. His pictures are flawless gems, possessing the gorgeous coloring of Fortuny with the marvelous detail of Meissonier. Mr. Moore goes unto art neglecting nothing, rejecting nothing and scorning nothing, and, as a result, he has achieved an assured success. Though scarce as yet in the Summer of life, his career as an artist has been as full of color as one of his own pictures.

Mr. Moore left the United States for Europe in 1865. After a brief sojourn in Dresden he entered the atelier of Gérôme, at the Ecole des Beaux Arts at Paris; and a short time subsequently was, elected, at the usual competitive examination, to a membership in the "life" class, under Mr. Yvon. He remained three years at the Ecoles des Beaux Arts, devoting the Summer vacations to the exhaustive study of the leading galleries of Europe, including those of Antwerp, Cassel, Berlin, Vienna, Dresden, etc. He then proceeded to Seville, where he made numerous studies of Spanish life and customs. From Seville he went to Granada, where he met Fortuny and Rico, with whom he lived for a year and a half in the closest intimacy. While at Granada he mixed with the nobility and highest military and civil dignitaries of the country. It was in Granada society that he first formed the acquaintance of his beautiful wife, the very type of Spanish loveliness, who is the daughter of a distinguished officer of the Spanish army, and descendant of one of the oldest families in Spain. From Granada he turned to Tangier, in Morocco, where he resided for two years and a half, making many studies of Oriental life, and painting several finished pictures. At Tangier he occupied the famous little Moorish palace where the lamented Regnault, the gifted artist, who was killed during the siege of Paris, used to live and work. From Tangier he proceeded to Tetuan, two days' journey in the interior (from Tangier), where he was exceptionally fortunate in the opportunities he enjoyed for studying the domestic life of the Moors. Disguised as a woman, he was enabled to visit Moorish houses, and witness that inner life which, in Morocco, is so jealously guarded from the view of all strangers. Many times, while so disguised, he has witnessed the evolutions of the dancing girls, and to these stolen glimpses we owe many of his most striking works. On one occasion he was specially favored with permission to sketch the interior of the finest palace in the country, the property of an intimate friend of the Sultan. While alone, sketching the hall adjoining the harem, the door of the latter was suddenly flung open, and he beheld before him a group of young girls of absolutely dazzling beauty, the daughters of the house. He was desirous of sketching them, but before he could attempt a beginning they had fled.

During his residence in Morocco he had several servants, soldiers of the Pasha, who accompanied him as a bodyguard, fully armed, wherever he went. This precaution is very necessary in the interior, where the Moors are fanatical in their religion and dangerous to strangers. On one occasion during the great festival of the Rhamadan, he was engaged in taking, by stealth, a sketch of a Riff mountaineer (a member of a wild and fanatical tribe). The latter caught sight of him and divined what he was engaged at. The Riff at once brought his rifle to his shoulder and attempted to shoot the artist, who was pulled away by his faithful guard just in time to save his life. At this festival a foreigner goes abroad with his life in his hands. During the artist's residence in Morocco he formed many intimate friendships among the Moors of the higher class. The Grand Shereef of Morocco was an intimate friend and visited him frequently at his house. The Grand Shereef is, next to the Sultan, the most important personage in Morocco. A lineal descendant of the Prophet Mahomet, he is held in the very highest reverence. When he visited Mr. Moore the streets around the house were always crowded with devotees awaiting the reappearance of the Shereef to press forward and kiss his hands, feet, and the hem of his garments. In Tangier Mr. Moore lived on terms of intimate friendship with the members of the diplomatic corps. The French Ambassador presented him with the magnificent Moorish saddle and trappings now in his studio. This saddle, a masterpiece of Moorish art, was presented to the French Ambassador by the Sultan of Morocco as a souvenir of the visit of the former to Fez on the occasion of the coronation of the present Sultan. Among Mr. Moore's most risky adventures was the one in which, disguised as a woman, he was smuggled into a house where he witnessed a Moorish wedding ceremony. After a year at Tetuan he went to Italy, and spent one year in Rome in intimate association with Fortuny. Here he was elected member of the Cercle des Artistes Internazionales, and used to work with Fortuny, Villegas, Madraza, Rivera and Marchetti.

A MOORISH SENTINEL.

At the south end of the studio stands Mr. Moore's masterpiece, "Almeh." The scene of this striking picture is laid in the "Hall of the Two Sisters" of the Alhambra, which is reproduced in all its magnificence of gorgeous coloring. The Almeh has been dancing to the sound of the castanets, but, growing tired of these, has cast them aside and taken up the flexible tube of a large Persian pipe, using it as an accessory, and continuing the dance. The Almeh, herself, a magnificently developed woman of the purest Moorish type of beauty, is but lightly draped, the dress having almost fallen from her form in the maddening evolutions of the dance. Her long, Oriental eyes, made to appear preternaturally large by the black coating of "Al-ko-hol" on the edges of the eyelids and corners, are full of the languishing fire of her race, while the smile just parting her crimson lips shows that under the stimulating influence of the music and "manzu" and the motion, she herself has entered into the enjoyment of the dance begun for the amusement of another. This remarkable painting was exhibited in one of the art galleries of the Centennial Exposition, where it excited the most intense admiration, was honored by the medal of the Exposition, and named on the first list of awards.

Here and there, in this mass of gorgeous coloring, the eye is suddenly relieved by cool and inviting Moorish interiors, great bars of sunlight literally flashing through arabesque lattices; by delicious glimpses of overarching bows with expectant maidens in alluring postures and the most Worthy raiment; by exquisitely painted cabinet pictures, as in the "Mandolin-player" and the "Moorish Sentinel," so full of the marvelous handling of Meissonier; by studies in water-color and bits in chalk. Ay de mi, it is an embarrassment of riches, and as I gaze on the "Almeh," the "Moorish Merchant," "Will He Come?" "Dolce far Niente," the "Croquet Party," "Au Rendez-vous," the "Moorish Armorer" and "Long Branch Beach," I sigh wearily for the arrival of mine argosy that I fear me has not yet put out to sea. Let those whose ships have come in visit the charming studio of H. Humphrey Moore, and this, too, before the pictures I have named will have taken flight.

THE FINDING OF MY MOTHER.

I WAS a mere lad, and I had been in Melbourne more than three months, looking, as they say in the colonies, for a billet, and none had offered, consequently I was terribly disheartened, and surveyed the bustling streets, the busy shops and ever shifting crowds of the city with feelings of envy and disappointment. It was hard, after all I had imagined, to be tramping the streets of Melbourne, in the broad daylight, in a suit of wofully rusty black, with an empty stomach, and no friend near. I cursed the luck, though not the object, that had brought me so many thousands of miles for nothing, that had tempted me to leave my fifteen shillings a week and the office-stool in Crutched Friars, E. C. That seat which had once been so hard and weary now seemed a pinnacle of ease and comfort, and the dingy office itself a haven of rest and security. Such were my thoughts as, listless and tired, I stopped opposite the Government railway station. Before me was the depot, behind me the great city. I could go no further. What more could I do—I was fairly brought to a standstill? How long I stood I know not. My heart was so burdened I took no note of time. At last a thought struck me—I would go to the sea. There would be some sympathy for me there—at least I felt so—and I turned to the ocean for comfort.

Not that Hobson's Bay, with its wharves and ships and houses, was the best place to feel the solace of the sea, but I did not think of that then; it was the place where I had first landed. I had a solitary coin in my pocket. I crossed the road, and paid my fare. It was extravagance in one who had had no dinner to do so; but I was desperate, and did not care.

In a couple of minutes I was rattling along the narrow little railway line. Nobody came into the carriage, and I was again left to my thoughts. I reviewed my past life under a vaguely defined impression that I had had enough of it.

My father I did not remember, my mother had left England long ago. As far back as I could recollect I had lived in the house of an aunt. Her husband was a bank porter. My father had been a warehouseman employed at the London docks.

From my aunt I had learned that my father had left his home one day and had never returned. She said my mother was the cause of it. Her troublesome tongue had been too much for her husband. Certainly, as long as my mother lived with my uncle and his wife, the two women quarreled incessantly.

My mother did not know exactly where my father had gone, as she had never heard from him since his departure; but there was a rumor that he had taken ship for Australia. She was a tall, strong, and handsome woman, with dark hair and darker eyes, and she could make her own way. I would be in her way, and so she had resolved to leave me behind. Accordingly, one misty morning I found myself saying good-by to her on the wet and sloppy deck of an emigrant vessel. From that day to this I have never heard from her. Nevertheless, I cherished the recollection of my mother, and when I grew older I resolved to go to Australia, too. I sailed one day, an orphan, to find my parents. The result—I had found neither, nor could I obtain a living. Whir—whir. The train stopped. I got out and walked down the Williamstown Pier. At the end of the jetty lay the very vessel that had brought me out from home. Her hatches were open, her decks in confusion, and her rigging was loose. In spite of the crowd of "lumpers" on her decks she looked uncared-for and forlorn, so very different from "the thing of life" she was at sea. I thought her like myself—neglected.

I looked over the side of the pier. The water was dark and dirty. Slimy seaweed and greasy scum of offal from the ships floated on its surface. It did not look of the same element as the great, strong, sparkling waves far out at sea. At the thought I raised my head and looked across the bay, beyond the shipping, and into the distance, where the blue sea and sky met. I wished I was there.

"Hie! hey! where are you looking to!" and a hand-truck rattled past on the iron rails beside me. I jumped clear of it. "Keep a better look-out, youngster," said the man who was pushing it. I walked up the pier and again off it, and along the beach to a quiet place. I lay down upon the sand, and by-and-by I fell asleep.

I slept some hours, for when I awoke the sun was low and the wind cold. It was time to go; but where? All places were alike to me. Mechanically I returned to the railway station. A train had just gone, there was not another for an hour. I saw a wooden bench beside the station wall. I went towards it, and in doing so I passed the little refreshment-room of the station. How bright and comfortable it looked! I had eaten nothing that day, and I saw sandwiches on the counter. They were too dear for me; but perhaps I could buy a biscuit. I had still the balance of my last coin in my pocket and I walked into the room. A long, loosely-made man, with a face tanned to a rusty-red color by the sun, and so roughened and furrowed by exposure that the skin hung loosely on his cheeks, stood behind the bar. He was, however, carefully cleaning some glasses when I entered, and did not break them; on the contrary, he dried them tenderly in his great rough hands, and set them gingerly in a corner. He eyed me curiously for a few seconds, and then said:

"What'll you take?"

"I—I don't want anything to drink," I answered.

"Then what the deuce do you want here?" he asked.

"A biscuit," said I, taking the money out of my pocket.

He looked astonished, as if he had never contemplated selling biscuits, but he was contradicted by their presence on the counter. Slowly, as if I was quite a new experience in customers, he moved towards them.

Up to this point I had watched him steadily, as he had rather frightened me, but now a faintness seized me, something seemed to give way within me; I clutched vainly at the edge of the counter, and fell down on the floor of the room. I heard a great shout, and then all was darkness; my senses had left me. When I came to, I felt that I was still lying on the floor, but that my shoulders were supported by a kindly arm, whilst a kindly hand was wiping water off my face. Gradually I saw the countenance of the giant. He was looking earnestly at me, with an expression of the greatest anxiety and concern. When he perceived that I had opened my eyes he smiled, and said aloud, but quite gently:

"Poor beggar!" and then, perceiving that my eyes were closing again, he said, "Why, hang it! I believe the boy has had nothing to eat."

With that he laid me upon the floor again, with my back to the counter, and, leaving me for the moment, brought me a plate of sandwiches, and put them before me. Didn't I eat them!

"Boy, how do you feel now?" he asked, when I had finished.

"Oh, thank you, sir, better—much better," I replied.

"What made you go over like that?"

"I—I don't know," I answered. "I was tired."

"Like to go to sleep?"

I looked round the place in a confused sort of way. Seeing this, the giant shouted, "Come along," and led me into a back-room behind the bar, where he laid a horse-rug on the floor, kicked an empty brandy-case to it for a pillow, and, when I had lain down, threw over me a couple of empty sacks. Telling me to be sure and go to sleep, he left me, as some customers came to the bar.

When I again awoke it was quite dark, save for a little stream of gaslight that came in under the door. I could not recollect where I was. Presently I heard shouts of laughter, the clinking of glasses, and every now and then a curious rattling sound, and at intervals, above all, a great hearty laugh. Then I remembered. There was evidently a brisk trade doing at the bar. After a bit I heard the station-bell ring, and the customers troop out. The whistle of an engine sounded, and the noise of a departing train died away in the distance.

Suddenly it flashed across me that it was the last train for the night that had gone. I rose, and, making my way towards the light, opened the door. The gas was burning brightly over the bar, and behind the latter sat the giant, with a long book before him.

"Woke up at last?" he inquired. "Just sit down anywhere, and wait till I get this infernal cash straight."

"Couldn't I help you with the glasses?" I asked.

He said nothing, but threw me a towel. I soon had the counter clean and cleared, but the giant did not seem to progress. His forefinger traveled up and down, up and down, the page again and again, and at the end of each addition he swore frightfully. At last he counted the cash beside him, and swept it all into a large cash-box. Ocular demonstration was conclusive with him, whatever the book might say as to the correct amount of cash.

I offered to add the book up.

"Too late to-night," he said; "come along." And, taking hold of the cash-box, he told me to go out, after which he turned off the gas, and came away himself, shutting the door. "Come with me."

We left the pier and skirted the town. In half an hour or more we came to a cottage, standing by itself. The giant opened the door, and, striking a match, lit a kerosene-lamp. The light revealed two rooms with walls and ceilings of bare boards and joists. I could see a bed in the back-room. There was a table in the front one. This was the whole of the house and furniture. I sat down by the giant's order, whilst he took from a chest a great round of beef, some pickles and salt, plates, knives and forks, and a couple of bottles of beer.

"Now, boy," said he, "I guess you're hungry again. Wire in."

We both "wired in," and made the beef and pickles look small. When we had finished, the giant pulled a pipe and a twist of tobacco out of his pocket, and proceeded to cut the latter upon the table. As he did so, he said inquiringly, "You're a new chum?"

"Yes, I am," I replied.

"Any one could see that," he remarked. "When did you come?"

"Three months ago."

"What did you come for?"

"I—I am a clerk," I replied.

"Clerk!" he roared. "What, in the name of all that's eternal, do you want in the colonies, then? Blest if I didn't think you were a gentleman. Not that there's any call for such here. Why do you wear them black togs?"

"I haven't got any others," I replied.

This was unanswerable, so he lit his pipe.

"What did you come for?"

My thoughts had somehow gone back to home, and I answered, without thinking of what he was saying:

"To look for my mother."

The next instant I wished my words unsaid. The giant burst into a roar of laughter. It shook the walls of the house; it shook the roof; it shook the table, and it entirely disconcerted me.

"Mother!" he ejaculated; "mother! He's come to look for his mother!" he screamed. "Ha, ha, ha!" and off he went into another fit. Then he stopped; but slapped his thighs and knees, which set him off again. "Well, well, lad," said he, slacking down, but still humorous, "where's your father?"

I was angry, and did not answer. He saw this, and, placing a hand on my shoulder, said, kindly:

"I won't say you won't find your mother, my boy. Victoria's a small place, it so be she's in Victoria, and, if she is, it's even money she's in Melbourne. Queerer things have happened than that you should find her." Then perceiving that I was not quite mollified, he continued: "Lord, my lad, I could tell ye a queerer thing that happened to myself."

"What is that?" I asked, eagerly. "Tell it me."

He smoked on in silence for a minute or two, and then said:

"Well, I will tell ye, 'cause it has a sort of bearing on your own case, and it can't do any harm to tell it ye; but, mind, ye must never let it go past ye—never—promise?"

I promised; my attention was excited.

Patting the top of his pipe with his little finger, he commenced, slowly:

"It was about—well, never mind when it was. It was a good many years ago, and I was at Gympie. You've heard o' Gympie?"

"No."

"Gympie's in the north. Well, I had come down to Brisbane to get out of Queensland, and was loafing along one o' the streets of the place waiting for the Melbourne boat, when a carriage and pair stops with a splatter beside of me, and gives me a kind of a start. They drawed up so sudden, ye see. "Where are ye going?' growls I; and somebody shouts out, quite cheery, 'By heaven!' only he didn't say 'By heaven!' He named another place he had more notion of, 'there's Red Jack! They called me Red Jack, 'cause o' the beard. I looks up, and gets a whack on the chest from a portmanteau. 'Vast heaving,' says I. 'Don't you know me?' says he. And, sure enough, it was my old mate, Dan Doolan. But, Lord, I would ha' known him if it hadn't been for his voice—blue coat, white hat, green choker, yellow breeches, boots as black as a stove and as shiny!

"'You're in a deuce of a hurry, Dan,' says I. 'Faix! and when wouldn't a man be if it wasn't when he was a-going to his own wedding?' says he. 'Wedding!' says I, looking at him. 'That's the size of it,' says he; 'an' you're going to be my best man.' 'Let me out,' says I. 'Deuce a bit of it,' says he. 'I haven't any clothes to go in,' says I, trying to open the door of the carriage, 'nor the money to buy 'em with.' 'Hang the money,' says he, and pulls out a bundle of notes as thick as a book. 'Good God!' says I, 'is that from the old claim?' 'It is,' says he, and then he told me how, just after I had left the darned hole, he and the others had struck the metal.

"'I was always too late for anything good,' says I. 'Faith, don't say that when you're just in time for my wedding,' says he. 'And do ye think that'll be any good to ye?' says I. 'Wait till ye see her,' says he.

"It was at an hotel that trap stopped at—a wooden one. Such a darned lot o' men and women came out on to the veranda as you'd a thought would have broken it down. 'Hurroo!' says they. 'Hurroo!' says Dan, and in we goes.

"In the dining-room there was no end of a spread; champagne all along the table, and at the bar there was a crowd indulging promiscuous in free drinks. I never seed such a kick-up. Dan introduced me to his friends, and in less than a minute I had had more liquor offered me than would have done to have washed myself in, had I been so minded.

"'Parson's ready,' presently shouts some one down the stairs, and we all goes up 'em. I'm blessed if any of us knew what we were a-doing at first, but by-and-by we all gets squeezed into our places, the men on one side of the room, the women on the other. I was next to Dan, of course, holding his gloves. Parson, he was just in front of us, and we were all ready, a-waiting for the bride.

"I was just a speculating where she was a-coming from when one of the doors of the room opens, and in walks —— Now, who do you think?"—and the giant laid his hand on my knee, bringing his face close to mine—"my own wife!

"There was no mistaking her," he continued, rising, and pointing with outstretched arm at an imaginary woman. "There she was, looking almost as fresh and hearty as when she drove me away from her in the old country, fifteen years afore!"

"Drove you away from her!" I ejaculated.

"Ay, lad," replied the giant, reflectively.

Up to this point I had wondered what connection the giant's story had with my chance of finding my mother. Now an idea seized me, and completely staggered me for the moment. I started up.

"She drove you away from her?" I repeated.

"Ay, deuce a one could stand her tongue," said he.

"Your name?—oh! your name, sir?" said I.

"Stevens," answered the giant.

"Once of Stepney?"

"The same," he replied.

"Father!" I exclaimed, and threw myself into his arms.

At first he could not make it out. That his child, whom he had forgotten, should be the first to awaken, after so many years, affection in his rough heart, was what he had never thought of. I felt him tremble under my embrace. Then, thrusting me from him, he exclaimed, "Charley, my son!" and examined my face. He next questioned me as to my uncle and aunt, and, finding my answers correct, sat me down on his knee, satisfied that I was, indeed, his son.

"Go on with your story, father," I soon said. "What became of my mother? Where is she?"

"Guess I don't know," replied my father, cooling down suddenly.

"How, why?" I asked.

"'Cause, I've never seen her from the day Dan married her to this."

"But she's not his wife."

"Well, perhaps not. Shouldn't wonder, now you mention it, if she's somebody else's by this time. I guess she's not mine anyhow." and he knocked the ashes out of his pipe deliberately. "She didn't perceive me on that occasion," he went on; "and so I took my own opinion on the matter. I don't suppose she was nervous; she wasn't a nervous sort. That wedding went on without me, I guess; leastways, I saw it in the paper the day after, for I cut quietly out of the place on board the Sydney boat. I was real sorry for Dan, real sorry; but what could I do?"

And my father filled his pipe with an air of satisfaction at the recollection of having, by his presence of mind, escaped from an awkward predicament. As for myself, I had to give up all attempt to find my mother. My father would not hear of it. He made me solemnly promise never to try to seek her in any way, and then took me into his refreshment business. I became his assistant behind the bar, and soon learnt the mystery of "shaking" strangers for drinks, which mystery consisted in having peculiar dice, and a decanter full of cold tea instead of brandy, for private consumption. I soon became quick and colonial in my manner, and continued a great favorite with my father as long as I never alluded in any way to my mother.

THE PROPOSED WORLD'S FAIR AT NEW YORK.

A SPECIAL meeting of the Executive Committee of the proposed World's Fair was held in Fifth Avenue Hotel on Tuesday afternoon, December 23d, in honor of Secretaries Evarts and Sherman, who were in the city. Invitations were extended to both gentlemen to be present, but Mr. Evarts, while expressing his hearty approval of the project, was unable to attend. H. G. Stebbins presided, and there were also present Thurlow Weed, B. A. Willis, Samuel A. Haines, F. L. Talcott, James Talcott, General J. B. Woodward, W. G. Schenck, George R. Blanchard, P. J. Schneider, W. H. C. Price, M. C. Adams and Rufus Hatch.

Mr. Stebbins reviewed the facts that led to the formation of the committee last year, and W. H. C. Price gave a succinct account of the progress that had been made. This was done, Mr. Stebbins explained, in order that Secretary Sherman, who was present, might form an opinion as to the merits of their undertaking, and assist them, if it met with his favor, with an expression of his opinion. In response Mr. Sherman made a lengthy address, reviewing the past International exhibitions, and dwelling particularly upon the results of the great Centennial undertaking. He, too, approved of the plan, and hoped that it would be the greatest show ever seen in the world. Brief remarks were made by Attorney-General Devens, Thurlow Weed and B. A. Willis, the chairman of the Legislative Committee, who explained the features of the enactments they intended to apply for.

A New Hampshire Yankee a Russian Admiral.

HOW A Meredith (N. H.) boy became a Russian Admiral makes an entertaining romance. The son of the Rev. Simons Finley Williams, a celebrated Massachusetts clergyman, called to Meredith in 1790, ran away from a Laconia employer, because the latter thrashed him for spending his evenings with the girls. He took, also, $300 belonging to his chastiser, who pursued him to Portland, reaching there two days after the youngster had shipped on a Russian bark. The vessel was attacked by pirates, but the boy of seventeen, with the assistance of two sailors, mounted an old swivel, filled it with iron scraps, and sank two boat-loads of the buccaneers, thus saving his ship. For this the Czar trained young Williams up in the royal navy, of which he became the head, his title being Count Zitcherscheff. He subsequently visited this country and paid the Laconia man his $300 and interest, all in gold, saying he should return to Russia an honest man.

About the Jews.

THE number of Jews living scattered in different parts of the world amounted in the year 1878 to nearly 7,000,000 souls, according to the latest statistics. Of these over 5,000,000 live in Europe, 1,500,000 in America, 200,000 in Asia and over 80,000 in Africa. About one-half of the European Jews, 2,622,000 in number, live in Russia; Galicia contains 575,000, Roumania 301,000, Turkey 102,000, Posen (Eastern Prussia) 61,000, Italy 35,000, Holland 30,000, England 50,000, France 49,000, Spain and Portugal in the vicinity of 5,500, Sweden 1,800, and Norway only 25 persons of the Hebrew nationality. According to the last census the number of Israelites in Germany reaches a total of 512,000, of whom 45,000 live in Berlin. In Austria there live 1,575,000 Jews. The African Jews mostly live in Algeria, Fez and Morocco, and but a small portion of them are settled in Abyssinia and the oases of the Desert of Sahara. In Asia 25,000 Jews inhabit Palestine and 20,000 the Indian Empire. In the City of Jerusalem there live, besides 7,000 Mohammedans and 3,000 Christians, 13,500 Jews. In America the City of New York contains the most Jews.

A Pocket Republic.

THE little republic of San Marino, which, by the mouth of one of its most prominent officers, gave an indignant denial a few weeks ago to the assertion that it intended authorizing the introduction of gaming-tables, is inclosed in the kingdom of Italy. It is bounded on the north, east and south by the province of Forli, and on the west by that of Pesaro. Its territory covers 62 square kilometres (about 23 square miles). The population numbers 8,500 souls, and the capital, San Marino, has 1,200. It is perched on the summit of a mountain called Mount Titan, or the Giants, which sometimes leads to this little State being termed the Titanic Republic. Its origin dates from several centuries back, and for heraldic bearings it has the following: Argent, three strong towers; sauro, on three rocks of the same; three curved flames gules issue from the towers and crown them. The motto is "Libertas." The escutcheon is surrounded by flags, and surmounted by a crown, indicating a sovereign State. The republic has an order of chivalry, created in 1859, under the name of Order of San Marino. It consists of a Greek cross with towers at the four angles, and in the centre a medallion with the arms of the republic surmounted by a princely crown closed, and suspended to a striped blue-and-white ribbon. These are the national colors. In 1796, Bonaparte, after defeating the Austrians, sent the celebrated mathematician, Mongo, to compliment the free mountaineers and make them offers of aggrandizement, but they very politely and very prudently declined. When Italy became a kingdom, Napoleon desired to preserve this small State intact. "It is a rare sample of a republic to preserve," said the Emperor. In 1848, Garibaldi, driven from Rome by General Oudinot, took refuge in San Marino, forbidding his soldiers to do any harm to the inhabitants. Victor Emmanuel not only respected the liberty and institutions of this little country, but always showed it great sympathy. In 1862 a treaty of customs and commerce was concluded between Italy and the republic. San Marino owes its foundation to a hermit of that name, born in Dalmatia in the fourth century, and who went to Italy to work as a mason at the rebuilding of the walls of Rimini. Marino afterwards took refuge in the midst of the woods of Mount Titan, and constructed there a cabin in which he ended his days.

PICTORIAL SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN ILLUSTRATED PRESS.

Professor Nordenskjold's Northeast Passage.

Although Professor Nordenskjöld began his brilliant series of Arctic travels in 1858, it was not until last Summer that he effected his most renowned achievement. This was the successful navigation, in a small steamboat called the Vega, of the entire Northeast Passage from Europe round the coast of Siberia, and through Behring's Strait to the Pacific Ocean. On the 19th of August last when the Vega, which had been joined by the Lena, passed round Cape Chelyuskin, the most northerly promontory of Asia, both vessels fired a salute in honor of the successful navigation of the mysterious passage.

Capture of the Peruvian Turret-ship "Huascar."

The capture, in a fierce battle fought on October 8th last, in the Bay of Mejillones, of the most formidable ship of the Peruvian fleet, the iron-clad monitor and ram Huascar, decided the maritime superiority of the Chilian forces. The Huascar received twenty eight balls, some of which pierced the strongest parts of her sides, five passing through the 4½-inch iron plating near the water line, as shown in our illustration. The Admiral Cochrane of the Chilian Navy is shown on the right of the Huascar, and the Blanco Encalada, her companion, on the left.

Ireland's Distress.

As an indication of the distress now prevailing in Ireland, we give an illustration from the pencil of a correspondent, of the interior of a hut on the shore of Lough Corrib, at Galway. It is a fair sample of most of the dwellings in the neighborhood. The dwellers therein were engaged in threshing a little corn, but the result was very unpromising. They were making preparation for the evening meal by cutting out the little good that yet remains in the potatoes, a thankless task, for after all they did not yield pieces bigger than a small marble. The turf for fuel was also damp, and filled the cabin with smoke. This turf is brought into town from the bogs in primitive-looking carts, drawn generally by ill-fed ponies. The wet season this year has prevented the peasantry from drying turf, hence one of the causes of distress.

The Inundation Fete in Paris.

The grand fête given by the journalists of Paris, on December 11th, for the benefit of the sufferers by the late inundations in Spain, was the most successful of any similar demonstration given in the city of gayety, the entire proceeds aggregating $60,000. The lions of the press were present, and favorite actresses presided over booths and managed the lotteries usual to large fairs. Spacious as was the building, the spectators kept it filled to repletion the entire night, and with equal prodigality bestowed their praise upon the decorations and their money upon the thousand and one articles that sympathizing hands had arranged for sale.

The Royal Spanish Wedding.

The Church of the Atocha, in Madrid, in which King Alfonso has been twice married, the last time on November 27th to the Austrian Archduchess Christine, is naturally gloomy, but on the last occasion was picturesquely hung with valuable ancient tapestries, and the walls were covered with dark crimson velvet embroidered with the arms of Spain and Austria, united and surmounted by the Royal crown. Below sat the Queen-mother and the members of the Royal Family, the tribunes facing the King were occupied by the Ministers and the Corps Diplomatique, while the members of the special embassies occupied the first tribune to the left. The King arrived first, in the uniform of a general officer, with the crosses of San Fernando and Charles III., and awaited his bride at the altar. The Archduchess then came with her mother, wearing a magnificent dress of white satin almost covered with lace, and with a silver train embroidered with fleurs-de-lis of gold. She was pale, and apparently nervous, and, slightly acknowledging the salutations of the spectators, passed to the high altar and took her place by the side of the King. Cardinal Benavides, the Cardinal Patriarch of the Indies, performed the service, which was very short, and at the close the new Queen came down the steps and asked the blessing of the Queen-mother, and, subsequently taking her place by the King's side on the dais, listened to a short allocution. This done, a procession was formed, and the Royal pair, entering the carriage, drove in state to the palace. The rejoicings continued for four days, the chief feature of them being a grand bull-fight, at which 14,000 spectators were present, braving the inclement weather in order to enjoy their favorite pastime—during which eight bulls were killed—and a state visit to the opera.

Minister KASSON is instructed to act in accordance with the request of this letter.

—STATE SUPERINTENDENT LEMMON'S summary of the common-school statistics for the year ending July 31st, 1879, shows that Kansas has a school population of 311,310, the increase for the year being 44,335. The increase represents an immigration to the State of from 160,000 to 175,500 people in one year. The school revenues amounted to $1,878,563, of which $1,052,039 was expended for teachers' wages. Four hundred and fourteen new school-houses were built at a cost of $300,000.

—ONE day last month a carriage drove up to a handsome house in Munich (Bavaria), and four well-dressed men alighted and entered by a key. Presently they reappeared bearing a human form completely enveloped in cloth, of which he made vigorous efforts to disembarrass himself. The carriage immediately drove off at a rapid rate. The person abducted was a man of sixty-five, in anything but health, who was to have married that very evening a poor young girl. All efforts to discover the abductors or abducted have failed.

EHEU! FUGACES.

(A NEW YEAR'S MOOD.)

I SIT to watch night flush to morn;
Half idly in my soul I say,
What sorrows will this year see born,
What joys see dwindle and decay?

'Tis only twelve short months ago
Since, hand-fast by the frost-gemmed pane,
We marked the moon from drifts like snow
Sail out through fleckless blue again.

Now I, whom she has said she loves,
And she I worship, are apart,
Although my course of being moves
Responsive to my sweet one's heart.

And if in realms no change can blight,
Past time's disasters she might reign,
If, dying, I could know to-night
My queen should have her own again;

Should have the birthright that is hers
By beauty's sovereign gift divine—
The compensation this incurs
Might freely, willingly, be mine!

To know her glad, to keep her pure
Throughout eternities to come,
The outer night I would endure
And stand before tormentors dumb.

But, ah, to live from year to year
In memory's bonds that drag and wear,
To feel no hope and heed no fear,
Is hard to bear—is hard to bear!

And so I sit in listless mood
And watch the young year wax to light,
With this sole wish on which I brood—
That God would give us only night!

JOHN MORAN.

THE HIDDEN WITNESS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THAT HUSBAND OF MINE."

CHAPTER XVIII.—AN UNEXPECTED APPEARANCE.

SIMULTANEOUSLY with Sylve's flitting, the door-bell rang.

"Oh, my dear Flix!" cries Mrs. Forester, as she ran into her son's open arms; "do you know I almost expected this? I did say, really now, 'Suppose Flix should open the door,' and there you stood! Such a surprise, nevertheless. Oh, my darling boy! how I have longed to see you. Come right up to my room; there's a nice wood fire there."

Flix followed her, and was soon comfortably established in his mother's easy-chair, while a whispered word to the maid, who in intervals of dozing had been attending to the fire, brought slippers and dressing gown. The same girl appeared a few minutes after with a tray. Mrs. Forester had thrown off her wraps, put a thin peignoir over her ball-dress, fastened a curious-looking iron machine to the gas fixtures, thrown in the oysters, milk, salt, and an agreeable fragrance began to invade the room.

"You have often said nobody could make an oyster-stew like mother," she said, laughing; "now here it is, steaming, and fit for a prince. Why, how comfortable you look."

"I am comfortable. There's no room like mother's room, I think; and as for a wood fire, I haven't seen one since I went from home. Ah, this stew is delicious! Pardon me for smacking my lips, your cooking makes me greedy. What a kind little mother it is!"

"Because I've never got over the feeling that you were my baby," she answered, merrily. "Have you received my letters regularly? Did you think I raved about Sylve? Oh, Flix, such a change—such a total alteration! And so beautiful—everybody is wild about her."

"Humph!" said Flix, dubiously.

"I dare say you think me extravagant. Wait till you see her!"

"I have seen her," was his reply.

"When? Where? What do you mean?" asked Mrs. Forester.

"I saw her about two minutes or so before you came in."

"Sylve? Why, I left the child ill on the bed. But for that she would have gone with me. Are you sure you were not dreaming, my boy?"

"Quite sure! She treated me to a little melodrama—it was so exactly like old times!" He knit his brows moodily.

"I'm sure I can't understand, Flix. You have really seen Sylve to-night?"

"Certainly I have; I can tell you what she wore—a gown of that red color I like so well, and lace on her neck and sleeves. Her hair fell about her in great luminous waves, as a novel-writer would say. When she became aware that I was I, she gave a yell, and pitched out of the room."

"Oh, Flix, that doesn't sound like my gentlemanly son. If the poor child came down, and was really taken unawares, you must have frightened her," said his mother, her pretty face anxious. "Perhaps, feeling better, she thought she would wait up for me, and hear all about the evening. It was so delightful!"

"Perhaps; but a girl of sixteen—or is she seventeen?—ought to have sufficient self-possession to behave herself, and not go flying about like a mad-woman. Oh! she isn't altered."

"Indeed, Flix, you should not say that. I suppose if the child had no idea of seeing you, and her hair was disarranged, she fancied at once that she was looking like a fright, and lost her head. It was the suddenness, you may be sure—why she can scarcely talk of anything but you."

"I am flattered," said Flix, gravely, but with a queer gesture.

"You saw for yourself how handsome she is."

"Y-e-s—the glimpse I had of her certainly was of a very charming face; only there was a look—an expression"—he shrugged his shoulders—"that awakened some unpleasant reminiscences. Do you remember when she snatched a knife up from the dinner-table, years ago, and tried to cut me? Well, she looked like that."

"Flix, you are unjust. I won't have you talk about her in that way," said Mrs. Forester. "For penalty, I'll make you confess before you have been home eight-and forty hours that she is beautiful, amiable and affectionate."

"I grant she is beautiful," said Flix, with another shrug; "under different circumstances I might have said exceptionally so. And I am quite willing to confess all you claim, only give me time."

"And how is business going?" asked his mother.

"Smoothly; we have proved the child's right—strange, I always think and speak of her as a child—to the tract. It's going to be immensely valuable, too; they have found minerals upon it. But the other parties—there are two of them—die hard. They intend to give us all the trouble they possibly can; still there's no hope for them. The case is as clear as sunlight."

"And must you go away again?" she asked, an appeal in her eyes. "I've been so lonesome without you. And sometimes I think Bascom and Miller take advantage of your absence. I know there's a good deal of company below-stairs of nights."

"You ought to have stopped that, mother," he said, gravely.

"I know; but what is a lone woman, and a coward at that, to do with six great, sturdy foreigners? All our servants are foreign, you know, and I'd as soon face a regiment as go down-stairs when they are carousing."

"Why didn't you send Sylve?"

"My dear! a young girl! You are scarcely respectable."

"Sure enough, mamma; but she looked to-night as if she could manage a troop of horse—there, I won't speak of it again. No doubt she was nervous and sick and a little frightened. Perhaps she thought me a ghost. There, there—I'll hold my tongue, and we'll make it all up to-morrow. She is beautiful, indeed she is very beautiful. Will that smooth your ruffled plumage, my pretty little mother?"

Her answer was a kiss. Then she went to Sylve's room, but the door was locked.

CHAPTER XIX.—MISSING FROM HOME.

SYLVE had been in the habit of arranging a small bouquet of flowers for the table every morning. On this particular day it was missing—so was Sylve.

"I can't imagine why she is not here," said Mrs. Forester, who was promptness itself. Every little dereliction on Sylve's part now seemed doubly irritating. She wished her to appear her very best before Flix, and she had begun at her very worst. Flix smiled and shrugged his shoulders.

"Flix, you may smile, but please don't shrug your shoulders," said his mother, almost sharply; "it is not a nice habit."

"I beg your pardon," he said, as he took up the paper. Mrs. Forester rang the bell, and sent a servant up to Miss Sylve's room. The girl came down to say that she could not get in; the door was locked. Mrs. Forester's face fell; there was a scared look in her eyes.

"It was locked when I went up last night," she said. "Sylve has always been an early riser."

"Is that one of her good points?" asked Flix." He could not help it.

"It is, and she has more," said his mother, severely. "You shall eat your breakfast. I will go up-stairs."

"As if I could eat this my first meal for a year under my own roof without you! Please don't be absurd, mamma mine, about this wild Arab—there I go again—but you must remember what provocations I have had in the past. It is very likely she overslept, being up late last night, and not well, as you say. I think it is to avoid meeting me, so pray don't make any demonstrations till after breakfast." Mrs. Forester sat down again unwillingly, but her eyes kept wandering to the door, and inwardly she was more than half angry with Sylve, who had made an impression exactly the reverse of what she had so often pleased herself with picturing. Here was Flix, her noble, handsome son, a trifle browner, though that did not disfigure his beauty. Through all the courtesy of his demeanor, she thought she saw that he understood what she expected of Sylve's blandishments, and, never used to being thwarted, the feeling vexed her more than she would have been willing to allow. As soon as she could get away from the room after breakfast she did. Flix threw himself into a comfortable and manly position and leisurely commenced on the second page of the morning paper, but he had scarcely read two lines when in came his mother, her face very white, her hands clasped together in a way that showed the disturbance of her mind.

"Oh, Flix!" He started at the tone, and looked up.

"Mother, what has happened?" he cried, and was on his feet in a second.

"Flix, there is trouble. Sylve's door is locked. I have called her and can get no response. It is now past ten and I never knew her to be in her room later than seven."

His brow darkened. Now that he had come home for leisure and rest, was the old trial to begin over again? "Always Sylve," he said, with a sigh. "Well, mother, what's to be done?"

"I don't know. I declare I'm frightened. Shouldn't you think she would answer? Besides, there's no key in the keyhole. I could look straight through. Have you the old bunch of keys—your Sesame keys, as you call them?"

"Yes, I'll get them for you; they'll unlock anything." Only a few moments elapsed and Mrs. Forester came down-stairs, still pale, but her manner was more composed.

"Flix," she said, "Sylve is not there; her bed has not been slept in. Strange, ungrateful girl! Read that."

He took the small square of paper and read as follows:

"DEAR MRS. FORESTER—For good reasons which I cannot now disclose, I have left the home which was becoming so dear to me. I am glad Mr. Forester has come back; you will not be lonesome now, but indeed I could not see him again. I shall be in good hands so pray do not waste a thought on me, except to think that I had learned to love you dearly. I have taken a handbag with me full of clothes, and two hundred dollars which I brought with me from school. Ever affectionately yours,

"SYLVE."

"No more than I should expect from her," said Flix, lifting his eyebrows as he returned the paper. "It is only volume second of the old story, to be continued. If it wasn't for this lawsuit, I should say we were well quit of her."

"How can you be so heartless?" queried Mrs. Forester, her voice trembling and the tears in her eyes. "Flix, I have become very much attached to the girl. Where will she go to be safe, with her beauty? And what can be the reason for her going? She was as happy and merry as a bird yesterday morning, and sat where you do now, talking of your portrait. Felix, we must have the carriage out."

"And where will you go?"

"I don't know," she answered, wearily; "but go somewhere I must. And yet how hopeless the task."

"I'm glad you see that. The only way I can think of is to put detectives on the track immediately."

"Oh, Flix, how clever you are! I never thought of that," said Mrs. Forester. "But, then, will the matter get into the newspapers? That would be dreadful."

"I'll see that nothing is made public; don't disquiet yourself. There is nothing more likely than that she has gone to some of her school-girl friends, and I'll put the men on the track."

Flix left the house thoroughly angry with this girl who seemed ordained to cross his path and to rob him of his well-earned repose. From the first she had been disagreeable; from the first an actress; and if he could but bring her business to a satisfactory ending, then he would go to the ends of the earth to be quits. He was not likely, at all events, to forget her that day nor for many days to come.

As for Sylve, she was for the present quite secure. When she went to her room that night she felt so changed from her natural self that her first impulse was to look in the mirror where the image of her white, despairing face was certainly not very reassuring. To die had been her first longing; but when one ponders over the various modes in which this mortal coil might be shuffled off, one grows fastidious about the method. That Flix, her hero, hated her, and that he knew the disgrace that in some form attached to her life, was as bitter as death to her. In her half-frantic state she essayed a few curious experiments, such as holding her throat till she was fain to shriek with relief as her rebellious hand fell from it. Then she held a pillow pressed down upon her mouth as long as she dared; and then she sat down to think the matter over more calmly. It suddenly occurred to her that to kill herself was rather stupid while there were other avenues of escape.

There was a poor woman, whose gentle face had often attracted her when she went by the little shop where were sold the pretty sweets that schoolchildren love. This woman did not know who she was, though Sylve had often stood in the clean little room and talked with her; and once she had given a pretty present to a little lame girl, her daughter, and that won her motherly heart at once.

"Suppose," said Sylve, "I go there, and go this very night? She need know nothing, only that I am in trouble, and I'm sure she will ask no questions if she sees I don't wish her to. She will keep me close for a day or two if I ask it and pay her for her trial. And, in the meantime, I can learn how I am to go to the place where Salome Braddock lives. I'd go a thousand miles rather than see his face again, and it could not have been fancy—he looked as if he hated me yet. No, no! I can't stay here—I cannot. I will take what money I have, and, once there, with Salome, I'll earn my own living. Why may not I take the post of teacher—for a while at least? I don't care what I do; I am desperate."

With her to plan was to execute. While she talked to herself she was laying out the things she needed, and the scheme began to look more than plausible. To go away by herself suited the wild blood in her nature. The love of change had come by inheritance, she thought, straight from the veins of that erring mother, of whose history she had become aware. Besides, leaving home in the dead of night—a stormy night, too—was romantic and not unattended with a sense of danger.

When the woman who kept the little shop was roused by the sharp bells that hung over her door, she was very much alarmed, though the voice was familiar, to be asked to open to a stranger.

"Please let me in—you will remember me. I have nowhere to go to-night," said Sylve, "and I will pay you well. I only want to sleep here till the morning. You see, I am going South to be a teacher, and my people would not hear of such a thing—but I choose to be independent."

The timid little woman made her a bed, wonderingly, and gave her all the information she could. And the milkman, who came before daylight, being besieged, surrendered at discretion, as this was the last of his customers, and took her in the back of his long covered wagon, ten miles on her way, that she might not be recognized at any of the city stations. She knew they would search for her as soon as her plans were discovered, and she was determined not to be found.

It was simply as Miss Nellie Brown that she reached her friend at last, and, between exhaustion and remorse, fell into her arms crying and half-fainting.

"Why, I never expected you, child," said Miss Salome, meeting her at the corner of a wood-pile, where she had escorted a youthful African, for the purpose of seeing that he wasted no time; "but don't think you're any the less welcome. There's plenty of room—why how tired and sick you do look! Samson, bring the wood in directly, while I go with the young lady."

—No. II.—

INTERVIEW WITH THURLOW WEED.

A Dark Horse from the Illinois Stables to Win the Presidential Race.

THE COUNTRY HAS PAID ITS DEBT TO GRANT.

"Gerrymandering."

NEW YORK SEVENTY YEARS AGO.

A WIDE, low-ceilinged, wainscoted hall, adorned with quaint pictures and still quainter engravings, and a clock—a rival of that on the stairs at Mr. Longfellow's rare old home at Cambridge. On the left hand a door hidden by the heavy folds of hanging curtains, behind the curtains the library of Thurlow Weed. A cozy apartment is the sanctum of this gentleman upon whose elastic constitution eighty-two years have fallen ever so lightly. Its bright-blue carpet dotted with scarlet flowers; its walls hung with portraits and partly concealed by bookcases; its open grate glowing with a crackling fire; its windows barred with banks of flowers and evergreens, while ottomans and easy-chairs stand comfortably around, as if inviting you to be seated.

Mr. Weed received me with a stately courtesy recalling the days of the ancient régime.

"In the first place," he said, "I have to tell you that my eighty-second birthday portrait published in FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER has been considered an admirable one, artistically and as a likeness, and I have received ever so many letters from all parts of the world congratulating me upon it. Take a seat at the fire, sir, although you are compelled to turn your back upon my old and esteemed friend Archbishop Hughes," waving his hand in the direction of an oil painting, half-length, of the late prelate in his archiepiscopal attire. "Before I fling my memory back over the gulf of sixty or seventy years, I should like to say a word or two about the present," observed Mr. Weed, as he administered a scientific poke to a refractory coal, "and especially in regard to the candidates for the Presidency. The Republicans will carry their man. There is no doubting that."

"Are you opposed to a third term, Mr. Weed?"

"I am very strongly opposed to it, sir. This country owed Grant a debt, and they paid it to him by confiding the country to him for eight years. Washington and Jefferson established a precedent worthy of imitation for all time, and those who succeeded Washington imitated his example by declining a third term. The spirit of the country demands a change. I think the candidature for Grant in every respect unwise, and such is the decision of the people who elected him for two terms. Of course, the question comes before us in a somewhat new form, after the interval of one term, but the objections to Grant are strong enough, in my judgment, to render the nomination of some other candidate desirable."

"If the contest confines itself to Blaine and Sherman, which of them, in your opinion, has the best chance?"

"Both are strong men in their different ways. Mr. Sherman has the advantage of a long and creditable Congressional service, and is strengthened by his courageous and enlightened action in carrying out the law for the resumption of specie payments, by means of which the country is now entering upon a career of great prosperity. Mr. Blaine has served with great ability and credit in both houses of Congress. He is able and fearless in debate, and personally popular wherever he is known. But," added Mr. Weed, shaking his forefinger at backers of the imaginary contestants, "there is a dark horse in the stable at Illinois, and I can tell you that if Mr. Washburne is supported by his State, he will be the strongest candidate of all, while the Germans will plump for him to a man."

"What about Mr. Tilden?"

"His political career is ended. He will try for a nomination, but I believe the influence that was fatal to Governor Robinson in this State will be equally potent in preventing his renomination for President. The opposition of his own party to him will entirely defeat him."

Mr. Weed, after some further general remarks on the subject of the great event of 1889, proceeded to the question of the trouble in Maine.

"I think that the wrong perpetrated by the Governor and his council in Maine is so high-handed, that it will awaken a sentiment of indignation strong enough to defeat its fraudulent purpose. Such usurpations have been attempted at different periods in other States, sometimes by one, then by both political parties, but have ever been unsuccessful. The public sentiment of our country will not tolerate open and defiant attempts to defeat the public will. A similar question once arose in Pennsylvania many years ago, when the Whigs tried to do what the Fusionists—now Democrats—are endeavoring to do in Maine, but it signally failed, as all such efforts will fail when they are clearly wrong. The Democratic Party of Massachusetts, in 1811, exerted its power arbitrarily and oppressively, as is alleged, to deprive the Federal Party of its just representation in the Legislature by an unjust apportionment. The measure was so odious that it reacted and brought the Federal Party into power. That apportionment was stigmatized as 'gerrymander,' the law having been recommended by Governor Gerry."

"Is there much difference in the calibre of the Congress of to-day compared with that of the days of Clay and Calhoun?"

Mr. Weed shook his head mournfully.

"I think the great misfortune of this country is its lack of statesmanship in Congress. The whole methods seem to have undergone a change for the worse. The able men now in Congress, instead of devoting their time and their thoughts to the inauguration of measures and policies promotive of general welfare, are occupied with questions and issues which seems to me of but little importance. There was for thirty years or more, a national issue between the advocates and opponents of the protective policy. Fortunately that policy prevailed, and we are now reaping its advantages, not only by our emancipation from Europe in all the various industries of civilization, but are competing successfully with European nations in every description of manufacture. On the other hand, by the utter neglect for more than twenty years of the shipping interests, our commerce is almost wholly dependent upon foreign bottoms. I do consider that we are sadly deficient in the elementary statesmanship among our Representatives. There was a class of giants in Congress formerly, ay, and almost from all the States, who devoted their lives to their legislative duties in Congress, and who owed their reputations to the measure of their individual usefulness."

"Can you account for the deterioration, Mr. Weed?"

"I cannot understand, much less account for it, sir. We haven't got a European line of steamers, and this I attribute to the neglect of Congress. This gives England an immense advantage. The construction of iron steamers gave her an enormous advantage, but we had no business to give her that advantage."

Mr. Weed, after some further remarks upon the shortcomings of Congress, exclaimed:

"Now let us talk of the past. I came to New York in 1807, and the city was pretty well built upon the East River, because the ship-yards were all up there, and all the streets on the East River were settled as now. On the North River there were no docks above Courtlandt Street, and but few vessels with the exception of river craft. There were a great many vacant lots on Chambers Street to a later period. Canal Street was then a creek, and everything beyond the creek was pasture and farms. Brooklyn was a small cluster of houses only to be reached by rowboats at ten-cent fares. Castle Garden was then a fort, and all the rich families lived in Greenwich Street from Courtlandt Street to the Battery. The old Watch then existed, and it was a fossil institution. The watch man pounded on the sidewalk and yelled out the hour, and shouted 'All's well.' The oil-lamps only rendered darkness visible, while we burnt wood, as very little coal came from England, and that was very dear. The coal-ashes were regarded as very valuable. The water was brackish, and the best water being at the corner of John Street. The entire mail of the city was borne by a single mail-carrier in two bags. I saw the first steamboat ever propelled, the Clermont, with Fulton himself on board of her. I was a passenger in the first railroad car that ever ran in this country. The world, sir," continued Mr. Weed, "has progressed more rapidly within the last seventy years than in the previous five centuries. I have lived in that period and have witnessed it all. I have been personally intimate with Presidents Monroe, Pierce, Harrison, Taylor, Filmore and Lincoln. In that bookcase"—pointing to the article in question—"I have letters of some of our most eminent men bound up. See here!"

Mr. Weed proceeded to the bookcase and extracted a volume, bound in green morocco, containing a number of letters from Quincy Adams and Clay.

"This is how I make them up. Just step with me a moment."

We repaired to a closet off the hall, the pigeon-holed walls whereof are filled with folded letters.

"There are five thousand letters here," gleefully exclaimed Mr. Weed, "and the correspondence runs over fifty years."

After we had returned to the library:

"There was a charming old gentleman, Captain Larbush, who dined with me every Sunday for ten years up to his death last year. He died at the age of one hundred and eight years. His reminiscences were simply delightful, and he and I chatted over sixty years ago as though 'twere but yesterday. Sir Henry Holland, Queen Victoria's physician, dined here with me one day, and, being somewhat dubious as to Larbush's age, commenced to cross examine him as to his previous career, and until he accidentally discovered that they had been on the same battlefield together in Spain, when Sir Henry was a very young man. There is one thing that gives me great pain, the lack of patriotism and love of country, which was once, and until recently, the great source of the strength and security of the Republic. Among the evidences of its existence was the enthusiasm awakened upon every succeeding anniversary of the Declaration of Independence—a day which used to be celebrated throughout the country, but which is now either utterly neglected or very coldly remembered. The 22d of February—Washington's birthday—used to awaken feelings of enthusiasm, all of which have died out, and generations are growing up with, I think, little of veneration for the founders of the Government."

"Viewing the present condition of feeling on this subject from your standpoint, and in the light of the past, do you think we are drifting towards monarchy?"

"The tendencies and indications in that direction cause me a good deal of anxiety. Our Government does not seem strong enough to assert itself. Our population is increasing very rapidly, the expansion and development are wonderful, and under such circumstances a government needs to be, and ought to be, increasing in strength. I see every day, and more and more, with dismay, assimilation to English ideas, English habits, and even costume."

"You remember liveried servants in New York?"

"I do, sir; plush and powder and silk, but as we grow out of that it is not likely that we will grow into it again. There is too much button and too much velvet band on the coats and hats of our men servants nowadays for my taste."

"Is there any chance of our having titles amongst us?"

"I think not. The sentiment of the country has thoroughly accepted the republican view of the question."

Mr. Weed proceeded to make a tour of his library with me.

"This is a warrant," pointing to a framed document, "for 160 acres of land which have never been located, granted to me for my services in the War of 1812. This is my pension-warrant; I draw the pension still. For five years I gave it to Captain Larbush. This is a resolution," another framed document, "appointing me as representative to the Peace Congress to Washington in 1861, but as I never accepted office I declined this one. This," handing me an old piece of parchment, elaborately illuminated, "is a certificate of membership of the Typographical Society in 1816. This," producing another roll and with a ring of justifiable pride in his tone, "is a certificate of my freedom to the City of New York." An oil portrait of Mr. Seward while a young man, adorns the library, and photographs of both Archbishop Hughes and Cardinal McCloskey. "Do you see that man?" demanded Mr. Weed, extending his finger in the direction of an engraved portrait of a Jesuit priest; "that is Father De Smet; he went as a missionary amongst the fiercest of our Indian tribes. I traveled with him in a sailing ship for Europe. If we had De Smet now we'd have no Indian troubles, as his word acted with the Indians like a charm." Mr. Weed, in referring to a portrait of the celebrated English Lord Chancellor Thurlow, claimed to be descended from him. "This is a Thurlow ring," extending his finger to me "sent to me by the family, and when I was in England I was claimed as one of them."

One water-color sketch of a French château Mr. Weed prizes very highly.

"This was done for me, and sent to me, by the granddaughter of a man with whom I was intimate, General Lafayette. It represents his birthplace. This portrait of Daniel O'Connell, given to me by himself, I set great store by. I attended the monster meeting with him on Donnybrook Green, and dined with him subsequently at Merrion Square, Dublin. Come into the hall till I show you what is to me now a very melancholy souvenir."

Following mine host, he stopped opposite an Indian-ink drawing of the interior of a theatre, the pit being full of dandies, in shirt-collars up to their ears, great white cravats wound round their neck ever so many times, and coat-collars reaching to the base of the skull.

"That is the old Park Theatre," said Mr. Weed. "It stood right opposite to where the General Post-Office is now. Every face there is a portrait. I could name them all, and all, all, have gone over to the majority. I heard in that theatre, sir, all the talent of the world. I saw Edmund Kean, Charles Kemble, T. P. Cooke, Macready, and Rachel. I've heard Incledon and Braham"—this with a flash of delight and appreciation. "The prices used to be; Pit, 50 cents; boxes, $1; gallery, 25 cents."

"Was New York a theatre-going city at that time, Mr. Weed?"

"Immensely so. Why, sir, to go to the theatre was a part of the day's doings."

Mr. Weed spoke of having seen all the great fires that have devastated the city from time time, and laughed at the clumsy appliances then used for the purpose of extinguishing them. He also dwelt upon the marvelous change in the seasons, remarking that during the Christmases of his time everybody and everything used to be snowed up, as a matter of course.

In conclusion Mr. Weed said:

"If America advances within the next fifty years as she has advanced during the last, you will see three millions of a population in New York, and you will see her the capital of the commercial world. You will see houses and stores solid all the way to Harlem, and you will be using the telephone, or something akin to it, across the Atlantic."

VIRGINIA WATCH MEETING.

ONE of the most striking sights in the life of the colored folks is a New Year's Eve watch meeting. It is a custom solemnly observed, the watch being well and truly kept all along the line. Out in the woods of Virginia, within ten miles of the spot where Lord Cornwallis surrendered his army, stands a small wooden building, which is used as a meeting-house. To this trysting-place hie all the colored folks of the surrounding country, some on foot, some in carts, some by the light of lanterns, some by the light of the moon. The woods echo with joyous laughter and the whoops and hollos of the merry-hearted darkeys converging upon this common centre. The building is but dimly lighted, and in dark corners flashing eyes and white teeth gleam with weird distinctness. Presently the building commences to fill, and the elders ascend the platform. The girls are all dressed in their very bravest and best, and the boys wear their Sunday clothes. Silence is observed for some little time, when a hymn is struck up, and then out rolls a rude harmony that would put many white congregations to the blush. The elders, male and female, utter exhortations, then come additional hymns, and lastly silence, as midnight approaches. Once the hour has struck a change comes over the whole scene. Everybody becomes intensely animated. The elders deliver congratulatory discourses, the congregation shake hands and everybody congratulates everybody else. Then a hymn to a merry tune is given out, to which the watchers respond not only by their voices, but by their feet and hands, and until all are in motion—head-wagging, hand-shaking, body-contortioning, foot-moving. There is laughing and singing and excitement. The old year has been watched out and the new year watched in.

The Distribution of the correct time by electricity, as inaugurated by Leverrier, is now organized at Paris, on an immense scale, by the Municipal Council. A length of 15,000 metres of tubes is placed alongside the Boulevards and the principal streets, where a large number of dials will mark the time during day and night. Private clocks will be kept to time on payment of a small fee.

As Archæologists are aware, the remains of a temple consecrated to Apollo may be seen at Terracina. Its columns are still standing, but they were hidden by some masonry thrown up at a later period. The Commission for the Preservation of Monuments, having called the attention of the Ministry of Public Instruction to the fact, has obtained an order for the demolition of the unsightly accretions referred to; and the ancient edifice, or at least as much of it as survives, will be seen in all its perfection.

Some Explorations undertaken in the Peninsula of Taman, in Russia, have produced interesting results. Between Temruk and the station of Semnais, a tomb dating from the third century before the Christian era has been discovered. In it was found a gold collar ornamented with lions' heads, a crown of the same metal adorned with precious stones, having in the centre a swan with a cupid on its wings; a round gold brooch with a pin representing Venus holding Cupid in her arms; a collar of pearls; earrings, chains, rings, bracelets in gold, and silver vases. The tomb is probably that of a young girl.

Hunting Seals.—The mode in which seals are hunted is very singular. The moment selected is when they are peacefully sleeping on the coast in a troop of many thousands, pressed closely one against the other. The hunters separate some two or three thousand from the mass, and then drive them like a flock of sheep to the village where they are to be killed. They are very manageable, and four or five men can control a troop of from one to fifty animals, for they make no resistance. When the animals have reached a spot convenient for slaughter they are allowed to repose, for their journey always heats them, and if they were killed in that state their fur would fall off or become easily detached from the skin. Fifteen or twenty men, provided with heavy clubs, separate about fifty animals from the rest, force them into a heap and then kill them by blows on the head. The animals are skinned immediately, for if the weather is warm putrefaction sets in quickly, and the quality of the fur is greatly deteriorated, if not altogether spoiled.

Electricity as a Motive Power.—During the session of the British Association at Sheffield, Professor Ayrton delivered a popular lecture on "Electricity as a source of motive power," in which he showed that this agent was a motive power, just as steam and water are, and predicted that at some future time it would take the place of both their old acquaintances. The lecture was illustrated by a large number of experiments, some of them being very startling and brilliant. The platform and tables were covered with electric machines and other scientific appliances, and a large number of diagrams had been specially prepared and hung. To show that electricity could be used as a motive power, though generated at a distance, a number of wires attached to machines on the platform were connected with works some distance from the hall, and the electric current was conveyed from the works to the hall. By this means a sewing-machine was made to work; a small locomotive engine, which the lecturer called the "engine of the future," was made to perform a circular journey; a lathe was turned, at which a workman did some turning; a circular saw was set in motion, and a quantity of wood sawn into thin strips; spoons were plated, water was boiled, and the screw of a ship was turned. Many other experiments were shown, and the conclusion the lecturer came to was that electricity would, some day, become the great motive power of the world, and would supersede gas for illuminating purposes.

DEATH has been busy of late, too busy, smiting high and low, rich and poor, sparing neither the infant in his cradle nor the strong man in his prime. A strong man has been cut off when life seemed at its best for him—De Witt C. Hitchcock. A strong man, and a good man, a man whom to know was to respect, whose intimacy was precious, and whose friendship was a pearl above price, De Witt C. Hitchcock was indeed exceptional. A child in the world's ways; in art he was a master. Gifted, unselfish, devoted to his family, and ever at the service of his friends, he embodied in his own nature all that the ancient moralists strove to portray. Little did those who loved him the best imagine that, as darkness fell upon Christmas, his last night on earth had come, and that the morning sunlight was but to flash across eyes that were to close for ever ere the hour of noon had struck. But so it was written; and as the blithe and happy father passed with his winsome daughter along the crowded thoroughfare, and as he laughed, after his light and hearty fashion, at some sally of his child's, death spread upon him and he was no more. Disease of the heart had accomplished its fatal mission. This lamented gentleman was one of the pioneer artists of American illustrated papers. He was born on Arch Street, Philadelphia, February 10th, 1824, and, evincing an early taste for drawing, studied under George Croom, then one of the leading artists on wood in this country. Leaving Philadelphia, Mr. Hitchcock came to New York and became associated with Mr. T. W. Strong in the issuing of the Illustrated American News. Repairing to Boston, Mass., he was at once engaged upon Gleason's Pictorial, doing "yeoman's service." Returning to New York, he was engaged by Mr. Frank Leslie on Barnum & Beach's illustrated paper, and subsequently on FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER. In 1854, in the interests of this journal, he visited Central America, from whence he transmitted many valuable sketches, which have been published from time to time in these columns. He was for many years a member of our artistic staff, and held in high esteem alike by his employer and his brother artists. He has for the last few years been identified with the best work in his profession for such firms as D. Appleton & Co., Houghton, Osgood & Co., and the Putnams. Mr. Hitchcock's specialty as a draughtsman was landscape and scenic work, but in engraving, his work on figures was highly regarded. He did a great part of the engraving for the magnificent edition of Longfellow's poems recently published by Houghton, Osgood & Co., and for other sumptuous editions of the poets issued by that firm. For several years Mr. Hitchcock had been associated in business, at No. 48 Beekman Street, with Mr. Benjamin Day. He leaves a wife and three children to mourn an irreparable loss.

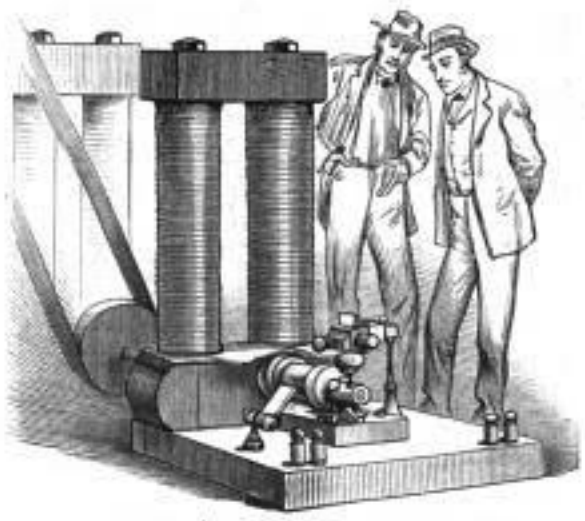
GENERAL VIEW OF MENLO PARK AND EDISON'S LABORATORY.

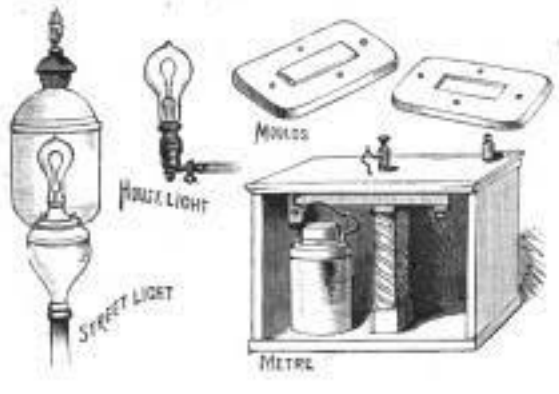


INTERIOR OF THE LABORATORY.

EDISON'S PERFECTED ELECTRIC LIGHT.

IT has been definitely announced by Thomas A. Edison that the first public exhibition of his perfected electric light will be given at Menlo Park, N. J., on New Year's Eve. By the circulation of erroneous statements concerning the labors of this remarkable electrician and inventer, the public have been several times sorely disappointed. Although it had reason to believe months ago that he had mastered the difficulties of his latest undertaking, it was not until within a few weeks that his experiments yielded a satisfactory result. Considering the criticisms that have been published upon his discoveries, and the excitement produced among gas manufacturers and consumers, not only in the United States but abroad, our illustrations of Mr. Edison's laboratory, where his experiments have been conducted, and of the apparatus by which his light is now produced, will attract general interest.

The laboratory and workshops are situated near the depot at Menlo Park. Here Mr. Edison has toiled incessantly for fifteen months with lamps, burners and generators. Edison's electric light, incredible as it may appear, is produced from a little piece of paper—a tiny strip of paper that a breath would blow away. Through this little strip of paper is passed an electric current, and the result is a bright, beautiful light, like the mellow sunset of an Italian Autumn. He has made this little piece of paper more infusible than platinum, more durable than granite. And this by no complicated process. The paper is merely baked in an oven until all the elements have passed away except its carbon framework. The latter is then placed in a glass globe connected with the wires leading to the electricity-producing machine, and the air exhausted from the globe. Then the apparatus is ready to give out a light that produces no deleterious gases, no smoke, no offensive odors—a light without flame, without danger, requiring no matches to ignite, giving out but little heat, vitiating no air, and free from all flickering. And this light, the inventor claims, can be produced cheaper than that from the cheapest oil.



Having made up his mind to conduct his experiments on the basis of incandescence rather than on that of the voltaic arc, and while perfecting his machinery, there occurred a discovery that materially changed the system, and gave a rapid stride towards the perfect electric lamp. Sitting one night in his laboratory, reflecting on some of the unfinished details, Edison began abstractedly rolling between his fingers a piece of compressed lampblack mixed with tar, for use in his telephone. For several minutes his thoughts continued far away, his fingers in the meantime mechanically rolling out the little piece of tarred lampblack until it had become a slender filament. Happening to glance at it, the idea occurred to him that it might give good result as a burner if made incandescent. A few minutes later the experiment was tried, and, to the inventor's gratification, satisfactory, although not surprising, results were obtained.

A spool of cotton thread lay on the table in the laboratory. The inventor cut off a small piece, put it in a groove between two clamps of iron and placed the latter in the furnace. The satisfactory light obtained from the tarred lampblack had convinced him that filaments of carbon of a texture not previously used in electric lighting were the hidden agents to make a thorough success of incandescent lighting, and it was with this view that he sought to test the carbon remains of a cotton thread. At the expiration of an hour he removed the iron mold containing the thread from the furnace, and took out the delicate carbon framework of the thread—all that was left of it after its fiery ordeal. This slender filament he placed in a globe and connected it with the wires leading to the machine generating the electric current. Then he extracted the air from the globe and turned on the electricity, when a beautiful light greeted his eyes.

Night and day the inventor kept up his experiments, and from carbonizing pieces of thread he went to splinters of wood, straw, paper and many other substances never before used for that purpose. The results of his experiments showed that the substance best adapted for carbonization and the giving out of incandescent light was paper preferably thick like cardboard, but giving good results even when very thin.

The paper cartons are prepared quite simply. With a suitable punch there is cut from a piece of "Bristol" cardboard a strip of the same in the form of a miniature horseshoe, about two inches in length and one-eighth of an inch in width. A number of these strips are laid flatwise in a wrought-iron mold about the size of the hand, and separated from each other by tissue paper. The mold is then covered and placed in an oven, where it is gradually raised to a temperature of about six hundred degrees Fahrenheit. The mold is then placed in a furnace and heated almost to a white heat, and then removed and allowed to cool gradually. On opening the mold the charred remains of the little horseshoe cardboard are found. After being removed from the mold it is placed in a little globe and attached to the wires leading to the generating machine. The globe is then connected with an air pump, and the latter is at once set to work extracting the air. After the air has been extracted the globe is sealed, and the lamp is ready for use.

These lamps may be readily adapted for street, factory and dwelling illumination, and the electricity can be regulated with entire reliability at the central station, just as the pressure of gas is now regulated. The entire cost of constructing the lamps will not be more than twenty-five cents.

Mr. Edison explains at length his proposed method of laying down wires in the street. Two wires of large size will be laid on each side of the main thoroughfares just under the flags, near the curbs. Neither heat nor cold will affect the currents. The wires under the sidewalk are to be inclosed in two parallel pipes with insulating lining, but at every twenty feet there are to be boxes, in the sides of which the pipes will terminate. The wires are to stretch naked through the boxes from side to side. At these boxes the wires may be tapped, either by wires laid along down the side streets or by the small wires leading into stores or houses. The meters, also, may be placed in or near the boxes. It is confidently asserted by the inventor that any number of lights may in practice be obtained from the same circuit, if only enough power and enough generators are employed. The burners at the end of a long circuit will not be as bright as those near the generator, he admits, but he adds that the same is true of gas. As in the case of gas, a man will always be on duty at every station to turn on or shut off the current, as may be necessary to keep the lights burning evenly. The difference between the brilliancy of his burners at different points along a circuit will be slight.

IMPORTANT if true—a wife.

THE PROPER ORDER.—Governess (teaching alphabet): "And what comes after T, Master William?" Master William: "Bed."

PEOPLE will yet learn that one of the most dangerous things in the world is an empty shot-gun. Folks will find there's something in it.

IT has hitherto been confidently believed that a feather-bed is a reliable place of safety in a thunderstorm. But that belief is shattered by the fact that a goose was recently struck by lightning in New Jersey.

DID you ever notice that if you go into an office where the man is on the street talking politics all the time he isn't in bed, you will always see a framed chromo motto hanging up over the desk, "Time is Money."

LITTLE boy of four years was sleeping with his brother, when his mother said: "Why, Tommy, you are lying right in the middle of the bed; what will poor Harry do?" "Well, ma," he replied, "Harry's got both sides."

A SALOON-KEEPER, having started business in a place where trunks had been made, asked a friend what he had better do with the old sign, "Trunk Factory." "Oh," said the friend, "just change the 'T' to 'D' and it will suit you exactly."

EMERSON says a man ought to carry a pencil and note down the thoughts of the moment. Yes, and one short pencil, devoted exclusively to that use, would last some men we know about two thousand years, and then have the original point on.

THERE is nothing so charming as the innocence of children. "Mamma," said a five-year-old, the other day, "I wish you wouldn't leave me to take care of baby again. He was so bad I had to eat all the sponge cake and two jars of raspberry-jam to amuse him."

"DOES he know anything?" anxiously inquired a friend, bending over the body of the man who had just fallen from the roof of a house. "Don't know, I'm sure," the physician replied. "He never did know anything, but you can't tell what effect the fall may have had upon him until he regains consciousness."

A FUNNY story of old times on the frontier a Colorado correspondent tells—about a Dutchman, the proprietor of a line of stages, who was collecting two dollars apiece from the passengers, by way of fare. All had paid except one, and he, drawing a large revolver, pointed it at the head of the collector, and hoarsely asked, "Won't that pass me?" Perfectly unmoved, the Dutchman said, "Oh, no! we vas dem tings here. Two dollars, please."

A SMALL boy with a big cent in his hand stood before a grocery-store for a long time before making up his mind to enter. When asked what he desired, he inquired: "If a boy should come here and get trusted for a stick of gum, how much would it be?" "One cent," was the reply. "And if a boy should come here with the cash, how much would it be?" "Just the same." "Then I guess I'll get trusted," remarked the financier, as he slipped the cent down into his pocket.

JUST as he finished his little serenade the moon came out from behind the cloud, and she, the mother of the moon of his heart, leaned out of the window, and upon him emptied about two gallons of cistern water. "After me, the deluge," he simply and prettily said, and as he walked briskly away, the splashing aqueous in his light guitar made it sound as though he were carrying home a jug.

"DO YOU understand the nature and solemnity of an oath?" the Judge of Vandalia asked a witness who had come up from the lower end of the State. "Well, yes," the witness replied, after some study: "I reckon I know the natur' of an oath, but there never appeared to be no powerful amount of solemnness about swearin' to me. It allus come kind of nat'ral like. Mam swore a little when she was riled, dad was a born cusser, and Parson Bedlos——" But the Court excused him without further pedigree.

FROM THE NOVEL OF THE FUTURE.—"There was a loud noise like the report of an overcharged cannon, the burst boiler sent the splintered iron and steaming vapor high in the air. Marianne, the engineer's lovely daughter, was carried with the débris, and ascended with frightful velocity in the direction of the clouds. As she flew heavenward, the employés held their breath and closed their eyes—the spectacle was fearful to witness. But young John, the assistant, who had admired Marianne from afar, was alive to the emergency. Seizing a flying-machine, upon which he had just obtained a patent that morning, he strapped it to his broad, manly back, and, spreading the wings of the machine, vowed he would rescue the girl of his heart or die. On he flew in the direction his loved one had taken. He reached her just as her red head had plunged through a cloud. It was but the work of a moment to clasp her to his bosom. 'Saved!' came from the crowd below, who had been watching the scene through telescopes," etc.

is a most valuable external application. It heals all cuts, bruises and abrasions of the skin, restores the hair when destroyed by scalp diseases, removes dandruff and keeps the scalp clean and the hair soft and pliable. It is as agreeable as it is effective, and is ably assisted in every case by the CUTICURA SOAP, which is particularly recommended to mothers for cleansing the skin and scalp of infants and children. It is Toilet as well as Medicinal, and is the most fragrant and refreshing Soap for the nursery and bath of any yet prepared.

A BREECH-LOADING REPEATING RIFLE for $4.50. The "CHICHESTER."

THE NEW SEVEN-SHOT REPEATING RIFLE, THE CHICHESTER.

The Finest Sporting ever known in fire-arms.

PURPOSE OF INTRODUCTION ONLY. ☞ Not over two Rifles sent to any one address. ☜ OFFERED AT ABOVE PRICE FOR THE In placing this Rifle on the market, at a price far below that of other similar first-class fire-arms, we give the RETAIL PURCHASER the benefit of every possible reduction. We allow no agents commissions, and make no discount to the trade, at present prices. The price we offer the CHICHESTER at barely covers the cost of manufacture, but it will ensure a sale in every town in the U. S., the result of which would take years of advertising and passing to obtain at regular prices. The offer of CHICHESTER RIFLES at $4.50 holds good ONLY ninety days from January 1st, 1880, after that they will be sold through the trade only, and at a greatly increased price, and, in fact, if all our contracts for material and work had not been placed months ago, before the great rise in metals and labor, we could not make the CHICHESTER at near its present cost. They have been in course of active manufacture for over one year. The Patents which cover them being dated March 25th, 1875, May 9th, 1876. CHICHESTER RIFLES are WARRANTED and GUARANTEED to be made of as fine material and in as thorough a manner in every respect as any fire-arm in the World. Every part is made by special and expensive Machinery, and in very large lots. Fire-arms, like Sewing Machines and Pianos, have always paid an enormous profit to the manufacturers; the actual cost being but a small part of the selling price. The CHICHESTER will never be sold at the immense profit asked by the manufacturers of other fire-arms, but only for the purposes of introduction will it be sold at the present price, and only for a limited time. We know this to be its end the most effective and cheapest way to introduce any meritorious article. We GUARANTEE the CHICHESTER to be equal in MATERIAL and WORKMANSHIP to any Rifle in the World. The best only is used. The barrel is STEEL, rifled in the most careful manner. The trimmings are all nickel-plated. Black Walnut Stock and very handsomely designed hard rubber pistol grip. Rocky Mountain Muzzle Sight, case-hardened hammer and trigger, and the best of steel locks. BEAR IN MIND that this is an old-fashioned paper cartridge army gun, big bored and showy. It is a BRAN NEW REPEATER, using regular Metallic Cartridges, which are sold everywhere. FIRES SEVEN TIMES with one loading, and is very ACCURATE and EFFECTIVE at both short and long distances. It can be loaded in fifteen seconds, and every shot discharged in ten seconds if necessary. Can be used as a single shot rifle if desired. Every one is shot and thoroughly tested before leaving the factory. Every one is numbered and a WARRANT is given for each, signed by the Company. We have targets made with the CHICHESTER at mid range, that cannot be beaten. Each one is packed separately in a neat case, with cleaning rod, &c., and sent to any address on receipt of price. We will get special rates from the Express Companies and can guarantee that the Express Charges will not amount to over 50 or 75 cents to most parts of the country. We cannot of course send by mail.

WE WILL SEND (until April 1st, 1880,) ONE CHICHESTER SEVEN SHOT REPEATING RIFLE as described above, to any address for $4.50, carefully boxed, and when cash accompanies order, will give FREE a box of long range rifle Metallic Cartridges. The Office of the CHICHESTER RIFLE CO. is in Jersey City, N. J., near terminus of the Pennsylvania Rail Road, and within one block of the Ferries (ten minutes' ride from New York City.) If you have acquaintances in New York or vicinity, ask them to step into our sales-rooms and examine the CHICHESTER RIFLES, and Targets made with them at long and short range, and read testimonials received from well-known sportsmen.

We refer to the Banks and Express Companies of New York and Jersey City. Make all Checks and Money Orders payable to CHICHESTER RIFLE CO., W. H. FITCHETT, Treasurer, 31 Montgomery Street, Jersey City, New Jersey, U. S. A. ☞ Sample orders from Export Trade, and Foreign Correspondence solicited.

We appoint no agents in the United States, but will give and protect agencies in all Foreign Countries.

SAINTY'S CHRISTMAS GIFTS.

BY HELEN W. PIERSON.

"SURE, it's a quare name ye call the gurrul?" said Mrs. McGonegal, as she held out her cup for more tea, with one eye on the hot buns and another on a slender young figure to be seen through an open window, where the odor of honeysuckles blew in softly on the somewhat heated cheeks of the two women. "Is it wan of the blessid saints she's named after, now, Mrs. Malone?"

"If she was, sure she wouldn't be disgracin' the rest av thim," said the fond mother, holding a spoonful of quivering rubies in the shape of currant jelly towards her guest. "Is it no more, thin? Sure, yer appetite's failed intirely!"

"It's bin failin' fast since when I sat down here!" answered Mrs. McGonegal, with a fat laugh. A comfortable-looking woman she was for a Winter scene, having cheeks like cranberries and three pink chins; but she was rather warm and overblown in appearance on this hot July night.

"The way av it was this," began Mrs. Malone. "She was born on All-Saint's Day, and one of the blissed Sisters was with me, the nurse having been called to some fine lady before me. What I'd a done widout Sister Angela at all, at all, I don't know. You know the pious cratures are ready for ev'ry emargency, and when she laid eyes on the choild, 'Sure, it's a little angel,' sez she; and faith, it had the little rings of golden hair and the swatest blue eyes even thin. 'An have ye a name ready for the darlin'?' she asked, an' I sez 'Nothin' better than Mary Ann, and it don't seem to suit her at all, at all.' 'Call her Angela, then,' says the Sister, and I wouldn't go agin her will. A fine name, ye see, but a thrifle Frenchy, to my thinkin'. So the Sister took to her amazin', and was her godmother, and taught her loads of fine things, and made a lady of her. But, somehow, we got to callin' her 'Sainty,' bein' moindful, I suppose, of the day she was born; and a thrue saint she is to me since her father died—may the heavens be his bed!"

There was a great deal of simple faith implied in this last adjuration, as Mr. Malone had frequently made the earth his bed in his lifetime when too drunk to reach his legitimate couch. A man with some education and ability, but fond of hilarious company, he had squandered his money in riotous living, and left his little family nothing but the house they were in and a few acres of land. But good Mrs. Malone had canonized him already.

"You're blessed in yer children, sure," said the complaisant friend. "and I often say it. An' Fred's the foine young man—let alone a bit of wildness as gives flavor to him, as a body might say."

"Fred has a sowl above farmin', more's the pity!" answered Mrs. Malone, with just a shade on her good-looking face. "He's a ganius, is my Fred; and often whin he's out in the field, instid of ploughin' he's a compozin' a 'Song to a Daisy,' or the loike of that."

"Which is lighter work, by a good sight, I'm thinkin'," said Mrs. McGonegal, with a laugh.

"An it's the gold favers on him now, worse luck," said Mrs. Malone, complacently, looking rather mournfully into her tea-cup. "But ye should hear him talk of pannin' out hapes and hapes of gold, and the foine house he'll build. Oh! he lives in the clouds, does my Fred. It's the way of ganiuses, I believe. There, now, young Allan's come. Sainty is that shy she wouldn't bring him in forninst ye; but sure ev'ry wan knows he's waitin' on her."

"And a decent fellow is Alan Forsyth," said Mrs. McGonegal, reaching out a hand absently and drawing back the fourth bun.

Outside, the July twilight was full of faint flower-scents and silence. The last bird had twittered itself to sleep in its leafy cradle, the crickets only and the katydids said something now and then about the weather. The dead gold of the harvest fields had not all been gathered in, and afar over the distant hills a serene purple light was hovering. The sky, with the paley-gold of sunset still lingering in the west, a shadow of the gorgeous glories that had passed, was full of cool pearly tints and delicate greenish hues. And Sainty had been standing drinking in all this beauty and preferring it to the tea and gossip at her mother's table. Dutiful child as she was, it was her fortune to have been educated beyond her station—or was it a misfortune?

Looking at her in that golden calm, you would say that she was fitted to grace any station. Her hair had darkened from the baby gold to some warm charming tint, deep yet glittering. It was gathered into a low coil at the back of her neck, but rippled over her head wave on wave, and hung in bright tendrils over a broad sweet brow. Her eyes were purple as pansies now, as if they had caught color and depth from the years. Her skin was fair, not pale, with just a hint of color in the cheeks and a fuller glow on the sweet lips. She wore a pale-pink lawn, daintily trimmed, and decked with knots of ribbon—her one gala dress, fashioned by her own deft fingers. It became her as the rose-leaves become the rose. No wonder Alan Forsyth forgot his resolve to wait for better prospects before he bound her to him. No wonder he stumbled into a blundering but passionate avowal of his love, and heard with rapture the single word that crowned his hopes.

"I have always been poor, you know, Alan; so I have no extravagant ways to unlearn!"

"I expect an advance at the New Year, darling," he said, looking at her rapturously. "Sainty, the day will come when I shall deck you in silks and laces and diamonds. I feel a power within me, an undeveloped power, and I know that I can do something in my profession if I have a chance. Jarvis has thrown out strong hints, and indeed I have been privately informed that I am to have that chance in the New Year. So as soon after that as possible, my dearest, let the wedding-bells ring out."

And Sainty buried her face in his bosom with a glad thrill, and promised all.

Mrs. Malone has an attack of the "rheumatiz." The fields are all decked in Winter ermine, and the twigs sheathed in crystal that looks very fine, but must send a deathly chill to the poor thing's heart!

"It looks very chilly, to my thinkin'!" says Mrs. Malone, as Sainty lays something very white and dainty, like a Summer cloud, upon the bed. "Sure, white satin is the proper thing, and I wore it myself, and looked, your poor father said, like a June rose. Arrah! and it's little like a rose I am this minute, barrin' the pain, that's a-stickin' into me like thorns or needles."

"Yes, it looks rather cool," answered Sainty, shaking it out and placing creamy-hued knots of satin ribbon here and there upon it to note the effect; "but I'm satisfied and so is Alan, though poor fellow, I know he would enjoy lavishing everything upon me, and he's as anxious to see this as if it was sewn with seed-pearls."

"Sure, an' this house'll be like a grave widout ye, Sainty, my darlin'!" said Mrs. Malone, looking at her mournfully, "and me often not able to lift my fut. But I'm not the wan to stan' in the way av yer happiness; and if Fred, now, would give over his dramin' and schamin', and find a nice gurrul to bring here, I'd give her a warm welcome; but it seems as if ye were takin' the sunshine out of my heart, Sainty."

The young girl dropped her finery to give the old mother a hug and kiss, when a step below on the frozen path made her look out. Well she knew by her heart-throbs who was coming, and throwing the dress over her arm she went down to meet him.

"Why did you not put it on?" he asked, as he enfolded both in an embrace which threatened utter destruction of the delicate fabric.

"Oh, no! it must be fresh to you on that day!" answered Sainty, with a smile.

"Fresh as the foam now-bathed in Paphian wells," answered Alan, gayly. "Sainty, do you know that to-morrow is Christmas-day? and I have brought you a present?"

"Indeed! I am not accustomed to that sort of thing. What is it like?"

"Like a prisoned dewdrop—a transformed sunbeam—an electric spark"—and Alan held before the girl's wondering eyes a superb diamond ring.

"Oh, Alan! but this must have cost a mint! Oh, you extravagant boy! I am sorry——"

"It was such a bargain, Sainty, I could not resist it. Positively, when I thought of it sparkling on your little white dimpled hand I caved in. It was a chance that comes but once in a lifetime, and I could not let it pass. Besides, you know it will always be worth its price."

"Yes; but Alan dear, it will not suit my wedding-robe. It will be laughing, as one might say, over this cheap tarletan and all the other poor things."

"Never mind, my darling; in time we'll have things to match it!" exclaimed Alan, "and you are always a jewel yourself, you know, of the very first quality;" and then he pleased himself with putting the ring on and kissing the little hand in every one of its dimples, with various other foolish devices in which lovers seem to find ineffable bliss.

A week afterwards Fred Malone, flushed and unsteady in his gait—no unusual thing with him—came into the warm kitchen where Sainty, with her sleeves turned up, was rolling out biscuit; Mrs. Malone being still disabled, sat by the table, giving directions. Nothing prettier than Sainty could be imagined as she stood there, her cheeks rosy with the warmth of the room, her eyes full of the light that so often fades with our first youth. Her round, white arms and slim, straight figure, full of the supple vivacity that comes with perfect health.

"I say, Sainty," hiccoughed Fred, without preliminary, "your feller's sloped."

It was one peculiarity of this interesting young man that, although aiming at lofty flight in his poetical frenzies, he groveled among slang in his everyday conversation.

Sainty stared at him as if she did not comprehend.

"Oh yes, fact: had it from good authority. Old Jarvis himself said he heard Alan was sweet on my sister, been givin' her diamonds and such, and wanted to know when we'd seen him last."

"Sure, it was a week ago this blessid day," said Mrs. Malone. "Ochone, my darlin'! don't believe it; it will be cleared up."

"Divil a clear!" exclaimed Fred, nonchalantly. "He'd a bin raised at New Year's, and he was so sure of it, he began borrowing beforehand. Somethin' blew the thing on him, and so he gave the concern the 'nasty shake,' as the boys say. Sainty, you're well rid of him."

Sainty sat down suddenly with a perfectly ghastly face. Everything seemed floating away into black space. A strange numbness came over her, and the pulses of life suddenly stopped. Only through all she seemed to see her lover's face—white, despairing—with all hope and love dashed out of it. Was he indeed gone—gone without a sign, a word, to the girl to whom he had pledged his life? It was too incredible! Her own Alan! He could not have done it! He would know how such a blow would crush her heart and life!

"Oh, ye omadhaun!" cried Mrs. Malone, in wrath. "Ye kilt yer sister intirely, ye blunderin' spalpeen! It takes a man to brake bad news delicately, don't it now?"

And then she forgot the rheumatiz and the tea-biscuits and went over to the poor girl who scarcely seemed to recognize her, and petted and fondled the cold hands, and made her drink hot tea, and called her all the pet baby names she had loved, and at last, with Fred's assistance, they took her into her own room and laid her on her little white bed, where she lay for hours as one dead!

When the world became real to her again, like a glimmering dawn, her mother put a note in her hand. She could not read it then, but she knew it was from Alan, and she held it fast, as a drowning mariner clings to the frail spar which is all his hope. She seemed to have been in a long dream.

Great thrills of pain went through her whole being, and she lay with folded hands and half-articulate prayers through all the brief Winter day—that faded so soon in pale eclipse. At last, when left a few moments alone, she rose and made her way with tottering steps to where the lighted candle stood. Then, as one who goes to read her doom, she opened the letter.

"MY OWN DARLING—Yes! I dare to call you so, Sainty, though it's the last time. It breaks my heart to say it—the last! I have been a sanguine fool; I made so sure of things that my impatience led me into crime. You know now what I have done! I expected to pay back that money from my first month's salary. That diamond tempted me, for one thing. If I had waited it would have been gone; and I was so sure, so fatally sure. Oh, Sainty, my own! have I indeed lost you? This pang goes deeper than all—this anguish pierces to the bone! But I can never claim you now—I, a felon, a wanderer on the face of the earth! I go to lose myself in the West. Would to God I could lose memory itself! But no, why should I forget? For oh, Sainty, I shall feel, wherever I may be, even in an alien clime, the sense of what has been—of your sweetness and the love that blessed me. But I cannot trust myself to say more. I know the end has come. My God! the end has come!

ALAN FORSYTH."

Sainty read these lines over and over, as one who learns a hard lesson by heart. It all seemed so impossible. Her wedding-dress lay there finished to the last coquettish knot of ribbon, and as she raised her eyes it met her like a ghost. Oh! could such things be? She could not bear the mockery of that ghostly dress in which she had pictured herself so often leaning on his arm, and she took it up suddenly but with reverent hand, as one touches the beloved dead, and buried it from her sight. Then she sat down, as it were, beside its grave, and wept. Oh, if there were any Lethe upon earth, how many of us would turn to pilgrims for one dear draught of those waters of forgetfulness! How gladly would we blot out all we wish to remember, if with it could be obliterated all we would forget! Make a clean sweep. Oh, waters of oblivion, wash out the words that swayed our hearts—the smiles that were our sunshine—the "touch of a vanished hand, and the sound of a voice that is still." Let the memory of that voice that with "good-day, made each day good," die out for ever. Let the kiss, whose recollection thrills us with an endless pain, never stir our pulses again. Let us stagnate in unending calms. Let us wear ourselves out in fruitless action; let us dash ourselves madly against the bars of fate. Let us do anything but remember!—for that way madness lies!

SAINTY'S CHRISTMAS GIFTS.—"AND THERE, BY THE COFFIN OF HIS DEAD CHILD, SAINTY MET HER OLD LOVER ONCE MORE!"

Digitized by Google

Ten years of storm and sunshine had passed over the world and over Sainty's life. The little farm has passed into other hands. The good old mother has not been able to migrate to the Western gold fields with her erratic son. She has gone a longer journey, to a land whose gold is incorruptible and fadeth not away.

It is Sainty's lot to forsake all she has known or cared for, and to follow the fortunes or rather the misfortunes of the visionary Fred. Poor prop as he is, he is all she has to cling to now.

So it happens that on Christmas Eve she stands at the window of a poor, bare little room and looks out upon the huts of a mining town. There is a glimpse of snowy, mountain peaks in the distance, with a clear, frosty sky above, but around her the beautiful has no place.

A noisy grogshop is near her; she can hear the oaths and the songs all the louder for the festive time, and sometimes a rough man staggers by. No wonder she is haunted by a dream of another Christmas Eve of pure and perfect happiness. Ah! she has not found oblivion yet. She wears the ring still, though its superb splendor is so out of keeping with all else—though it is in itself like a beacon-fire of memory that can never go out.

Often and often has Fred enjoled and threatened and begged that she would sell the ring and help him out in an emergency, but she has held it fast. It is the one bright thing literally in her life.

The ten years have changed her, as needs must be. She is paler now—indeed, her face is perfectly colorless, even wan. The great eyes are full of the pathos of pain. You would say this woman had a history; that she had borne the touch of fire in some fiery furnace of grief; that the waves of time had not beaten against her without leaving a scar.

Standing in the gathering gloom in her black dress, she looks like a shadow, and she is indeed but the shadow of her former self.

At this moment, hidden from her by the night, two tiny figures are making their painful way toward the struggling street—two curly-headed little lads of six and eight, who should have been saying their evening prayers at some one's knee in the firelight of home that blessed moment. Oh! how spitefully the wind nipped the poor little fellows through their thin clothing; surely, it was not tempered to these shorn lambs, but was a very wild-beast of a wind, growling at them savagely and snatching at their garments and setting its keen teeth in their very hearts.

"Only a little further, Archie," said the elder, "and I shouldn't be surprised if we found papa in the morning; and won't he be glad that we've started out to make our fortune, and perhaps we'll have a big nugget when we see him!"

"I'd rather have a piece of bread," gasped little Archie, with a shiver.

"Well now, open your mouth and shut your eyes!" exclaimed the elder, with a heroic attempt at playfulness; "there, what's that?"

"One of Mrs. Macgruder's saleratus biscuits," said Archie, "but it tastes better now she isn't near enough to box my ears!"

"Papa will call us brave little men when he hears all," said the other. "How poor mamma died so suddenly before she could tell us where he was; and how cruel Mrs. Macgruder was to us—we could not bear it—so there was nothing to do but to get up and git, was there, Archie?"

The pretty little forlorn fellow answered "No" in a spiritless way. They had, in fact, been walking all day, and their stock of courage was at a low ebb. A day's walk in that stinging atmosphere was no light work for two such children, but the elder played his part gallantly. He carried a spade in his hand and had the air of a warrior going to the battle. They passed out of the street to a place where there was a shelving bank. Looking carefully along this, the elder shouted:

"One what?" asked Archie, sleepily.

"A dugout that some one has given up. You'll be as warm as toast in a minute. Oh, I am so glad! I was afraid I would have to dig one, and my hands are so cold. See! I will just clear away the rubbish, and then—then we'll have supper, Archie. You didn't think I kept a restaurant, did you now? Well, I do; only some things are just out!"

It was wonderful—the spirit of that boy! He actually puckered his half-frozen lips into a whistle as he worked. Soon the floor of the deserted dugout was cleared, and the two crept in, staying near the door for light.

"Here you are!" said the elder boy, cheerily, "two roast taters; not so very hot, you know, and salt, and a bit of boiled beef; and look!—look! all for you, Archie!—a piece of pie."

Archie's sleepy, forlorn eyes lighted up a little.

"It's Christmas Eve," he said, suddenly. "Don't you remember how we hung up our stockings last year? I wish I could do it to-night. 'Tain't like Christmas if you don't hang up your stockings."

"Why, who in the world could put anything in here?" said the other, with a laugh.

"Oh, an angel could come down!" said Archie, with beautiful faith.

"But you don't think there are any toyshops in heaven?"

"Oh, I don't know! there is everything nice there," answered Archie.

"No! I'll tell you what will be best of all," said the elder. "To-morrow we will find papa. I know it. I feel it in my bones, as old Mrs. McGruder says, and we will go up to him and say: 'Papa, here are two Christmas gifts for you.' Oh, how he will laugh, and take us in his arms, and kiss us."

Archie could eat no more, and he was very cold.

"I will say my little prayer to you," he said, sleepily, and he knelt on the ground by his brother's side, murmuring: "'Now I lay me,'" in a tired, faint voice. "'If I should die before I wake——'"

Ah! those words stirred no alarm in the childish heart. That grim phantom, feared of man, that lies in wait for us all, seemed very far off from these little ones that night.

"You get as far back as you can, Archie, cos' it's warmer in there, and I'll lie next the door and keep off the wind," said the heroic little man.

Soon the cold benumbed them into a chilly sleep. The night came on with its clear frosty sky and myriad stars as these forlorn babes slept on. There was no robin-redbreast there to cover them with leaves.

But suddenly there is a dull sound—a sort of heavy thud! What is it like? Like the clod upon a coffin-lid! The earth has fallen in upon the little lads! Is it not indeed a clod upon a coffin? Then there is for a moment silence! Archie's troubled sleep has lapsed into perfect rest! He is not cold any more, although rigid as marble! He is transported into a world of light and warmth and undying bloom! The leaves do not fade upon the Tree of Life! The waters of that stream that maketh glad the city of our God are never frozen! No frost can touch the undying fruits that grow in the gardens of Paradise! It is well for little Archie; his Christmas Day dawns in heaven!

His short pilgrimage is over. Rest for the tired little feet that will tread no longer life's dusty highways! Peace to the little folded hands that have dropped all life's burdens! Joy to the weary eyes that will never open again on a world of sorrow and of sin—but behold, instead, the glory of the New Jerusalem and the ineffable love and tenderness which shines in the face of Him who took little children in His arms and blessed them!

The elder boy is not killed; he is only stunned and bruised. He awakens with a weight upon his breast and his hands feel as if pinned to the earth. But he struggles manfully and frees himself at last. He knows Archie is under all that earth. He himself has been saved by being so near the entrance. He knows his own puny strength is unavailing to save his brother; so he creeps out from among the ruins with sobs and cries, if haply some kind soul will help him.

Strange that Sainty, looking out in the early dawn for the wayward brother who has been keeping the festival all night with some riotous companions, should be the first to see the child. How tenderly she takes his little frozen hands and leads him to the fire while he tells her in a choked voice, interrupted by many sobs, his pitiful story.

"And he's dead!—oh I know Archie is dead!" he said, burying his head in his benumbed little hands and crying bitterly.

Soon help goes out to bring in the little body, for, as we know, Archie is indeed dead! It is Sainty's hands that prepare him for the grave. It is Sainty who cuts off the little golden curl "for papa," who lays the little limbs straight, and makes the shroud, while the brother looks on with awed and wondering eyes, and clings to her as to his sole friend.

Poor little lamb! there were no flowers to lay in his hands; the earth was too bare and frozen, and all the tender blossoms were held back within that icy prison. But Sainty, with the longing for the beautiful which had been her joy and torment through life, suddenly went to a woolen box and took out a white tarletan dress.

How many dreams of bliss she had shut up within its folds!—all her hopes—all her young life and love for ever dead!

She unbosomed the knots of cream-white satin now, and decked poor Archie's plain little shroud with them. Then with deft hand she fashioned white roses from the thin tarletan—ghosts of roses indeed, without color or perfume, looking as if wrought from a snow-wreath—but fitting enough to go down into the grave with the dead boy!

"We ought to put his name on the coffin, dear," she said to the lad at her side.

"His name's Archie Forsyth and mine's Alan!" answered the child. "Oh! what will papa say when he finds his own Archie's buried up in the ground?"

"Alan Forsyth!" murmured Sainty, as the wedding-dress fell from her hands. Had she evoked him by bringing out this ghost of the past?

It would seem so indeed, for at that moment there was a hurry in the street and a step at the door.

"Here's the father of the kid!" exclaimed a burly miner, pushing his way in. "He happened into the town this morning. He's bin to where he left the boys and found they'd hooked it. Here you are, comrade!"

And there, by the coffin of his dead child, Sainty met her old lover once more!

He told her his whole story. How he had married one far below him, because he could not bear his loneliness; but how her image had always lived in his heart. He, too, was changed, but he had not lost his old charm. Sainty could not see him lean over his darling's coffin without longing to comfort him.

And so the old, old story repeats itself. Time brings comfort to all, and

"Hope itself will smile at length,
At other hopes gone from us."

And the day came when Sainty put on the wedding-dress—yes, the very same—for Alan would have it so; and it was easy to hide the place from whence poor Archie's roses had been gathered.

Sainty often looks back to that strange day, and remembers how God brought her her heart's desire. And little Alan says "He and papa were her Christmas Gifts."

WHICH OF THEM WILL HE MARRY?

CHAPTER II.—DARING DEEDS.

PHIL CASSIDY awoke the next morning the temporary proprietor of a yacht.

He also awoke in the immediate possession of a father, and that father seated upon what is technically termed the foot of the bed.

"Hallo, father!" cries Phil, sitting up, rubbing his eyes violently with his knuckles.

"Halloo, my son!" responds a voice from the interior of Mr. Cassidy, senior. "Yer late in bed, me boy, and ye look vinous—in vinum veritum."

Phil's affection for his parents was of the most ardent nature, but there are moments when fathers are not only unnecessary, but most confoundedly in the way.

This was one of them.

How could Phil summon courage to confess his act of folly in acquiring temporary possession of the Dandie Dinmont?

Folly he knew it to be, but a sort of perfumed folly which rendered him blind to the cap and deaf to the bells.

Phil resolved upon making a clean breast of it, and with great generalship commenced by narrating the marked politeness of Mr. and Mrs. Narrowbraid, their elegance, etc. From thence he traveled towards their daughter, dilating upon her beauty and her accomplishments, and wound up by saying she was very much attached to the sea, to nautical arrangements in general, yachting in particular.

"The fact is, sir, I hired a small boat to take her out in, as a slight return for their kindness."

"Quite right, Phil! Recte Domine! I'd never begrudge fifty cents an hour when people trate you dacent. Cuo grano, my boy!"

Fifty cents an hour!

Phil wailed inwardly.

"It's a boat with a sail, father; and I—I took it by the month."

"More fool you. What the dickens good will that do you? You would have got it cheaper by taking it when you wanted it, and rose."

And Mr. Cassidy proceeded to entertain his son, during the process of dressing, with family matters, which caused the latter to forget both the Dandie Dinmont and the fair enslaver on whose behalf it was hired.

A coup de main, when well executed, is, as a rule, an extremely successful performance. Phil resolved upon bringing his parent to the upper bay, placing him on board the yacht, and taking him out to sea. The combination of effects might lessen the parental irony, as well as subdue the inevitable parental ire.

"We'll go down and look at the boat, sir," said Phil to his father, after the latter had finished a dish of chops, ditto of broiled chicken, ditto of sardines, three eggs, and half a dozen corn-cakes.

"Anything, my boy. Where is she? the North or East River?"

"She's in the upper bay."

"Why couldn't ye tie her at the Battery, and have her more contagious?"

Phil said nothing.

Having donned a very rakish suit, consisting of blue trousers, with coat and vest to match, gilt buttons, glazed hat, and patent leather boots, bought especially for marine purposes, our hero looked, if not quite the sea salt, at least a very fair imitation of a gentlemanly son of the briny. It were needless to say he was proud of his position, and longed to get on board the Dandie Dinmont with the anxiety of a child panting to become possessor of a promised toy.

Our hero never felt so important during the whole of his natural life as when replying in the negative to the invitation of a weather-beaten boatmen to hire his barge, and he glowed at furnace-heat when a sailor, with the words "Dandie I lies out" displayed upon the black band of his cap in gold letters, demanded if "the cap wished to go aboard."

The nautical gentleman placed his two hands at either side of his mouth, and gave vent to a terrific roar, in which the word "Ahoy" alone came to the surface.

In a moment the howl was responded to by another equally alarming, and a small boat, putting off from the side of the yacht, approached the dock.

"Is this her?" whispered Mr. Cassidy to Phil, pointing to the punt.

"Yes," replies Phil.

"She's too small; only a cockle-shell. There's not room for a bouzee."

"Wait a while, father," says Phil, and, safely ensconcing the author of his being in the seat of honor, he perched himself at the bow, not, however, without a series of secret and animated misgivings as to his ultimate safety.

Phil, upon arriving at the Dandie Dinmont, gladly seized the friendly hand of the skipper, and allowed himself to be hauled on the deck, much after the fashion of a large fish well gaffed.

Mr. Cassidy, senior, upon finding his portion of the punt settling deeper in the water, consequent upon his son's departure, set up a most unearthly howl, and commenced to recite scraps of prayer in the Latin, English and Irish languages.

By dint of much physical exertion he was at length safely landed upon the deck, whereupon his usual cheerfulness and equanimity returned.

A sound of revelry proceeding from the state cabin smote upon Philip's ear, and upon gazing down the skylight he discovered Mr. Horsechin at the head of the table, with Mr. Samuelson upon his right, a gentleman of Jewish aspect upon his left, and three others at various distances, all engaged in drinking champagne, and discussing the merits of a Strasburg pie.

"I say," cries Horsechin, "isn't this a lark? I am monarch of all I survey. I'll entertain you every day here, fellows, ay, and all the boys, the whole crowd. I'll swim you in champagne and claret. By Jove, I can do what I like with this young counter-jumper, and the best thing I can do for him is to spend his money for him like a gentleman, a thing he couldn't do if he tried."

"It ish a larksh," hiccoughed the Jewish gentleman.

Phil's blood, and it was good blood, boiled up. He quivered with the agony of rage. With one spring he reached the companion-ladder, with another he stood before the festive board.

"Mr. Horsechin, leave that seat at once," cried Phil, in choking tones.

"Why, what's up? What's your little game? Are you seasick?" asked the commercial traveler, a little pale.

"I'm not sick, sir, but I wish to be alone. Be good enough to leave this cutter, sir, and not to come on board till you are invited."

"Why, you are drunk, Phil Cassidy," says Mr. Horsechin, and, assuming a bold and defiant air, he added, "let's have no more of this gammon."

Phil was as cool as a cabbage-leaf.

Mr. Samuelson, I hired this yacht from you for two months at $200 a month. A copy of the written agreement, dated yesterday, is in my possession. It is now my property, and as such I shall exercise my right. You are welcome to stop, sir, if you have any arrangements to make. As for these persons, if they do not go at once, I'll cause them to be sent on shore 'in double quick.'"

"Thish ish disgrashful," murmured the Jewish gentleman. "Itsh verra bad."

"Horsechin, are you going to be bulldozed by this rowdy?" asked a gentleman hung in jewelry.

"Shall I kick him overboard in two kicks and a half?' demands another, in the most commercial manner possible.

Mr. Horsechin saw at a glance the difficulties of the situation. The game was up. He had been overheard. He was on the wrong rail. If it came to handgrips Phil could, and probably would, double him up. So he smiled a ghastly smile, and said, as he retreated towards the door:

"We can't make a silk purse out of a sow's ear. I thought to rub this snob into a gentleman, and——"

What Mr. Horsechin would have added it's impossible to determine, for, perceiving a very fierce glance in the corner of Phil Cassidy's eyes, and a very decided tightening and bony whitening of his knuckles, he judged it prudent to cut his sentence and his stick at the same moment, so he disappeared up the companion-ladder, followed by his three friends, and, having jumped into the punt, disappeared in the direction of the dock.

Much to the astonishment of his son Philip, Mr. Cassidy received the announcement of the hiring of the yacht with an unaccountable equanimity. In fact, he seemed more pleased than otherwise.

"It's a maximum figure, Phil; but as it is the first foolish thing you done since you touched the aurus of your uncle defunctus, we'll say, as the Romans did over the ashes of their dead, 'Valley—valley—valley.'"

The old gentleman rather enjoyed the prospect of extensive cruising about the bay, and luxuriated in the respectful demeanor of the skipper and crew. He insisted upon his son dispensing with his hotel in order to sojourn on board the Dandie Dinmont during the period of his ownership, and dispatched one of the crew to the Fifth Avenue Hotel for his personal luggage, which arrived in due course, consisting of a hair trunk dating from the old mail-coaching days, studded with the letter C, in brass nails, and a hat-box of so battered and dissolute a form as to doubt the possibility of its ever having been in a position to contain a hat of any description whatsoever.

Phil would gladly have gone ashore, for a certain swaying motion of the vessel caused him to feel a dismal sensation about the gastronomic regions, but Mr. Cassidy wouldn't hear of his being left alone, declining point-blank to trust himself to the punt, and it was only upon the plea of discharging his liabilities at the hotel and of calling out to Grasshopper Lodge to invite the Narrowbraids for the next day for a cruise in the bay, that his excellent parent would hear of his quitting the yacht.

"We will want something nice, for to-morrow, Phil; a 'bonny booch,' as the French say: so bring down a couple of pigs' cheeks and plenty of cabbage: and, don't forget a quart of Irish whisky, and send me over by the punt the newspapers, for tempus—that is time—will hang heavy on me till you return;" and, so saying, the old gentleman, waved a graceful adieu to his son.

Phil paid his respects at Grasshopper Lodge, found the ladies at home, and invited them for the next day.

La belle Tossie made eyes at Phil, till he began to think himself a very good-looking fellow, and to consider her as a girl possessing great penetration and enlightenment. Of course they were enchanted. "It was so kind of Mr. Cassidy—so chivalrous," adds Miss Narrowbraid, in a whisper as soft as the coo of a highly enamored dove.

And he lunched with them.

And then gave him a seat in the carriage.

And Tossie lay languidly opposite him, a white tulle vail softening the outlines of her face, and rendering her large eyes dangerously luminous.

Young gentlemen of to-day, beware of unmarried ladies who are too much given to white vails. These disguises are donned to conceal powder-puff, crows' feet, freckles, pimples and other painful attractions of a like nature. They were expressly recommended to be worn by that sainted female who is now lost to a society she was created to adorn—Madame Rachel.

It was tulle illusion to Phil Cassidy.

Great was Philip's pride of flesh to dash up to the door of Narrowbraid, Wooltuft & Company, and to be seen by his former associates laughing gayly with the beautiful daughter of the house—laughing loudly and long, although there was nothing particularly lively in her, and nothing whatever of merriment in his remarks.

Lowered was Cassidy's pride of flesh when he found himself becoming rapidly seasick in consequence of sitting with his back to the horses.

"By Jove!" gasps our hero, looking at the cover of his watch, "I must keep an appointment," and he sprang from the carriage.

"A demain!" cries Miss Narrowbraid.

"J'ai suis," responds Phil, not to be outdone, "twelve o'clock boat to-morrow," and he flies to the nearest restaurant, feebly demanding a glass of brandy.

When he reached the yacht at five o'clock, he found his parent at one end of a line fishing for flounders with the gravity of a tom-cat watching the evolutions of a giddy sparrow upon an unassailable set of tiles.

"You did not hurry yourself," remarks Mr. Cassidy, reproachfully. "If it wasn't for the newspapers and the flounders, I'd be lost. I'm so hungry I could eat a pons asinorum and a hamper of greens. Where's the cheeks? Phil, where's the cheeks?"

Our hero had scrupulously obeyed his father's orders, not for the purpose of serving this homely fare to his guests, but from a desire to please the old gentleman. He had, however, on his own account, with a laudable anxiety to provide a sufficiency of food and drink for the spread of the morrow, invested in salmon, a leg of mutton, a piece of beef, a ham, half a dozen chickens, as many ducks, a couple of meat-pies, a set of lobsters varying in size, fruit of all descriptions, sweet pies, a case of Mumm's extra champagne, some vino di pasta sherry, Marcobrunnen romet claret, port in fact. The punt had to visit the dock four times in order to carry these marine stores on board. These preparations seemed to afford exquisite delight to the mariners attached to the Paradise Dinmont, whose experiences of their former commodore were of the description which can be only conveyed through the medium of the word "fluty."

They, or rather Mr. Cassidy, senior, dined upon fried fish—the smell of which nearly set poor Phil off again—and a beefsteak. Mr. Cassidy, père, was as good as his word, and conquered a splendid appetite after a most vigorous and protracted siege.

Dinner having concluded, he ascended to the deck with a well-brewed tumbler of punch in one hand, his fishing-line in the other; the latter had been transferred to him through the cabin-window during dinner-time, and was attached to his leg in order to make him feel the bite of the luckless fish, and secure his prey without any unnecessary delay.

"Would you like a sail this fine evenin', sir?" asks the skipper of Mr. Cassidy, senior, in respectful terms.

"Is there any chance of a slant of wind?" demanded the latter, with becoming nautical gravity.

"Of a what, sir?"

"A slant of wind."

"Do you mean a cupful, sir?"

"Of course! of course! What else?" says Mr. Cassidy, and despite the earnest remonstrances of his son, Phil, the old gentleman insisted upon taking a "slant round the bay," and, with a view of facilitating matters, got himself hopelessly entangled in a rope, from which he had to be extricated by one of the crew, who, during the process of disentanglement, muttered something between his teeth which sounded very like the word "lubber," with a prefix.

When Philip perceived that a sail was inevitable, he resolved to meet the situation like a man, and, with feelings somewhat akin to those of Lord Nelson when preparing for the battle of Trafalgar, descended to the cabin and arrayed himself in full sailing costume, including a telescope, which he slung gracefully across his shoulders and reappeared in the evening light prepared for victory or—the other thing.

Great was Mr. Cassidy's delight upon being called upon to "bear a hand" at the hoisting of the mainsail, and proportionate was his alarm lest the yacht should escape from her moorings, and bear down upon a neighboring schooner with which he was already on friendly terms, having had a chat with the skipper, with whom he had exchanged newspapers,

L'homme propose. Just as they had hoisted their mainsail, and were heaving on the jib halyards, a sharp shot and sudden crack announced that the bobstay had failed at the most critical moment. There was nothing for it but to haul down the sail and make arrangements for replacing the injured stay ere morning light.

Mr. Cassidy's disappointment and his son's relief were equally great.

"I don't like the name of the boat, Phil," said his father, Mr. Cassidy, over his second tumbler in the cabin, after he had spoken his mind pretty freely to the skipper relative to the mishap that had taken place. "I don't like the name—I like a dandy of punch as well as most men, but a Dandy Dinmont is a mixture I don't know at all, at all. Its neither callidum cum nor frixi sine. Let us change the name. Tempora mutantur. Let us have something classical, say the Apollo Belvaydere. That's a name for a yacht, and no mistake, or a man-of-war, for the matter of that."

Philip was not in a mind to dispute the question, although under the impression that ships generally, and yachts particularly, were supposed to be of the female gender, and that Apollo, at least, was decidedly male, if not Belvidere. So Mr. Cassidy drank success to the creation of his classical fancy, and prepared to turn-in for the night, or, as he termed it, "to go to bed on a shelf."

Phil went on deck and gazed at the shore glittering with a thousand lights: gazed at the gentle moon, listened to strains of sweet music wafting themselves like incense across the pellucid waters, and thought of—not of Tossie Narrowbraid, but of that rare and radiant maiden whose beauty smote him like a sunbeam, and whose image the tide of events had nearly carried to the great sea of oblivion—Annie Tumtint.

* * * * *

Phil Cassidy did not indulge in the stereotyped forty winks.

He did not close an eye.

The motion of the vessel was painfully suggestive of alarming illness.

The plashing of the water close to his ear was forcibly reminsdful that a frail plank stood between him and conger-eels, if not of sharks.

The snoring of his parent was not of that soothing nature calculated to woo one to the arms of the drowsy god: consequently Phil Cassidy slept not.

He bethought him of the morrow until the morrow came upon him, arising in cloudless glory, paling the stars, and snubbing to a fearful degree the little oil-lamp which swung over the head of his parent, who snored as though a "slant of wind" had invaded the portals of his nostrils, and was there disporting itself and engaged in the process of making as much noise and racket as circumstances would permit.

Phil went upon deck, and there encountered his skipper, who greeted him with:

"Mornin', sir,"

"Good-morning," replied Phil.

"Is your party to be a big wan, sir?" asked the skipper.

"Only three."

"Any faymales?"

"Two."

"Have they good stomicks?"

Phil considered this a very indelicate question, and responded coldly:

"Pon my word, I can't say."

"They'll want them to-day, sir."

Phil thought that under any circumstances this was not improbable, and asked the meaning of these dark prognostications.

"Ye'll have a ground-swell, and that's the wust swell agoin'," replied the skipper.

Our hero considered Mr. Horsechin a swell, and Mr. Cottim, the silk-buyer of Messrs. Bombazine & Co., who sported patent-leather boots, with yellow uppers, and green gloves on Sundays, a howling swell, but a ground-swell was utterly beyond his comprehension.

"I assure you, the gentleman who is coming on board to-day, although moving in the highest circles, and keeping his carriage—in fact, the great Mr. Narrowbraid, of Narrowbraid, Woolstuff & Company"—and Phil paused to witness the effect of this announcement upon the skipper—"doesn't pretend to be a swell at all. He is as plain and as quiet as—as—" Phil was at a loss for a simile, so he added, "as anything. I assure you," he added, with great simplicity, "he is not a ground-swell, but he is a very distinguished person."

The skipper hid his mouth in the palm of his horny hand and shook violently, moved by repressed mirth. When his risible faculties had been "hauled in" and "made taut," he explained the nature of the swell in question, and dilated with a ghastly minuteness upon the various stages of sea-sickness inevitable to those consigning themselves to be rocked upon its treacherous bosom.

Philip's soul was troubled.

What if he were compelled to succumb in the presence of Miss Narrowbraid.

He who had boasted of his nautical exploits. He who had led her to infer that the American fleet would be safe under his command.

The fatal dinner at Grasshopper Lodge!

The fatal mixture of sherry, hock, champagne, etcetera.

Oh, my brothers, glance back at a few pages in the books of your lives. Read half a dozen lines of each, and will you not find that all your follies, all your extravagances, all your angers, all your heartburnings, all your humiliations, all your quarrels, all that we would wipe from out the record, have been entered therein because of mixing your liquor? It may have been princely Johannisberg, or Château Yquem, it may have been B.-and-S., it may have been lager beer or XX porter; the potation may have been as deep as a "draw-well" or light as the dewdrop in the flower-cup, but was it not sufficient to clog the subtle machinery of the brain, and does not one false turn of the tiniest wheel set glorious motive power astray?

Close the book, my brothers, and cry amen!

Phil Cassidy eat no breakfast. How could he? His mind partook of the nature of the contents of a bottle of seltzer-water which had been opened at least a fortnight. Not a sparkle, not one cheery globule to rise to the surface.

His parent, on the other hand, strong in the knowledge of his classical powers, preserved a masterly inactivity, and betook him to the Herald and the Sounders, as if nothing particular was going to happen.

"Leave the old hen to me, Phil, and you mind the chickey. If Mr. Narrowbraid comes, hand him over to me likewise, in toto parcurie, and remember, the first thing to do to make all comfortable is to give them a sketch of brandy. The women will say 'oh!' at first, but leave it contagious, say nothing, and, 'wow-wow' says the fox."

Having delivered himself of these practical suggestions, Mr. Cassidy proceeded to read the Herald and adjust his lines; whilst Phil, arrayed in his nautical costome, went ashore, rowed by two sailors, clad in blue ganzies, and surmounted by the reddest possible nightcaps.

Previous to embarking, the skipper demanded if Phil required the gig.

"The what?"

"The gig, sir."

"What gig?"

"The yacht's gig, sir."

"Oh, thank you," says poor Phil, "I prefer walking; it's not worth while to drive so short a distance."

The skipper collapsed.

To enter into a psychological analysis of Phil Cassidy's feelings as he awaited the arrival of the boat at the ——landing would involve a chapter worthy of the pen of Mr. Victor Hugo. The chapter would scarcely be worth perusal, though, since the incident of a young gentleman prowling about a dock pavement, looking anxiously at his watch every two minutes, peering out in the direction from whence the steamboat is expected, cross-examining the employés as to when she is due, expressing doubts as to her safety, and when she does arrive, touching up his hat a little, adjusting his cravat and gloves, and, finally, receiving a salutation from a young lady whom he at first pretends not to perceive, is of so common and everyday an occurrence, that anything written about it could scarcely impart additional or satisfactory light.

Phil stood on the dock, and, as the boat approached, felt his heart beat fast and furiously, and wherefore he cannot tell.

The crowd pour out.

The Narrowbraids have missed the boat.

Perhaps they're not coming at all!

Ah, yes. Here they are.

Philip turns away.

"How do you do, Mr. Cassidy?" says Mrs. Narrowbraid. "Mr. Narrowbraid will be down by the next boat. I took the liberty of bringing a young lady with me. Mr. Cassidy, Miss Tumtint."

Phil was too much engaged, it must be confessed, in squeezing Miss Narrowbraid's hand, to glance at her friend.

He turns.

He becomes riveted to the ground, at least by one foot, for the other is grinding the corn of an irate elderly gentleman who pushes him into Mrs. Narrowbraid's arms, with an ejaculation rhyming to "jamnation."

Do his eyes deceive him?

Is it a mockery, a delusion, and a snare?

"Good heavens!" says Phil, "can this be true?"

The crowd jostled them along with it. Philip was thrown beside Miss Tumtint.

He should have addressed her.

He didn't.

He stared like an owl with glass eyes.

He fell over a small boy, and then into a luggage-truck.

He barked his shins, and another portion of his frame receiving injury.

There was a rake, teeth upwards, in the truck.

What cared he for physical torture?

"His life, his love, his own dear Genevieve," was beside him.

"I hope we shall have a fine day," chirps Miss Narrowbraid.

She might as well have been addressing a brown-stone flag or the statue of General Washington.

"Is your yacht far out in the bay?" demands Mrs. Narrowbraid.

"Yes; oh, no—that is, quite close," gasps Phil.

Mrs. Narrowbraid threw one penetrating glance into him. She feared that he, like unto his pleasure-boat, might be half-seas-over.

Having arrived at the landing-stairs, Phil descended first, in order to help the ladies into the boat.

Mrs. Narrowbraid entered it freely enough.

Miss Narrowbraid insisted that Phil should remain on the jetty whilst she descended, fearing he would see her ankles.

Phil did see them, and was not ambitious of another peep.

The limbs of the turkey are admirable from an ornithological point of view, but do not become the female form divine.

Miss Tumtint, without waiting for her friend, descended the steps. Her dress caught in an iron ring. This contretemps revealed a foot, and—well—yes—why not—certainly——

Whisper!

Such as Vestris might have feared in rivalry.

Phil assisted her into the boat.

The galvanic shock that went through him as her plump little hand confidingly placed itself in his!

Her little white paw descended like a young dove into the brown nest of Philip's palm.

He forgot Miss Narrowbraid on the jetty, who was nearly being left alone like unto Black-eyed Susan.

Miss Narrowbraid uttered several musical and hysterical, but highly interesting, screams from behind her white veil, as the boat sped on its way to the yacht, steered by Philip.

Had she been aware of how unskillful was the "man at the helm," she might have good cause for shrieking in earnest, for on two occasions her life was in imminent peril, once when he came foul of the springwarp of the revenue cruiser, and again when he fouled a buoy, besides which, in the chaos of yachts by which he was surrounded, he experienced no little difficulty in discovering his own; and were it not that his parent maintained a running fire of yells, of "Phil, Phil Cassidy! Phil, I say!" until he succeeded in attracting his son's attention, it is doubtful whether, of his own skill and knowledge, Philip would ever have reached the vessel at all.

As they approached the Apollo Belvidere, he stood up by way of displaying his extreme ease and nautical acquirements. A sudden jerk, consequent upon the stroke-oar having grappled the yacht, staggered Philip, and, as self-preservation is the first law of nature, he clutched Mrs. Narrowbraid by the hair of the head, inflicting considerable damage, having previously administered to her, in his endeavor to grasp at something, the complete materials for a black eye; and then, as the boat swayed the other way, and whilst he was in the act of endeavoring to recover his previous footing, he was thrown violently into Miss Narrowbraid's lap, and from thence bounded to the bottom of the boat, where he lay like a limp and gaping codfish until raised from his recumbent position by the efforts of Miss Tumtint, the other two ladies being too much occupied by their recent injuries to bestow as much as a single thought upon him.

It is a sad thing to witness a brave man overwhelmed with misfortune—to behold him struggling against inevitable destiny and receiving blow after blow between the eyes, whilst he expends his strength upon "fibbing" the air.

This is a true story, and the events as they presented themselves must be narrated without any shunting into sidings, or any discoloration of the stern realities.

Phil Cassidy, when placed upon his feet, resolved upon making a supreme effort to regain the good opinion of his guests, and to recover by a coup de main from the excessive discomfiture to which he had been so mercilessly subjected.

The boat had approached the bows of the yacht and was passing quite close to the bobstay, when Phil, stepping lightly upon the gunwale, sprang towards the bowsprit with the intention of grasping it and of performing an acrobatic feat which would have placed him, in the eyes of the female occupants of the boat, on a level with Leotard himself.

He missed the bowsprit.

He caught the bobstay.

The stay was loose and gave with him, and in one second he was up to his chin in water, blowing like a grampus, and churning the briny with a vigor equal to the tracks of the paddles of a steam-tug.

The ladies screamed; Miss Narrowbraid pretended to faint; Mrs. Narrowbraid gazed helplessly at him with her available eye, and Miss Tumtint thrust forward a dainty parasol with the idiotic idea of fishing him out by the ivory crook attached thereto.

The skipper, who was on board, rushed forward, leant over the bowsprit, gripped Philip's collar, and held him up until he was fished into the punt, and from thence conveyed, like a wet sack, to the deck.

Oh, hero of this love story, how fallen is thy crest! How battered is thy helmet! How many gaping orifices are in thy harness!

It was a painful sight to see Mrs. Narrowbraid and her daughter assisted on board—the one with her hand to her injured eye, the other displaying a Grecian bend—an acute angle—the painful consequence of being unexpectedly and violently doubled up. Philip's mortification was grinding.

"How dare you do that, sir?" cries Phil to the luckless stroke-oar, trying in the weakness of human nature, to place his own awkwardness at the threshold of another.

"Do what, sir?" asks the "stroke," choking with volcanic merriment.

"Don't speak to me, sir: you leave my ship, sir. I never saw so awkward a scoundrel. The presence of these ladies protects you—you wretch!"

"A bit of cold beefsteak, ma'am, will do your eye a power of good. Frigidæ sine, ma'am," said Mr. Cassidy, to Mrs. Narrowbraid, "and just a sketch of brandy or a tent of sperrits: ver more frightened nor hurt: and I think, miss," he added, turning to Tossie, "if you were to get your chest rubbed smart and lively by that comrade of yours, it would straighten your back a bit. Blur-and-ages, Phil, why couldn't you maintain your equilibrium, and not go hoppin' about like a crow in a cornfield?"

"I don't think it was quite Mr. Cassidy's fault," interposed Miss Tumtint.

Phil blessed her.

"Come now, ladies; get into the cabin and tittyvate yourselves," cries Mr. Cassidy. "Here's the steak for you, ma'am, you'd better apply it, or your eye will be as black as my shoe in the morning. Don't forget the sketch, you'll find it on the table," and the good natured old fellow actually thrust them below, his last words from the deck being, "Don't neglect the sketch, ladies; don't neglect the sketch, to put betune you and the cold."

* * * * *

It has never been clearly ascertained whether the ladies improved upon Mr. Cassidy's suggestion as to the "sketch" of brandy. That the contents of the bottle lowered themselves by one inch is a matter of history, but whether they had been applied with a view to the amelioration of the condition of the damaged visual organ, inwardly or outwardly, is a question open to discussion, and may yet form an agreeable and exciting theme for one of those numerous debating societies which enliven our city by talented discussions upon mighty and majestic subjects. Phil Cassidy changed his garments in feverish haste.

He donned the favorite blue silk waistcoat with the brass buttons.

He collapsed into a pair of shepherd's plaid trousers of a very magnified pattern.

He choked himself in a green satin scarf, checkered over with scarlet flowers, and stuck a ghastly pin, in playful imitation of a death's head, at the very point of the scarf, where no pin should by any possibility appear.

A black frock with very long skirts completed his toilet; and in order to render his "get up" utterly irresistible, he stuffed his unfortunate hands into primrose-colored gloves, till each individual finger seemed ready to burst up like an overblown indiarubber ball.

He stood for at least ten minutes opposite the mirror in the tank-shaped cabin endeavoring to adjust a stubbly lock of hair that reeked again with marrow-oil, and when at length he reappeared upon deck, all aglow with excitement, and all of an end with confusion, Miss Tumtint was of opinion that he looked to considerably greater advantage in his wet clothes.

And was she not in the right?

Phil ordered luncheon.

Mr. Narrowbraid arrived just as the order was given, bringing with him a Mr. Tomkins, son of Tomkins Brothers & Tomkins, St. Paul's Churchyard, London, a pinkish young man, with hay-colored hair, and dressed as only London men can dress.

Mr. Tomkins was presented to the ladies, to whom he bowed after the fashion of an Italian innkeeper on the arrival of a party of tourists preceded by a courier.

When introduced to Philip, he deliberately raised his eyeglass, screwed it into a corner of his eye, stared, let it drop on one of the buttons of his coat with a click like the cocking of a gun, and gave a short supercilious nod.

Phil hated him.

The luncheon was served on deck by desire of the ladies.

Mr. Tomkins seized upon a camp-stool and monopolized Miss Tumtint.

Phil had brought this identical stool on deck with a view to adapting it to the very purpose for which it was now being used by another.

He ground his teeth.

He loosened the dollar false one.

To do Miss Narrowbraid justice, she rendered herself most agreeable to Phil, and flattered him to the masthead.

He had no ears for her.

Miss Tumtint and Mr. Tomkins were laughing.

Was it at him?

Tomkins's chances of again seeking St. Paul's Churchyard without accident were lessening themselves.

Phil approached Miss Tumtint with an open bottle of champagne.

"Some champagne, Miss Tumtint?" says Cassidy.

"Don't take champagne with chicken. Try Moselle?" interposes Tomkins, and then, turning to one of the crew, "I say, you fellow, bring a bottle of Moselle here and some ice."

"Take your orders from me," says Phil to the man; and, addressing Miss Tumtint in a manner that every word resembled a small chip of ice, "Do you want for anything?"

"Oh, dear no, thanks; everything is charming. But are you not going to give us a sail?"

She saw with the sharpness of her sex that a storm was brewing, and that Cupid was coming to the aid of Boreas, with his jaunty little wings.

Philip brightened up like a bottle-fed infant when it beholds the source of its comfort at hand.

Her words acted talismanically.

"Ahoy!" cries Phil; "ahoy, there, lads; strike your jibboom! Haul away your marlingespike! Let go the topgallant sail! Reef your bowsprit! Splice your rudder!" and the heroic youth, in the full flush of his nautical knowledge, seized hold of a rope which he proceeded to loosen with the utmost possible dispatch. Luckily for those on deck, the skipper wrenched it from his hands.

"Let go, sir. Do you want to brain your company? Another twist, and the whole sail, boom and all, are about your ears."

"Confound it!" cries Phil, again on the wrong rail. "Why don't you fasten your moorings on the right holdfast? You must see to this, sir."

The skipper replied not, but proceeded to assist in the process of getting under weigh, which was safely and rapidly accomplished, and the Apollo Belvidere glided gracefully from her moorings.

Phil announced his intention of steering.

Mrs. Narrowbraid having had a painful experience of his nautical skill in this respect already, not only opened her healthy eye in horror at the announcement but the injured one also.

"Oh, Mr. Cassidy," she says, "you must come out and chat to the ladies! Tossie, love, try your influence with Mr. Cassidy. This gentleman," she added, pointing to the skipper, "will do the steering business."

This gentle pressure on the part of Mrs. Narrowbraid relieved Phillip's mind.

He knew about as much of steering as a hedgehog of the caucus.

"Mr. Cassidy, you must come and remain with us," chirped Miss Narrowbraid, who participated largely in the feelings of terror indulged in by her parent, "we shall see nothing of you if you remain there."

"Ye'll see nothin' of any of us afore long if he gets a steerin' the boat," mutters the skipper.

Phil allowed himself to be persuaded to give up the tiller and join the little party assembled in the cockpit.

The cockpit consisted of a small inclosed space near the centre of the boat—within the inclosure cushions, upon which the ladies lounged much after the fashion of those females who are presented to us in pictures, with the pleasing fiction appended beneath the portrait signifying that the gazer is beholding "the light of the harem."

Our hero perched himself upon what is technically termed a "fender" in the immediate vicinity of Miss Tumtint.

"Why don't he sit beside me?" wonders Tossie. "I left him room enough, heaven knows. Bah, he's a booby!" and yet she laid the flattering unction to her soul that the bashfulness consequent upon deep, deep love, alone prevented him from skipping to her side.

Girls of the period, rapidly approaching your thirtieth Summer, when you go on a party of pleasure where you expect to meet Brown, who danced twice with you at Perkins's ball, or Jones, who has called three times at Madison Avenue, never be humbugged into allowing a gurl in her teens to accompany you.

It's worse than a crime. It's a mistake.

Try it just for once, and the chances are you'll never be guilty of a like imprudence.

Mr. Cassidy, senior, had lunched heartily.

Mr. Cassidy, senior, was considerably elevated.

"Now I call this as jolly a little party," observed that worthy individual, smiling benignly upon the company, "as ever I contemplated. The ocean cum dignitate. The three graces," bowing to the ladies. "Juno, Mrs. Narrowbraid; Minerva, Miss Tossie, and Venus, my charming young friend here with the hay-colored hair."

"This venerable donkey is father to the young one," chanted Mr. Tomkins, quite ignorant of the fact that Phillip was sitting close beside him.

Unluckily for him, his little spark of wit fell upon a powder magazine.

Phil Cassidy tapped him upon the shoulder and whispered into his ear:

"Step up towards the front end of the boat with me for a minute."

There was that in our hero's manner which demanded instant compliance.

The commander and the dog.

"Excuse me for a moment," says Tomkins to Miss Tumtint, and he approached Phil, who stood waiting for him, a small thunder cloud upon his face.

"Well, Mister Cassidy," drawled Tomkins, half jauntily.

"See here, now," said Phil, "I suppose you call yourself a gentleman; but I ask you is it a gentlemanly thing to sneer at anything in a man's house, for this is my house; and—and—I ask you, is it a gentlemanly thing to joke at an old man who is doing his best to please everybody? I tell you, sir," added Phil, "that for all your fine clothes, and your darned eyeglass, he is a better gentleman than you, anyhow."

Tomkins hesitated, but only for a second.

"You are right, Mr. Cassidy," said he. "I was wrong; I'm very sorry. I did a rotten thing, and I apologize. Can I do more?"

They shook hands, and repaired to the cabin, where they liquored up; and Tomkins, throwing aside the chrysalis affectation and conceit in which he had enshrined himself, came out a most agreeable butterfly, and aided very considerably in the harmony and good fellowship that existed during the entire cruise.

A slight breeze sprang up.

Miss Narrowbraid begged for her shawl.

Instead of seizing upon the opportunity of adjusting it around her pretty figure, Phil Cassidy left that office to Mr. Tomkins, and nearly brained himself in his hurry to descend to the cabin for a railway rug, wherein to wrap the delicate form of the real object of his adoration.

Tossie received Mr. Tomkins's attentions with an amount of affability somewhat startling and unnerving that young gentleman, and Philip regained the camp-stool, and fed his feverish soul on the music of the voice of the enslaver.

And the yacht glided onwards, and Philip's heart beat extra double-knocks against his waistcoat, and swelled so big within him that the source of his voice seemed as though it had been sat upon, and the voice itself became only capable of producing hoarse and discordant squeaks.

He managed, however, to give Miss Tumtint a short biographical sketch, and a general insight into his career prior to his meeting her.

"I cannot tell you what came over me, miss, when I caught your eyes across the counter at Narrowbraid's. I—I felt that I had met my fate."

"Is not that the Coney Island elevator?" says the young lady; but in a way as much as to say, "don't mind any interruption from me, it doesn't count. This is delightful, my friend."

"Yes," continues Phil. "I ran to the doors after you and missed you. I eat no dinner. I sat in my room, looking out at the chimney-pots, and I was utterly wretched, when what do you think happened?"

"I can't say, I'm sure. Do people live in that elevator?"

"The old woman brought me in a letter from my father. I wasn't going to open it—I was too melancholy."

"How very wrong not to open your father's letter at once."

"I was thinking of somebody else," says Phil.

"How beautiful Staten Island looks!" cries Miss Tumtint.

"I know something much more beautiful," says poor Cassidy, and, finding that the young lady persistently gazed at the island in question, he continued his narrative. "And what do you think was in the letter, miss?"

"Plenty of good advice! I'm sure you do require it."

"Not a bit. The letter told me I was left fifteen thousand a year, by the death of my uncle Tim."

"How delighted you must have been?"

"I went nearly mad; not so much on account of the money, but because I could leave Narrowbraid's—and—and——"

"Shall we go about, sir?" shouts the skipper.

Philip wished that official in the very bosom of a whale.

"Shall we go about, sir?" repeated the skipper.

"Go about what?"

"Go about, sir."

Seeing that this was a thing to be done, although he had not the faintest conception of its meaning, and being desirous of appearing thoroughly nautical, he cried: "By all means, skipper—by all means."

"Then stand by," bowls the skipper.

The helm was put up, the foresheets shaken out, and the little vessel swung round.

At this particular moment, Mrs. Narrowbraid arose from the cockpit, assisted by Mr. Cassidy, senior, for the purpose of gaining a better view of the Narrows.

The boom of the mainsail came into violent contact with her head.

A small splinter inserted itself in her chignon, removing that article, leaving her cranium as bare as a billiard-ball or a boiled egg.

Mr. Narrowbraid made a grab at his wife's locks as they swept past him seaward.

He fell overboard.

Mrs. N. fainted.

She would have done this in any case. She would also have torn her hair, but her hair was torn already.

Miss Tossie screamed, calling wildly upon her parent to keep himself afloat for the sake of his family, the chances being that he would make an effort in this direction on his own particular account, without considering family ties at all.

The skipper ran the yacht up into the wind preparatory to lowering a boat.

"Oh, save him! Mr. Cassidy, save him!" cries Miss Tumtint.

Phil never hesitated.

He did not know how to swim.

What cared he—she had asked him to do a certain thing, and do it he should and would.

He threw off the long-tailed frock, and with one bound plunged into the seething waters.

Mr. Narrowbraid, who had sunk once, rose beside him.

Philip clutched him by the hair.

Mr. Narrowbraid, not to be outdone, responded by grasping the oily locks of Cassidy.

Phil could not keep him up, so he sank with him.

Luckily, the skipper arrived with the gig and a boat-hook.

Upon the reappearance of the submerged ones, the skipper grappled Mr. Narrowbraid with his left hand, whilst with the boat-hook in his right he struck at Phil, and succeeded in hooking him by the shepherd's plaid inexpressibles.

Mr. Narrowbraid was hauled into the gig.

Our hero remained suspended over the water much after the fashion of the pantaloon when the clown facetiously raises that personage by a gentle but dexterous use of the forefinger and thumb.

"Let me g—g—g—o!" gurgles Phil, preferring a watery grave to the ignominy of his position.

He was lugged on board the yacht much after the fashion of a sack of flour.

Mr. Cassidy, senior, insisted upon both gentlemen being put to bed and being supplied with hot brandy-and-water, ad lib.

Mrs. Narrowbraid emerged from the cabin, and in a burst of enthusiastic gratitude, rushed over to Philip, threw her arms round his neck, and kissed him three times in rapid succession, pouring forth a torrent of thanks, and pronouncing him the most redoutable of living men.

"My husband wishes to see you. He is coming round."

Phil wished her in Jericho, but obeying the behest, descended to the cabin to find Mr. Narrowbraid in a state of extreme contentment, with one hand grasping a steaming tumbler of brandy punch, brewed by Mr. Cassidy, senior, the other holding that worthy individual's hand in a cordial and confidential grip.

"My dear boy, my son," cries Mr. Narrowbraid, upon whom the brandy-and-water had commenced to operate, "let me call you my son—my b—boy. You've saved my life. I owe you my life. How can I repay you? Answer me that?" Here he sat up in the berth and looked very grim. "Let any man answer me that, if he can! I say if he can! I pause for a reply!"

Finding that his conjectures were pretty accurate, and that the pause was likely to be continuous, he comforted himself with a pull at the tumbler.

"Phil Cassidy, I owe you my life! There is only one way I can repay you. I have a child, a treasure. I did intend her for the military. You love her!" Phil started violently. "You love her; nobody blames you—you couldn't help it! You are worthy of any woman's love. As I mentioned before, I did intend her for the military. I give that up for your happiness; you have gained her young affections. Come to my arms, my son-in-law, my son."

Preparatory to embracing his newly-found relative, Mr. Narrowbraid finished the contents of the tumbler, placed it beside him in the berth, relinquished Mr. Cassidy's hand, and opened his arms.

"He's too confused with his good luck to speak," interrupted Mr. Cassidy, highly pleased with the proposed alliance. "It's his happiness that's bothering him; he was always shy. Get out of this and go up to her;" he added, shoving his son towards the companion-ladder.

Philip mechanically went on deck. Happily, Tomkins was engrossing Tossie. Miss Tumtint was alone at the bows, gazing abstractedly into the blue waters.

Yes, the impulse that bade him approach her was irresistible. His fate was at work. He bowed to his kismet.

He is beside her. His heart has ceased to beat. His voice is very thick. He speaks slowly and with a painful effort.

"Miss Tumtint," he says, "from the moment I saw you I felt that——"

"Mr. Cassidy, I—I know—that is, I—I guess what you are going to say."

"Then let me say it," pleads Phil.

"I—I cannot."

"Oh, why, why?"

"Because it would be wrong. I am engaged to——"

He heard no more—a mist came upon his eyes, his head reeled, he staggered against the bowsprit. He fell flat with a terrific smack upon a large bluefish that the sailors had spread out to dry preparatory to cooking it.

When the Apollo Belvidere reached her moorings, her owner jumped into the punt and was rowed ashore.

CHAPTER THE LAST—CHRISTMAS CARDS.

"YE don't seem over warm in regard to Tossie Narrowbraid," observed Mr. Cassidy to his son some weeks after the memorable yachting excursion.

Philip had become thin and pale, had allowed his hair to grow and the collars of his coat to get greasy. The lamp of life which had glowed with the brightness of a Jablochoff candle, was now but a dim rushlight.

He took his meals at uncertain intervals, and his drinks with a reckless regularity. His voice was sepulchral, and he indulged in groanings suggestive of the very lowest depths of dyspepsia, combined with despair. The Narrowbraids were gushingly attentive. Tiny pink missives came from Tossie, couched in those bewildering diminutives known only to engaged people; she addressed him as her Philip, and although the luckless youth had never told his love, she evidently, and in a spirit that did her infinite honor, resolved to save him as much trouble on that head as was possible.

The first of these billet-doux caused Cassidy as much surprise as affliction. Had he committed himself on that fatal trip in the Dandie Diamont? Had he, in a moment of desperation, when memory was seared by despair, offered his $10,000 and his hand—not his heart—to the sole daughter of the house of Narrowbraid & Woodtuft?

It must be so. Her father had, in the most magnanimous manner, bestowed her upon him, and he was bound to accept the precious gift with becoming gratitude.

Annie Tumtint! Ah, what was she to him now? An empty sound, a bitter mockery! A lovely vision, and the raven perched directly over his bleeding heart croaked grimly, "Nothing more."

The night of the yachting trip found Phil Cassidy at the Fifth Avenue Hotel. The following morning he was on the cars en route for anywhere—nowhere.

He touched at Cleveland, remained a few days at Chicago for his impedimenta, and then went South to New Orleans, returning in November, via Texas, to New York.

Every post-office at which he inquired for letters from his father, brought him gushing epistles from Tossie Narrowbraid, until, like a bird whose wings have been clipped, he came back to Gotham to roost.

There was nothing else for it. Fifty times he was going to write to the loving and passion-stricken girl—at least his vanity told him that she was, and that is what draws the wariest woman-hater of them all into the toils, the strongest Sampson unto the Delilahs—to tell her that he could not give his hand when his heart was beneath the dainty Pompadour shoes of another. While he read and re-read Miss Narrowbraid's epistles, he never committed himself by responding to any of them. "I'll explain my silence," he would reason, "I'll tell her all when we meet." And when they did meet, what did he tell her? We blush for him! We hide our crimsoned face as we write the lines! He said that he never called for letters. Shame! Fie, fie! Out upon thee, Philip Cassidy!

"Absence makes the heart grow fonder," sings the old song. Does it? We doubt it. There is nothing more sedative than travel, and for that fever commonly known as love it is a simple and almost effectual cure. Time is all that is required to make it absolute.

Phil returned to New York, and put up at the Windsor this time. He meditated a European tour—alone.

"If I am to marry Miss Narrowbraid, she can wait," he argued. Where, oh where was the chivalry of the nineteenth century?

He had not been an hour at the hotel when Mr. Narrowbraid bounded into his room. "My dear, dear, dear Philip!" exclaimed that gentleman, wringing both Cassidy's hands, and refusing to utter more in consequence of an emotional hoarseness in the throat.

Phil lost his presence of mind; all his courage, like that of Bob Acres, oozed out at the palms of his hands.

"How's Miss——"

"Call her Tossie."

"How is Tossie, then?" the endearing pet-name somehow or other sticking in the region of his windpipe.

"Languishing, Philip, but unchanged! Pale and anxious! Thin!" He need scarcely have mentioned the latter fact; in this regard she was indeed unchanged.

"You'll come out and stop with us. Your dear, kind-hearted, noble parent is domesticated beneath our humble roof."

"My father?"

"He has been with us for the past week. Your room awaits you. Don't give me away, when I tell you that my child has arranged it with her own fair hands."

Mr. Narrowbraid did not deem it necessary to add that the apartment in question had been prepared for the wife of the San Francisco portion of the firm, who had, in order to beguile the tedium of the journey, eloped with an army officer while coming East.

Tossie put up a pair of imperceptible lips, upon which Phil Cassidy deposited an explosive kiss, when she met him that evening at Grasshopper Hall. A young gentleman attired in gray and brass buttons, and a shirt-collar that supported a pair of very exuberant red ears, scowled in a corner at this performance, and, apparently addressing the window-curtain, muttered something in reference to the unspeakable rapture it would afford him, then and there, to punch somebody's head.

Phil glared at the youth in gray, and the youth in gray returned the look with one of haughty defiance.

"Oh, it's only Mr. Pittsburg, a West Point cadet," said Tossie. "Mr. Cassidy, Mr. Pittsburg."

Cassidy père, whom Phil discovered very much at home, indeed, and discussing the merits of a tumbler of whisky toddy hot, was delighted to see his son. "You're all broke up, faire sorra," he exclaimed, "it's love, I suppose. It hits chaps in different ways, cum grano. As for me, when I was courting your mater in the sweet Vale of Avoca, it's the mountain-dew that stood to me. Take a sketch, Phil, ma bouchal. Here's her health," said the old gentleman, filling out a goodly horn of the barley bree.

"Her health," and Phil groaned after the fashion of the leading delineators of tragic passion.

"You don't seem over warm in regard to Tossie Narrowbraid, Phil."

"Ah!" groaned our hero.

"Have you the stomach-ache?"

"Bah!"

And beyond spasmodic interjections, Mr. Cassidy could elicit no expression of opinion from his son. Mr. and Mrs. Narrowbraid, while they gushed over Philip, gave a very cold shoulder indeed to the young gentleman in gray, never so much as addressing him and replying to his sallies by curt monosyllables. The young gentleman, possibly in order to be avenged, and as he saw an opportunity for punishing them, seemed to resolve upon punishing their wine. Hock, sherry, champagne and tawny port fell to his bow and spear with the most unerring certainty.

Phil detected nods, looks and wreathed smiles passing between the young gentleman in gray and the daughter of the house, and a sort of glance-signaling that put him on the qui vive.

"Could I say a word in private to you to-morrow?" observed the cadet to our hero, in a semi-hiccoughy way.

"To-night, if you like it," replied Phil. "I'll give you a lift into New York," for he had stoutly refused the daintily-prepared apartment at Grasshopper Hall.

"N—no, thanks."

The morrow and a dozen morrows in succession, and no cadet, during which Phil saw a good deal of Grasshopper Hall. The marriage was now openly spoken of, and, according to Mrs. Narrowbraid's wishes, to take place as speedily as possible, as she was desirous of going to Florida.

"My dearest Philip, say two days after Christmas—Sunday, the 27th. I'll persuade Tossie to fix that day."

Phil muttered something in which the word "bliss" endeavored to make itself heard. The 27th was named and the trousseau put into active preparation.

It was Christmas Eve, and Phil Cassidy was engaged in listlessly perusing the columns of the Herald, when a servant brought him a card whereon was inscribed in martial letters, "Mr. George Washington Wellington Napoleon Pittsburg."

"Ask him to step in."

It should be mentioned that Phil Cassidy was breakfasting in a private parlor attached to his sleeping apartment.

Mr. G. W. W. N. Pittsburg was accompanied by a closely-veiled lady.

"Mr. Cassidy," says Pittsburg, very red about the ears and husky about the voice, "I have done you a great wrong; I have married—but Tossie says that——"

"Good heavens!" cried Phil.

The lady flung aside her veil.

It is Mrs. George Washington Wellington Napoleon Pittsburg.

They had been married about half an hour.

"Let us go to him," suggested the happy bride. "I'll offer to give him back his presents. He'll refuse, and they're worth five thousand at all events. Besides," she added, with a gasp, "I know he'd never forgotten that odious Miss Tumtint. I never cared for him, George, darling, as you know. It was all pappa and mamma's doing."

Not only did the jubilant Cassidy refuse to take back his pre-nuptial presents, but he clasped a bracelet, purchased the day before at Tiffany's, upon the bride's arm.

"I intended it for your wedding morning, and it has fulfilled its mission."

"You're a real good fellow," sobbed Mrs. G. W. W. N. P., adding, tearfully, as she twisted the bracelet so as to cause the diamonds to sparkle, "I suppose you saw the death of George Rogers?"

"Who's George Rogers?"

"Oh, the gentleman that Miss Tumtint was engaged to. She never cared a fig for him. George Washington, give Mr. Cassidy some brandy."

* * * * * *

It was the Christmas morning of 1878, and as the bells were pealing out merrily from church tower and steeple, Mr. Philip Cassidy, faultlessly attired, was to be seen skipping up the steps of No. — West Thirty-second Street, the residence of Mrs. and Miss Tumtint.

It is not necessary to the purpose of this story to narrate what occurred within those walls, at that or any subsequent visit. Suffice it to say, Miss Tumtint exists no longer, and that Mrs. Philip Cassidy receives every Tuesday evening at No. — Madison Avenue.

CHAS. STEWART PARNELL, M.P.

THE distinguished leader of the Obstructionists in the British House of Commons, in company with John Dillon, landed at New York City on Friday morning, January 2d. He was warmly received by an influential committee and conducted to a hotel, where he will take a brief rest before entering upon a tour of the United States, that bids fair to arouse the patriotism of every son and daughter of Ireland in the New World.

Charles Stewart Parnell—although an Irish agitator, and the hope of a very "young Ireland" party—is, curiously enough, not an Irishman at all, or one only to a limited extent. He is an American by his mother's side, his mother being the daughter of the late Rear Admiral Charles Stewart, of the United States Navy, and now occupying the Bonaparte property at Bordentown, N. J. His father comes of an old English family, originally from one of the midland counties.

He was born at Avondale, County Wicklow, Ireland, in 1846, and was educated at Magdalen College, Cambridge, England. His first appearance in public was under Government auspices as High Sheriff of County Wicklow, which position he held the year before his entrance to Parliament. This latter event took place in 1875, he being elected to the House of Commons to fill the Meath vacancy made by the decease of the late John Martin.

The first evidence of Mr. Parnell's looming importance is as a rebel to the main or Home Rule body of the Irish Parliamentary representatives, whose tameness, whose utter impracticableness and foolishness in frittering away the time and patience of the people with unheeded petitions to Her Most Gracious Majesty's Government for "a Parliament in College Green," disgusted himself and a few others, who resolved to adopt new tactics, with the object of compelling the English Parliament to pay attention to Irish demands.

This ripened into what is known as the Obstruction policy, the main idea of which is to oppose each and every measure of the Government by technicalities, amendments, and dogged opposition, to impede general legislation and worry the English members into either compliance with the wishes of the Irish members, or make it as unprofitable as possible for England to continue the course it has in connection with Ireland.

The position of Mr. Parnell as a landlord has given him the opportunity of knowing the condition of the people and the inhumanity to which they may be subjected, and, coming from one thus situated, the expression, "No man, however good, is fit to occupy the position of the Irish Landlord," contains the more terrible meaning.

His position is thus summed up in his own brief words: "Our people are in Ireland to-day; they are determined to do what they can for themselves. I believe that by standing together and by adopting a determined attitude towards the landlords, you will compel a solution of this great Land Question. And if we can—taking advantage of this extraordinary opportunity—unite all classes in Ireland in this way to aid in this scheme for land reform, I believe we will have done that which no Irishman ever had such an opportunity of doing before, and that we shall take one great step towards obtaining for our country the inestimable blessing of self-government by fixing upon the soil of Ireland those who cultivate that soil."

Mr. Parnell is President of the Irish National Land League, the prime object of which is to educate the people in the great truth that the land belongs to all, and organize and work for the destruction of the system that maintains the land in the grasp of the few.

The various sums of money raised to relieve the present distress are distributed by the Irish National Land League, whose members have familiarized themselves with the necessities of every part of Ireland.

The President, upon "Civil Service Reform" forms the subject of the interview in our present issue.

A NEW YEAR'S LESSON IN POLITICS.

THE new year of 1880 has come to notch the beginning of another decade in the national calendar. It is the year from which the decennial census of the people will be counted, and it is the year in which the people will hold their quadrennial election for the two highest offices in their gift. As in Greece all the currents of the national life set towards the Olympic games, with their stern competitions for the prizes of strength and agility, so in the United States all the currents of our political life set towards the Presidential election, with its animating contest for the ascendency of parties and the principles they represent in the conduct of the Government. As the time approached for the recurrence of each Olympiad a sacred truce was proclaimed throughout all Greece. Athens ceased to envy Sparta, and Sparta ceased to vex Athens. So, as the time approaches for the recurrence of our Presidential election, let us hope that there will be a truce bidden to sectional resentments and to factional rivalries, that the political lists may be cleared for an open and manly contest between the representatives of the political doctrines and measures now competing for the suffrages of the people.

While there is much in the material prosperity of the nation which is well calculated to justify and encourage patriotic exultation, there are also some signs of the times which deserve to excite the gravest solicitude. The rancor of our politics has always been a reproach to the nation. The stern ferocity of party struggles has been likened to the spirit of warfare, from which, indeed, it takes the choicest of its emblems, and the most familiar of its dogmas. An election is known by the name of a "campaign." The rank and file of a party's adherents are held to the discipline of an army. Its leaders are followed as fuglemen, from whose word of order there is to be no dissent. All this was bad enough, but to the tactics of war have now come to be added the strategies, the treasons and the surprises of war. After the battle is ended the victorious party has come to fear the perils of an ambuscade in the shape of a Returning Board or of a Governor and Council, who will not only discount the fruits of victory, but who will put defeat for victory and victory for defeat.

We do not purpose in this connection to inquire who or what party is responsible for the beginnings of such an interpolation on the political methods of the country. If history is a philosophy, teaching by example, it is not set to teach the destructive lesson that "two wrongs make a right." The rule of retaliation even in actual warfare is held to be justifiable only as a preventive measure, not as a measure leading to fresh aggressions. The law of reprisal has absolutely perished from the jurisprudence of all civilized States, and surely the present is no time to introduce the rule of retaliation and the law of reprisal into the politics of the United States.

We are not of those who believe in the decadence of the country. Our political philosophy is at the furthest remove from the doctrines of pessimism. We believe that, on the whole, the march of the republic in morals, as well as in material development, is onwards and upwards, not backwards and downwards. But in the presence of the event which marked the last Presidential election in Oregon, Louisiana and Florida; and in the presence of the events now shaking the State of Maine with portents of civic feud, we are tempted to ask ourselves if there has not been some decline in the political ethics previously applied to the scrutiny of the ballot-box. We remember that there was a time in our history when a majority of one was held to be as sacred and irreversible as a majority of ten thousand. It is just forty years ago that Marcus Morton, the candidate of the Democrats, was elected Governor of Massachusetts by the majority of but a single vote, and in reaching this result the Counting Committee, composed exclusively of Whigs, found that one small town had made a return which was grossly irregular, the rejection of which would accomplish the defeat of the Democrats and retain the Whigs in their old-time supremacy. But the thought of such a step was only suggested to be instantly and indignantly repelled by the Whig leaders of that epoch.

Questions of form in the counting of ballots are not to be despised, but it is a maxim of jurisprudence that "the reason of the law is the law." The reason why forms are prescribed by statute regulation is that they may preserve and not that they may destroy the rights and wishes of the people as expressed through the ballot-box. In a case like this the summum jus is summa injuria. That the contents of the ballot-box should be perverted and changed by being distilled through the alembic of a Returning Board or a Counting Committee is a crime against the very fountain and source of the nation's political life. If our political machinery is weak here, the whole fabric of our policy will speedily fall a prey to disorganization and wreck.

It was but in obedience to the more than Roman virtue and integrity which presided over the birth of the United States as a nation that John Adams, in his inaugural address as President, reminded his countrymen that "if national pride is ever justifiable or excusable, it is when it springs not from power or riches, grandeur or glory, but from convictions of national innocence, information and benevolence." And it was but in simple deference to this high sentiment that he proceeded to hold the following language, as emphatic as it is just:

> "In the midst of these pleasing ideas we should be unfaithful to ourselves if we should ever lose sight of the danger to our liberties if anything partial or extraneous should infect the purity of our free, fair, virtuous and independent elections. If an election is to be determined by the majority of a single vote, and that can be procured by a party, through artifice or corruption, the Government may be the choice of a party for its own ends, not of the nation for the national good * * * Candid men will acknowledge that in such cases choice would have little advantage to boast of over lot or chance."

THE EXODUS INTO INDIANA.

ALTHOUGH several of the States outrank Indiana as to size, yet her territorial limits are proportioned on no illiberal scale. They embrace 33,809 square miles, an area more than equal to four States like Massachusetts or New Jersey, or seven States like Connecticut, and nearly twenty-six times greater than the area of Rhode Island. But when we contrast the density of population in Indiana with that of the other States mentioned, the former suffers by comparison. According to the Federal enumeration made in 1870, the number of persons to a square mile in Massachusetts, at that period, was 186.84; in Connecticut, 113.15; in Rhode Island, 166.43; in New Jersey, 108.91; and in Indiana, 49.71. In 1870 the population of Massachusetts numbered 1,457,351, and that of Indiana amounted to 1,680,637. The same density of inhabitants in Indiana, as in Massachusetts, would have given the former a population of 6,316,873. From 1860 to 1870 the population of the Western State increased a little more than twenty-four per cent. If at the end of the present decade it shall be found that the increase over 1870 equals twenty-five per cent, then the population of Indiana will be about 2,080,796 in 1880. At this figure the number of persons per square mile will be 61.54, a gain of 11.83 in ten years to each square mile. From all this it would appear that the State is not overcrowded and that there is still room for many new-comers.

The facts presented do not tally with the public asseverations of Daniel W. Voorhees, who, in part, represents the State of Indiana in the Senate of the United States. Now that the colored exodus has set its face towards the "Hoosier" State, this gentleman deprecates the movement and declares that Indiana is already overcrowded by population. This, as we have already shown, is the merest nonsense. The population in that State is small in proportion to her territory, and long years must necessarily elapse before the 21,637,760 acres of land embraced in her territorial limits become thoroughly utilized. The State of New York maintains a population of at least five millions on her 47,000 square miles of territory, and can find room for several millions more. The people of Ohio, a State but little larger than Indiana, do not complain of being overcrowded, although their population averaged 66.69 persons to the square mile in 1870.

Senator Voorhees professes to be greatly alarmed at the negro migration from the South. He fears—at least he would have the public so believe—that his State is to be engulfed by a black tidal wave, the resultant effects of which must be terrible suffering on the part of the colored emigrants. Mr. Voorhees finds himself brimming over with sympathy for the colored race, and would save them from destruction. He has carried his interest so far as to induce the Senate to appoint a committee to investigate this subject of inter-State migration and make an official report of the causes. He flatly charges that there is a conspiracy on the part of disreputable persons, both white and black, to disturb the condition of the colored people of the Southern section, to make them discontented and unhappy, to lure them from their now pleasant homes and kind friends, to introduce them to financial ruin and physical suffering, and all for the purpose of accomplishing certain political designs. This conspiracy must be exposed and crushed, hence this committee to investigate the exodus now going on from North Carolina in particular.

The charge that the colored people are being hoodwinked by interested politicians, or that the exodus has been set on foot through political intrigue, would seem to be wholly gratuitous on the part of the Indiana Senator. The colored emigrants know whether or not they have been deceived. They know, too, whether the laws of North Carolina bear hard upon them or not, whether they receive pay for their labor and are treated humanely by their white employers. What can a Congressional Committee do towards enlightening them upon these topics? As to the propriety of their moving into Kansas, Indiana, or other States, where they can find remuneration for labor, and an eventual competence, they will doubtless continue to be the judges. This is their right, and we cannot well see what Mr. Voorhees and his committee are going to do about it.

Why these people are eager to leave North Carolina for homes in the West is no secret, as the investigators, if honest, will find. Touching this matter a contemporary says: "A colored tenant on a 25-acre farm pays an annual rent of five bales of cotton, which, at current prices, is equal to about $225. This is an exorbitant price; but, in order to keep him in due subjection, the black tenant is forbidden by State statutes to use any product of that farm until the rent is paid. If the tenant raises corn, potatoes, or other vegetables, he may not consume them in his family, or exchange them for other commodities, without obtaining the written consent of the owner of the land. Disobedience of this law is a penitentiary offense." If the white owners of land in North Carolina have taken this method to get rid of their colored neighbors, they are in a fair way to accomplish it.

We believe that the future success of the South depends in a great measure upon its retention of the colored element at home; but we know of no law by which the colored people can be made to remain, if treated with injustice. They must be won, if at all, by kind treatment and fair and conscientious dealing. If they aspire to better their condition, the opportunity should be given them, and all laws should be made to bear alike upon all classes of citizens. As to this proposed investigation, we have no faith in its serving any good purpose. The committee will make junketing excursions South and West, the expenses of which will be paid out of the people's treasury.

NEW TERMINAL FACILITIES AT NEW YORK.

WITHIN the last few days a most important step has been taken in the direction of making our harbor what it ought to be, and what Nature apparently intended it should be—the great commercial seaport of the Continent. For a consideration of a little over two hundred thousand dollars, the Hudson River Railroad Company has come into possession of the land west of the railroad track to the river, from Sixty-sixth to Sixty-seventh Street. This is but a small portion of the land which the same company is striving to acquire, and on which it is intended to erect a magnificent freight depot. The project includes the entire section from the track near Eleventh Avenue to the river, with all the water front from Fifty-ninth to Seventy-second Street. The company was already in possession of the land from Fifty-ninth to Sixty-sixth Street. It was decided, however, that an effort be made to secure all the land as far as Seventy-second Street. This latest purchase puts the Hudson River Railroad Company in possession of a continuous line from Fifty-ninth to Sixty-seventh Street; and arrangements are already in progress for completing the purchase of the remaining blocks. If the plan proposed is fully carried out, Mr. Vanderbilt and his friends will be entitled to the thanks of the community. On the ground between Fifty-ninth and Sixth-sixth Streets, there are already large cattle sheds, two huge elevators and numerous tracks for the storage of cars. Similar improvements will be made on the newly-acquired property. Of course the alterations will be conducted under the inspection and supervision of the Dock Commissioners. The docks along the front of this property will be such as to be able to accommodate the largest ships; and such will be the facilities of the new depot that all cartage, lighterage and other expenses incidental to the transfer of freight from rail to ship will be done away with. In sending goods from Europe to any place in the United States there will be but one transfer. It is not intended that the new depot shall in any way interfere with the regular business at St. John's Park or Thirteenth Street. It will, doubtless, relieve both those centres; but it will not supersede them. This is beyond all question the most important movement yet made in the way of securing for New York suitable terminal facilities. New York was at a great disadvantage as compared with Boston, with Philadelphia and with Baltimore, in that the railroad and the ship were not brought into direct and immediate contact. When the new depot shall have been completed that disadvantage will no longer exist. It is becoming that New York should thus assert her superiority; and few will deny that enterprise and public spirit such as manifested in this case by the Hudson River Railroad Company well deserve success.

PROGRESS BACKWARDS.

THE leading transatlantic steamship companies are all building new steamers, to be launched next Spring. The new ships are to be much larger than even the Germanic or the Gallia, and one of them, the Servia, of the Cunard fleet, is to be fully 2,500 tons larger than any passenger steamer now afloat. The steady growth in size of our ocean steamers, which has been in progress since the introduction of steam navigation, is now confessedly limited only by the sole condition that their draught of water shall not exceed the depth of the harbors which they are intended to frequent. The new Cunarder, although it is to be a hundred feet longer than the largest of the present White Star fleet, will draw less water, and, as a vessel of a thousand feet in length can be built with no greater draught than the Servia, it will not be long before vessels even still more huge will become regular visitors to our port.

What we are pleased to call progress in shipbuilding is, after all, only a return to the most ancient of all models, the Ark of that eminent mariner, Noah. With the model of that famous craft we are made familiar in our earliest years. The "Ark" has always been considered by judicious parents an extremely meritorious toy, combining, as it does, amusement with instruction in zoology, theology and marine architecture. Even in the most devout of New England families the children have from time immemorial been permitted to play with the "Ark" on Sunday, on the ground of its peculiarly biblical character. Years ago, when the relative length, breadth and depth of sea-going vessels were held to be fixed by immutable laws, irreverent brothers, and uncles of maturer growth, were accustomed to sneer at the "arks" of the children, and to cast contempt upon Noah as a shipbuilder. It is true that in model the Ark and the clipper-ship were as widely as possible removed one from the other, and we can readily understand why the sailor of the last generation objected to the Ark, and asserted that it was ugly, and more like a meeting-house than a ship; but the modern steamship captain must be growing clearly more and more convinced that Noah was an able shipbuilder, who, had he lived in the days of steam and iron, would probably have rivaled the best builders of the Clyde and the Mersey.

The Ark, as we all know, was a long and narrow vessel, her beam being about one-tenth of her length on deck, a proportion closely followed by modern steamship builders. The bottom was flat, and without a keel, so that she could have been placed on dry land, where she would have stood up without the aid of props of any kind—as, indeed, was the case when she made her famous landing on Mount Ararat. Her depth was slight, so that she drew very little water, as every child knows who has launched an "ark" in the bath-tub. To make up for her want of depth of hold, she was furnished with an immense deck-house, in which Noah, his family, and the first-class animals resided, the second-class and steerage animals having quarters in the hold. It has often been suggested that the animals must have found some difficulty in embarking, since, as will be remembered, access to the interior of the vessel was obtained only through the roof, one side of which moved on hinges, and was lifted up when occasion required. Probably the elephants and rhinoceroses, who are notoriously bad climbers, found fault with the ladders which led from the roof to the cabin, and insisted that Noah ought to have introduced elevators. Very probably, also, the ladies of the Noachian household thought that doors ought to have been cut in the sides of the deck-house. But Noah knew what he was doing. He did not intend to have the first sea which the Ark might ship pour down into the cabin through the side-doors. He undoubtedly saw that those who were not satisfied with his vessel might stay ashore. He was not anxious to fill his ship up with grumbling elephants, when he could supply their places with genial and uncomplaining monkeys, and as for the ladies, they would doubtless be seasick during the entire passage, and hence need not bother themselves about ladders which they would not have the spirit to climb. It must be confessed that, while Noah was right in paying no attention to the remark of the elephants, he would have been wise had he constructed a small hurricane-deck or "bridge" on the ridge of his deck-house, for the purpose of taking observations. It must have been difficult for him to handle his sextant while sitting astride of his ridge-pole, and, in the circumstances, it is really a wonder that he managed to navigate the Ark successfully. A mere glance at any "ark" will show that the deck of the vessel must have been constantly washed by the seas in anything like rough weather, and hence the roof of the deck-house must have been the only place where the "look-out," the helmsman, and the officers could have been safely stationed.

Our largest steamers approximate closely to the model of the Ark. They are keelless and flat-bottomed, and as they increase in size they must decrease in depth of hold, in order to diminish their draught. The practice of building cabins on deck is growing, and in the fifteen or twenty thousand-ton steamers of the future a large and strongly-built deck-house that will withstand any sea will be a leading feature. If access to this deck-house is gained through the roof, the resemblance to the Noachian model will be complete, and the addition of a substantial "bridge" for the officers will supply the only improvement that the Ark lacked.

Of course, such a vessel will not be manageable under sail. As has often been remarked concerning the Ark by nautical skeptics, "She will just sag down dead to loo'ard with that there big haystack of a house amidships." But the use of steam has already rendered sails nearly obsolete, and the steamers of the coming decade will care no more about the direction of the wind than did the gallant captain of the Ark.

Thus, after several thousand years, our boasted progress in shipbuilding has brought us to accept the venerable model of the ancient Mesopotamian mariner. We, indeed, claim a superiority to him in our knowledge of the steam-engine, but is it quite certain that we are right in so doing? If Noah could build what was virtually the hull of a first-class Cunarder, are we not justified in assuming that he supplied her with a good Cunard engine? As he had no sails, it is clear that he must have had some means of keeping steerage-way on the Ark, else she would have fallen off into the trough of the sea and rolled in a way that would have made it very unpleasant for the animals. Indeed, is it supposable that any cautious animal—such, for example, as the elephant or the cat—would have gone to sea in a ship without any motive-power sufficient to keep her off a lee-shore? Antiquarians should investigate this matter, and endeavor to ascertain by what means the Ark kept her head to the wind, and whether we may not profitably model the machinery, as well as the hulls, of our steamers after the pattern furnished by the first and ablest of shipbuilders.

TWO IMPORTANT LAND BILLS.

VERY many important measures presented for the consideration of Congress receive nothing more than a passing notice in the press dispatches sent from Washington. A case in point is that of the two new Bills relating to the public lands, now pending in the House of Representatives. One of these Bills aims to reconcile the Act of March 3d, 1879, with the revised statutes; the other, to restore to the United States certain lands heretofore granted to railroad and telegraph companies. Hon. George L. Converse, of Ohio, is the author of the former, and Mr. Morgan, of Alabama, of the latter.

The Bill of Mr. Converse recites the law enacted in March last, the said law authorizing persons who had entered only eighty acres of land, within railroad limits, to select an additional eighty acres without payment of the usual registration fee of five dollars. This privilege conferred upon homesteaders, as it now appears, conflicts with an unrepealed clause of the revised statutes. The clause referred to requires that where soldiers have selected eighty acres and desire to enter an additional eighty acres, they shall go through all the formalities of registration and also pay the legal fee of five dollars. The Bill introduced by Mr. Converse proposes to abolish unjust discrimination against the soldier by making all persons who enter lands register and pay a fee of five dollars.

The Bill of Mr. Morgan is of another character, and will, doubtless, meet with fierce opposition on the part of affected corporations and their friends in Congress. It aims to recover for the benefit of the Government a large proportion of the lands granted to railway and the telegraph companies upon conditions which the beneficiaries have practically nullified. The Bill declares that the corporations in question have not constructed and maintained their lines of road and telegraph, and that under this state of affairs the land should be declared forfeited to the United States, and be thrown open for public settlement and pre-emption under homestead laws. Should this Bill pass, as in all justice it should, it will affect twenty-two non-compliant railroad corporations, and give back to the people over one hundred millions of acres of land. If the companies have failed to comply with the contracts under which they agreed to accept these lands, their title becomes void, and it only remains for Congress to so declare. Assuming the statements of the Bill to be true, we can see no valid reason why these vast tracts of valuable property should not revert to the Government and be opened to public settlement.

EVENTS ABROAD.

THE heir-apparent to the Russian throne has long been credited with liberal views. He has often been represented as opposed to the general home policy of the empire, whilst his Panslavist tendencies have, on several occasions, shown him distinctly at variance with many of its foreign relations and proceedings. Startling reports recently received from St. Petersburg indicated the possibility of one of those palace revolutions which are so familiar to the students of Russian history. The most recent dispatches, however, dispel all doubts as to the relations between the Czar and the Czarewitch. At a banquet given on the anniversary of the crossing of the Balkans the Emperor entered the banqueting-hall with the Czarevna on his arm, and followed by the Czarewitch, and in a speech made to the troops the Emperor expressed his conviction that they would serve the Czarewitch with equal fidelity as they would himself. The ranks of the Nihilists seem to have suffered as little from prosecution as has their organization, and this strange struggle of unlimited power against them may long continue unless other means come into play. Prince Lobanoff as Ambassador to the Court of St. James has been received with open arms.

The offer of M. Michel, a rich French contractor, to construct quays, warehouses, and bridges along the shores of the Golden Horn has been accepted by the Ottoman Government in preference to that of the representative of a large English firm. It is alleged that the Gaul got inside the Saxon by a judicious administration of "backsheish," the Palace and the Porte being at their wits' ends for money.

The Paris Figaro is doing the State some service. It opened a subscription in aid of the poor of that city, and has realized, in a very few days, the sum of $100,000. Another good work done by the Figaro is the establishment of charcoal stoves at various street corners in the interior of Paris, in order that the passers-by may warm themselves.

The ex-Empress is preparing for her melancholy pilgrimage to Zululand. Her recent journey through France was maddening from the recollections it recalled. Her present one is even more heart-breaking. The afflicted lady is to be accompanied by General Evelyn Wood, a Victoria Cross man and the officer who, when he met the valorous Carey on his return from the donga, hotly exclaimed, "By G——, sir, you ought to be shot!"

Sir Garnet Wolseley, the supreme military and civil commander in Natal and the Transvaal, at a public dinner in Pretoria, said that henceforward the Transvaal would be regarded as a Crown colony. A meeting of Boers took place on December 10th, which dispersed quietly after adopting a resolution to maintain the demand for the independence of the Transvaal and to elect a Volksraad. Paul Kruger was chosen to the leadership, and was instructed to summon a Volksraad.

The indefatigable De Lesseps has reached his happy hunting-ground, and Panama fairly bristles with engineering talent, including M. Dircks, the distinguished Dutch engineer, who constructed the maritime canal at Amsterdam, and of whom De Lesseps made so much at the Congress at Paris. On New Year's Day, M. de Lesseps inaugurated in person the work of definite survey for a sea-level canal. The ceremonies took place at the mouth of the Rio Grande, which is about a mile from Panama. M. de Lesseps is, as usual, in what Lord Lytton termed his "brutal health," and in the most champagney of spirits. He returns via New York. Panama is virtually "canaled" at last, at least so says this most sprightly of practical engineers.

That "Afghan friendship is more dangerous than Zulu enmity" is being hourly proved to the British in Cabul, and that the Afghans are to be treated henceforth as foes is evinced from the fact that, before Spring, Afghanistan will be occupied by twice the force which endeavors to hold it at present. There are 10,000 men now on their way through the Afghan defiles, sent there to relieve Sir Frederick Roberts. Of these 2,500 are British and 8,000 natives. The British are now preparing to stay, and for this purpose the railway arrangements are being hurried forward. The Sukkur Quettah line has already been opened for commissariat stores and troops. It is even proposed to establish money-order offices at Quettah, Candahar and Cabul.

The first move in the direction of Irish relief works has been made by the Marquis of Hamilton, the eldest son of the Duke of Abercorn, formerly Lord Lieutenant, and $165,000 have been asked for from the Government for the construction of a railway in Donegal. The Chief Secretary for Ireland stated that he would lay the matter before the Treasury, and it now remains to be seen what "my Lords" will do. The land meetings still continue all over the country, and the Catholic bishops are solemnly warning the Government of the rapid approach of famine. The Duchess of Marlborough has already raised $45,000 by subscription, but Mr. Parnell asserts that this money is "political." The Bank of England has voted $1,500 towards the Irish Famine Relief Fund. Will Queen Victoria be as generous as the old lady in Threadneedle Street. During the famine of 1847-'48 Her Most Gracious Majesty did not subscribe one shilling out of her overweighted privy purse, although every sovereign in Europe contributed from theirs, even the Ottoman Porte.

The Spanish Government, if there is a government, is sitting upon the Press. No less than seventeen opposition journals in Madrid and eleven in the provinces are awaiting sentence. Changes in the Ministry occur daily, and the bridegroom King is driven to distraction between love for his Queen and disgust at his Cabinet. The Archduchess Elizabeth is at Madrid. She is Queen Christina's mamma.

At a reception to the diplomatic representatives on New Year's Day, Prince Hohenlohe informed M. de Freycinet that he was charged by Prince Bismarck to express his regret at the resignation of the Count de St. Vallier, and his wish to continue the present cordial relations between France and Germany.

IT is estimated that 15,000 persons settled in Kansas during the negro exodus last Summer, of whom one-fifth were able to buy a little land, and all self-supporting as farmers. Most of the remainder have found, through the Freedman's Relief Association, places as laborers, and are giving good satisfaction.

THE usual fight for the Speakership of the New York Assembly opened promptly on New Year's Day, on the field at Albany. Ex-Speakers Husted and Alvord and General Sharpe are making the best scores, while any number of gentlemen from the interior are entered to make the contest lively, if for no other purpose.

THE final proceedings of the Board of Aldermen of New York for 1879 were distinguished by the passage over the Mayor's veto of the resolution authorizing the construction of the Chambers Street cross-town railroad. This measure has created much indignation in business circles since it was first proposed. First, because there is no present necessity for a railroad in the street mentioned; second, because there is no room in the narrow thoroughfare for one; and third, because the two passages of the resolution were an indication that the aldermen were disposed to grant without proper considerations franchises that should yield a goodly revenue to the city. Taken in connection with the adoption of the Prall and Spinola steam-heating resolutions, which, if permitted to be enforced, will place the metropolis in the power of a marvelously strong monopoly, the action of the Board in its closing sessions was, at least, very bold. The stand taken is more suggestive when viewed beside the voluntary offer of Mr. Haskin to pay to the city $1,000,000 cash, upon the adoption of a resolution authorizing a surface railroad in Broadway—an offer, by-the-way, of which but little has been said officially.

IN reply to the address of welcome, Mr. Parnell informed the Reception Committee that the object of his visit to the United States was to give our people a proper idea of the present condition of the farm-tenants in Ireland. In doing so he will correct many erroneous impressions. He says the existing famine is not one of food, but of money. Food is abundant, but there is a fearful scarcity of money with which to purchase it. Although he will gratefully receive all the money that warm hearts may contribute to relieve the distress, Mr. Parnell holds that the main relief must come from the British Government in the form of the prosecution of works of public improvement, on which the people may be employed at fair compensation. To provide a fund of money large enough to accomplish the present purpose, i. e., to enable the farm-tenants to gradually acquire by purchase the land they now work on rent, would tax the resources of liberal people beyond all limit of reason; hence, while the offerings of persons in sympathy with the movement will do much towards satisfying the most pressing necessities, the practical relief must result from action that the Government may be induced to take, first, to repeal the oppressive land laws, and then, to provide means to enable the people to acquire possession of the soil they now cultivate for others.

THE Mohammedans are abandoning Cabul, fearing that some retribution will be visited upon them, as they all sympathize with the enemy. The Hindoos who remain in Cabul report that a reign of terror existed from December 15th until the city was abandoned by the rebels. Every house and shop was gutted, except those belonging to the Mohammedans.

IT is believed in London that the attention of the English Government has lately been directed to the projects of disarmament put forward by Prince Bismarck; that, despite the recent qualifying statements, Prince Bismarck has projected a scheme for gradual disarmament, but Austria is the only continental power which has given absolute adhesion to the scheme.

A LITTLE SAINT.

YOU may have seen it: A low, rambling stone house, overrun in places with clinging masses of woodbine that have brought the small windows into a nearer resemblance to the dull, deep-set eyes of the aged, and converted the niche over the door holding the white-stone image of the Virgin into a small bower into which the purple, yellow-eyed blossoms and scarlet berries nod at every dash of the irreverent breeze.

It is a Catholic institution of some sort, where the very good are permitted to do their holiness of prayer in what is known as a "Retreat," I believe, and also to which some of those, for whose refractory souls solitude and penance are supposed to be of vital benefit, retire for a season; and Daisy Butterfield and I stumbled upon the place during a Summer ramble.

Of course his real name is not Daisy. On the contrary, it is something very much more dignified and respectable; but he is such a fresh, innocent child—such a blooming and harmless flower of the field—that no other name seemed in the least to fit him, therefore the soubriquet.

The old stone house, in spite of its picturesque air and pious character, we might have passed if there had been nothing to attract our continued attention save the stone image above the door, but there was an attraction more "fixing," at least for Daisy, and the first intimation I had of this fact was a convulsive jerk upon my coat-tails and a command to "Look!" in a voice that I recognized as that of my companion, in spite of its agitation.

I meekly obeyed orders. I wheeled about. I looked. I have been thankful ever since that I did so.

The door of the old house had been opened, and upon its threshold stood a young girl clad in the quaint, disfiguring black robes of some one of the Sisterhoods, and under the dragon of a muslin head-rigging there appeared a face fairer than any Madonna pictured by the old masters, because it was instinct with all modest intelligence, gaining thus in all saint-like qualities what it lost in insipidity.

Only for a moment did this fair vision beam upon us, disappearing then again within the gloomy old house; but in that moment the fate of Daisy was settled.

In vain did I ravish argument and ingenuity to get him out of the neighborhood. Night found us domiciled in a small wayside tavern in the immediate vicinity, and there I was condemned to listen, with only the small compensation of a bowl of spiced clover-leaf rum, to whole volumes of French philosophy upon the subject of wife-taking, which would have brought tears of affliction to my friendly eyes only that I knew Daisy to be subject to attacks of this kind, and that the great conservator of the little fellow's liberty had thus far been some trifling omission of steadfastness in his composition, and the fact that his passion never kept even in the running with his impressionability.

A series of skirmishes upon the following day developed a history for the "Little Saint" that should have taken some of the ardor out of the pursuit upon which Daisy was bent, but—it did not.

She was called Anna. Such other name as the accident of birth might have accorded her had been lost in the generally obliterating "Sister" of the Order under which she lived. Her mother had done humble service to the Sisterhood as laundress up to the time of her death, and when the child she left arrived at a suitable age, the good women, who had charged themselves with her up-bringing, consecrated her, not to the service of Heaven, but to the clear-starching of the establishment. Of a father there was no record.

At this abrupt termination of our researches, it was natural that Daisy should have fallen upon my sympathetic breast and there poured out his disappointment in briny, bitter tears. It was the thing that I expected, but human nature—especially Daisy—is never what a man expects it to be, and, to my utter confusion, the little chap at once addressed himself to supplying such trifling omissions in the way of name, romance and career in the previous history of this medieval laundress by the substitution of his own proper cognomen in the first instance, his courtship in the second, and a most marvelous future as part and parcel of his joys and impedimenta in conclusion.

Poor infant! He had always had a weakness this way, but the last is always the most "fetching."

I looked upon him in compassion, and suggested a B.-and-S., to be followed by a six weeks' tour with a circus company; but, smiling placidly down upon me from the heights of his high resolve, he calmly "sat upon" my remedial institutions, yet opened his mind to me with a reassuring candor intended to soothe the disturbed current of my friendly solicitude.

"Teddy, old man," said he, "this is what I have been searching for since the obligations of manhood to the next generation first dawned upon my youthful soul. A man must marry, and, if he be a man of inches and quality, he should not abridge his usefulness to the country and age in which he lives by deferring this important duty. He owes it to himself, to his ancestors, to the unmarried ladies of his acquaintance, to settle in life as early as is at all consistent with the grave considerations of making a suitable choice. As you may have observed, this question of choice is one to which I have devoted myself with unparalleled assiduity, and—in spite of many discouragements in the way of finding the majority of the fair sex 'unattainable,' for reasons that the sex and those who know my exacting heart will appreciate—one in which I have persisted until yesterday P. M., when the ideal creature whose image has hitherto inspired my search resolved herself into the living, attainable woman, and stood before me.

"Love is the slave of no time or condition. I saw Anna, and immediately I adored her. In her I recognize all of those elements of perfectibility which are essential in my wife. In the sacred retirement of these cloistered walls she has grown up, unspotted by all of those vanities and emulations which assail women from the cradle to the altar. She is now the virgin soul—the breathing impulse to which it shall be my proud task to give form, shape and direction. Intelligence and innocence shine in every lineament of her saint-like face. She is in everything a child, a beautiful child, Teddy, and when her childhood ends she will be my wife."

I am not easily "spilled," but this speech of Daisy's was a "facer." The length of the address was not so serious, because he was given to expressing himself at greater length than point, nor that he seemed in dead earnest gave me no great trouble, because the little chap had a way of adding to his inches by being impressive upon the slightest occasion; but, the thing that crushed me was a series of observations I had made on the second occasion of our meeting with the little saint which had occurred in the parlor of the old stone cloister into which Daisy had dragged me, and where he had behaved with as much solemnity as the remarks above recorded would indicate.

My observations were first, in corroboration of my first impressions, in regard to the exquisite loveliness of the girl both in face and figure. I then concluded that she was honest and all simple sweetness in character and disposition, that she had both sense and intelligence, neither of which had traveled beyond the homely limits of her daily life, and, most fatal of all her dangerous presentiments, I saw that she also was deadly earnest in her nature, not knowing a joke from a practical lie, and utterly without that other more graceful quality which protected my Daisy from serious damage by enabling him to adapt his feelings to circumstances, however mutable Fate might show herself.

I foresaw danger, and, therefore, in some trepidation, I ventured to insinuate:

"She is well gone in her childhood now, Daisy."

"The childhood which I intend shall only merge into wifehood, Teddy, has nothing to do with years or stature!" answered he, with a magnificent air of condescending enlightenment.

"But," I modestly hinted, "would it not be well to take a little time to furnish your 'child' with a beginning before you make an end of her, just by way of satisfying inquisitive friends, you know? Anna is a pretty name—but, I say, there is the church register to be considered. I think it takes two to do the business handsomely there!"

"My dear Teddy," answered this precious infant, "you talk as if the inquisitiveness of friends were to have weight in a matter of this kind. If the forms of the marriage contract require two names, the most convenient one may be borrowed for the moment. No man would object to lending his name for such a short time. It is not at all in the way of an indorsement, you know. Beyond this, I am proud that my wife should have no name except that which she receives from me. That she has no relatives insures me against one of the terrors of the married state, and that she will have no history save that which I shall write upon the book of her experiences, is something that a man may be devoutly thankful for, Teddy, in these corrupt times. I tell you, old man, there is a providence in these things. I shall take my wife as a direct dispensation from Heaven, and only as my wife shall she learn the meaning of earthly love."

I was troubled. A tide had set in the affairs of my artless Daisy which, too evidently, I could not stem. With the aid of several bowls of the clover-leaf rum I got him safely into bed, and then betook myself to my own rest, from which I awoke next morning unrefreshed, having dreamed that the lovely Anna was avenging herself upon my unhappy head by flattening it in with a hot smoothing-iron, having previously disposed of Daisy by running him through the mangle.

Upon arising I found that my friend had disappeared. I resigned myself, and having diverted my mind as successfully as might be with a newspaper some months past date until about noon, being then about to present myself at that unholy twelve o'clock meal, known in the rural districts as dinner, the cause of all my inquietude walked in.

His air was unusually serious.

"All is arranged," he said, looking as majestic as his five-feet-four and innocent countenance would permit.

"Has she—has she—ceased to be a child?" I gasped, overcome with the fears that assailed me. With every feeling, from the kindly reproachful to melancholically astonished, expressed in his countenance, he looked at me for a moment, and then said:

"Teddy, I thought you knew me better."

I prayed for patience and a better understanding, with the handles of a pair of wheezy bellows in my nervous clutch.

After a moment's reflection this philosopher and friend continued:

"You have not encouraged my confidence by any sympathy in this matter, Teddy. Nevertheless, the sentiments of friendship which I have professed shall not be chilled nor turned aside by the little differences of opinion that must from time to time occur between men. You know what my character has ever been, Teddy, and to show you that my intentions are as honorable as becomes a man under these circumstances, I now tell you that I have provided for the continuance of Anna under the care of the good Sisters for the next three years. They will instruct her in all things necessary and proper to her future condition upon a plan that I have been occupied this morning in arranging, and to the end that my bride-elect may preserve her virgin purity of heart and mind, I shall neither visit nor correspond with her during this time. In three years I shall attain my majority, when I shall return here to take my wife, unspotted and uncontaminated from the world, to my arms. Until then behold in me a model of human excellence, under the glorifying influence of a great anticipation. Teddy, you should see the error of your ways, and marry before you do your courting!"

I threw down the bellows and embraced this moral example. To the eyes of my experience there was no further occasion for alarm, and with the exception of announcing himself engaged to every one we met, and swearing me by hair-lifting oaths to observe the sanctity of the old stone cloister, Daisy behaved like a corset-lamb during the remainder of our journey.

* * * * * *

I must confess that I was a little "phized" as the years went by, to see, that Daisy kept up the romance of his engagement, but as he amused himself pretty much after the old fashion, and seemed in no immediate danger of canonization, I concluded that he used the thing as an article crossed between a counter-irritant and a safety-rope in cases where either of these agents might be useful, I ceased to think of the affair as anything more than pour passer le temps.

The three years were nearly done when I chanced into a studio with one or two men, among whom was Daisy. Figures were the artist's "forte," and there were two or three about which a good deal had been said. While absorbed in the contemplation of a cabinet portrait in imitation of the style of Sully, and not half a bad thing in its way, I heard a prolonged and pathetic whistle issue from the lips of Daisy.

Instantly I felt that there was trouble brewing for the infant, and made my way to where he stood, his hat jammed hard on the back of his head, both hands crammed into the lowermost section of his pockets, his feet widely separated and acting as blocks to his braced legs.

Helpless dismay rested upon every feature of his ingenuous countenance, and with all my sympathies called into quick array, I looked from Daisy to the picture before which he had struck this tragic pose.

It was just a panel, representing a deep stone doorway, above which there was a little niche, holding a small stone image of the Virgin. In this doorway there was the figure of a girl, with a face more beautiful than Correggio's "Madonna," but with something of the "Venus Victrix," done in color in it.

"The Little Saint, by Jove!" said I.

"My Anna!" murmured Daisy.

Then we looked for a moment into each other's eyes, and for the first time I understood what it is to be a boy, and to have worshiped long and with a secret kindling of purest passion at the shrine of an ideal woman who may one day be clasped in the flesh.

The same thought had touched us both, and I managed to carry the other men off, leaving Daisy to hunt out the story of the strange, new expression we had both detected upon the painted face of the "Little Saint."

It was quite dark when Daisy came to my rooms, and I was sitting in the gloaming as was sometimes my fancy. I arose to light the candles, but with a motion of his hand to prevent it, Daisy sat down quietly and said:

"It is all right, Teddy; she is married to that artist fellow. It was a case of love at first sight—mutual, you know—and as the old Sisters made a row about it, they ran away."

Nothing more was said for a long time. I somehow found myself holding the lad's hand in a strong clasp, but at last he turned his face so that the firelight shone for a moment upon it, and I saw a tear where I never saw one before.

"I hope she is happy, Teddy!" he finally said, and I, thinking Daisy Butterfield's the softest, truest and honestest heart in all the world, only answered:

"God bless you, Daisy—I hope so."

LIEUTENANT TOTTEN'S GAME OF WAR.

AT a general meeting of the United States Military Service Institution, at General Hancock's headquarters on Governor's Island, on Monday, December 29th, First Lieutenant C. A. L. Totten, of the Fourth United States Artillery, exhibited and explained his system of teaching young soldiers their profession and of studying great battles. General Hancock presided, and among the other Army officers present were Generals Rodenbough, Crittenden, Daly, McKeever, Brown, Abbott, Cullum, Fry, Griffen and Doubleday; Colonels Nugent, Perry, Langdon, Clark, Middleton, Potts and Pratt; Majors Sawyer, Dickenson, Bird, Bubbell, Andrews and Hoskins; Captains Wharton, Ward, Sanno and Snyder; Doctors Janeway and Hager, and the Hon. G. H. Yeamans. One of the large assembly-rooms of the building had been specially prepared for the purpose of illustrating the paper, and all of the maps, charts and pieces used primarily in the game were spread upon a table extending the entire length of the room on one side, while in the intervening space was a table showing the ground to be used in the "advanced" game. The surface of this table was undulating, containing mountains, rivers, hills, forests, glades, underbrush, swamps and other imitative features of a suppositive battle-field. Another table, 48 inches long and 40 inches wide, illustrated the "battle" game, the opposing armies, respectively consisting of red and blue oblong blocks, representing equal forces of 50,000 men. A raised platform, extending around three sides of the room, afforded accommodations for spectators, among whom there were many ladies.

"Strategos," like every other war game, is played chiefly with pieces representing bodies of troops. Most of these pieces are of type-metal, and, on maps with a scale of 10 inches to the mile, accurately represent space covered by half-battalions, squadrons, batteries, skirmish lines, engineer companies, baggage trains and field works. Practically, they may be used on maps with scales of from 8 to 12 inches to the mile, or by considering them to represent twice their strength on maps with scales of from 4 to 6 inches. Besides the metal pieces there are a number of pieces made of pasteboard with slates on one side. These are intended to represent small bodies of troops or single officers, sentries or messengers, and what they represent is written on the slate. The reverse side of each of some larger slated pieces has some topographical feature drawn upon it—a village, a marsh or a wood—and any desired combination of topographical features may be represented by them. No maps are used in "Strategos," Lieutenant Totten saying that he preferred each officer and student to make his own map on a large scale, either from field notes or with a pantograph from a small map of the country. With all this apparatus spread out before him, Lieutenant Totten explained his new application of an old device. The German game, he said, was one calculated only for educated soldiers of rank who were interested only in extended movements of large forces. "Strategos," on the other hand, is both an advanced game and an elementary one.

"Strategos" is far more comprehensive than the German game, "Kriegsspeil" or its English version, "Aldershot," both of which have now become so famous among foreign soldiers. Unlike these games, which have little in common with the ordinary soldier, the subaltern and the private military student, and were designed for the almost exclusive use of the best informed and most admired members of the military profession, the American game of war possesses an absorbing interest for those of every grade in the profession of arms. In its most advanced application, "Strategos" embodies all the more valuable features of those foreign games, introducing, at the same time, very many noticeable improvements. All the officers present seemed to take a deep interest in Lieutenant Totten's new game. He has been ordered to West Point to explain his system in class-room instruction, for the purpose of having it added to the regular course of study. He has the approval of General McDowell and other officers of the Department of the Pacific; and a committee of the officers of the National Guard of the State of California, consisting of Lieutenant-Colonel Wilder, Major Kinne and Major Orton, made a report recommending the system for the use of national guardsmen.

Interview with President Hayes.

The Public Not Eager for Civil Service Reform in the Absence of Scandal.

FINANCIAL OPERATIONS OF THE TREASURY CARRIED ON ALMOST WITHOUT LOSS.

The Department of the Interior Quite Satisfactory, in the Main.

LEGISLATION TO FREE CONGRESSMEN OF THE RESPONSIBILITY OF THE DISTRIBUTION OF PATRONAGE, ABSOLUTELY NECESSARY.

RESULTS OF THE COMPETITIVE SYSTEM.

"I CONSIDER the editorial on Civil Service Reform, in FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER of this week, the very best I have read. It thoroughly and admirably embodies all the views I have expressed on the subject," said the President, after he had graciously wished me a happy new year.

I was received in the apartment in which the President meets his Cabinet—a room lighted by two large windows of an old fashion, affording distant glimpses of the silvern Potomac. The carpet is Brussels, the black ground being sprinkled with scarlet and white flowers. The furniture is in walnut, upholstered in grayish-blue raw silk, and is singularly plain and unpretentious-looking. Over the mantel and English fireplace is a very fine mirror, on the mantel a clock with three dials. A portrait of George Washington in uniform adorns one wall, while rolling maps almost conceal the others. Two bureau-desks, with pigeon-holes crammed to bursting, silently tell their own tales, while at a standing-desk, full in the light of one window, the President gets through a deal of the heavy and arduous duties appertaining to his high and mighty office. His private secretary's bureau is approached by three steps, a bust of Washington surmounting the doorway. The table at which I found the President seated is used at Cabinet meetings, the Secretary of State taking the bottom seat facing the President. This table literally groans with baskets of carefully enveloped and docketed papers, telegrams, letters, cards and books of reference. A superb bouquet seemed like an oasis in this desert of official table-land. The President was attired in the severest republican simplicity—black frock-coat, vest and pants, and black tie. He wore no ornament whatsoever save and except a plain gold wedding-ring.

"There will scarcely be a great demand for Civil Service Reform," said Mr. Hayes, "unless it is felt that in the existing system there are palpable abuses. As long as the Civil Service appears to be reasonably efficient and free from corruption, free from scandal, the popular demand for a reform will be comparatively feeble. A bad condition of the Civil Service would attract public attention to the necessity for its reform."

Digitized by Google

"How stands the Treasury Department in relation to reform, Mr. President?"

"The financial operations of the Treasury Department have been very large and very important, and have been conducted almost without loss to the Government."

"The Interior Department?"

"The operations of the Interior Department have in the main been quite satisfactory, as have also the operations of other departments. Under such circumstances," continued the President, "the popular public opinion does not seem to be as much attracted to the necessity for reform as it would if the conduct of the Government in the several departments was less satisfactory. And yet, I suspect that if the general conduct of our Civil Service was as unsatisfactory as it has been at some periods in our history, it would be found that there would be a very strong and decided sentiment amongst the people in favor of what is called Civil Service Reform."

"Do you expect to be practically aided by Congress in your endeavor to reform the Civil Service, Mr. President?"

"I have no doubt that Congress will have an important part in the accomplishment of the reform."

"What direction would legislation take?"

"Legislation should take the direction of entirely relieving Congressmen of the responsibility of what is commonly called the distribution of patronage."

"Do you regard this step as of vital importance?"

"I have always regarded it as an essential step, if not the first step, to be taken in our progress towards a complete reform."

"Would you kindly favor me with your views upon the whole question, Mr. President?"

"My views on this subject have been so fully given in my Message to Congress and in my directions to the public officers, that it is scarcely necessary to enlarge upon them now. I ask the attention of the public to the paramount necessity of reform in our civil service—a reform not merely as to certain abuses and practices of so-called official patronage which have come to have the sanction of usage in the several departments of our Government, but a change in the system of appointments itself, a reform that shall be thorough, radical and complete; a return to the principles and practices of the founders of the Government. A large and responsible part of the duty of restoring the Civil Service to the desired purity and efficiency rests upon the President, and it has been my purpose to do what is within my power to advance such prudent and gradual measures of reform as will most surely and rapidly bring about that radical change of system essential to make our administrative methods satisfactory to a free and intelligent people. By a proper exercise of authority, it is in the power of the Executive to do much to promote such a reform. But it cannot be too clearly understood that nothing adequate can be accomplished without co-operation on the part of Congress, and considerate and intelligent support among the people. Reforms which challenge the generally accepted theories of parties, and demand changes in the methods of departments, are not the work of a day. Their permanent foundations must be laid in sound principles, and in an experience which demonstrates their wisdom and exposes the errors of their adversaries. Every worthy officer desires to make his official action a gain and an honor to his country, but the people themselves, far more than their officers in public station, are interested in a pure, economical and vigorous administration."

Referring to the competitive system the President said:

"In view of the facts that during a considerable period the Government of Great Britain has been dealing with administrative problems and abuses, in various particulars analogous to those presented in this country, and that, in recent years, the measures adopted were understood to have been effective and in every respect highly satisfactory, I thought it desirable to have fuller information upon the subject, and accordingly requested the Chairman of the Civil Service Commission to make a thorough investigation for this purpose. The result has been an elaborate and comprehensive report. The report sets forth the history of the partisan spoils system of Great Britain, and of the rise and fall of the Parliamentary patronage, and of official interference with the freedom of elections. It shows that, after long trials of various kinds of examinations, those which are competitive and open on equal terms to all, and which are carried on under the superintendence of a single commission, have with great advantage been established as conditions of admission to almost every official place in the subordinate administration of that country and of British India. While the reform measures of another Government are of no authority for us, they are entitled to influence to the extent to which their intrinsic wisdom and their adaptation to our institutions and social life may commend to our consideration."

What has been the result of the competitive system?

"I recommended in my annual Message of December, 1877, the making of an appropriation for the resumption of the work of the Civil Service Commission. In the meantime, however, competitive examinations, under many embarrassments, have been conducted, within limited spheres, in the executive departments in Washington, and in a number of the custom-houses and post-offices of the principal cities of the country, with a view to further test their effects, and in every instance they have been found to be as salutary as they are stated to have been under the administration of my predecessor. I think the economy, purity and efficiency of the public service would be greatly promoted by their systematic introduction, wherever practicable, throughout the entire Civil Service of the Government, together with ample provision for their general supervision in order to secure consistency and uniform justice. Reports from the Secretary of the Interior, from the Postmaster-General, from the Postmaster in the City of New York, where such examinations have been some time on trial, and also from the Collector of the Port, the Naval Officer and the Surveyor in that city, and from the postmasters and collectors in several of the other large cities, show that the competitive system, where applied, has in various ways contributed to improve the public service. The reports show that the results have been salutary in a marked degree, and that the general application of similar rules cannot fail to be of decided benefit to the service. The reports of the Government officers in the city of New York, especially, bear decided testimony to the utility of open competitive examinations in their respective offices."

In conclusion the President said:

"I am convinced that if a just and definite test of merit is enforced for admission to the public service and in making promotions, such abuses as removal without good cause and partisan and official interference with the proper exercise of the appointing power will, in large measure, disappear."

Here the Attorney-General entered, and I withdrew.

Lecture by Mr. G. A. Sala.

I WENT to hear George Augustus Sala lecture at the Chickering Hall on "The Shows I have Seen," and I spent eighty minutes delightfully. Mr. Sala talks as few men can talk, and takes you into his confidence with such a charming "Between you and I," that you forget your surroundings and imagine yourself in a cozy library alone with your entertaining host. Sala looks "very fit," indeed—the last time I met him was at a little dinner in the Dutch-built house in Wimpole Street, London W.,—of a "big author," and then he was very far from being well. The lecturer opened his discourse with a touch of humor. "I know the exquisite delicacy of the American ear, and I fear that I shall drop my h's. In fact, in order to provide against such a contingency, I spent the entire morning in rehearsing the second line of that touching ballad 'Kathleen Mavourneen,' and found myself pronouncing it thus:

'The 'oarse of the 'unter was 'eard on the 'ill.'"

Mr. Sala, then a youth in petticoats, saw Queen Victoria proceeding to her coronation. This was his first show. The late Napoleon III. gave him many shows—from his special constableship during the Chartist Riots to his attempt at Boulogne, from the gorgeous Tuileries to the little chapel at Chiselhurst. The Duke of Wellington did George Sala good service, too, and the lecturer's vivid word-portraiture of the hero of Waterloo was in his best vein. "I was living at Slough, near Windsor, in a house five hundred years old, with three descriptions of rats and a real ghost. My deep-niched window looked across Datchet Meade to the frowning keep of Windsor Castle. One morning I looked forth to see the royal standard floating half mast high. I knew that Prince Albert was dead." The description that followed of the funeral was admirably rendered, fairly riveting the attention of the audience. After the funeral came the weddings, and Mr. Sala wound up with that of the Duke of Connaught. The silence that reigned during the delivery of the lecture was eloquent. It told the lecturer that every word was anxiously waited for.

The French Champagne Crop.

IN Champagne, at the other end of France, a disaster has occurred unparalleled for sixty years. Not a bottle of wine has been harvested; the loss is terrible for the small growers, and mounts up to a great sum for the whole department. The grape did not ripen, and it has been gathered only in order to prevent trespassers from entering the vineyards and damaging them. There is now a stock of 72,000,000 bottles in Champagne, of which 35,000,000 or 40,000,000 are in the hands of the great firms. The remainder is of doubtful origin, and even beyond the producing area of Champagne; but this year wines which had long been a drug in the hands of speculators will be bought up, for everybody dreads the consequences of a blank year. The exportation of real champagne is over 18,000,000 or 20,000,000 bottles a year, so that the existing stock will have to serve for 1880 and 1881, and will just suffice. Should next year's vintage fail, the houses which sell genuine champagne would be reduced, to use the expression of one of them, to shutting up shop. The price, however, has not yet risen. The first-class houses, taking into consideration the general interest of the department, are standing out against a rise in price in order not to narrow the circle of consumers. Werlé has 3,000,000 or 4,000,000 bottles, Roderer as many, Pommery & Greno rather less, as also Yrol, but Moet is said to have 5,000,000 or 6,000,000; and all these firms can meet orders for 1880 and 1881, and will wait for next year's vintage before raising their prices, so as to be guided by it.

The Swedes at their Meals.

THE Swedes have a queer way of locomotion at their meals. They often flit about, like flies, from one table to another, and sometimes seem to turn the mess topsy-turvey when they order a repast. It is no rare thing to see them begin with cheese and biscuit; next proceed to ham and salad, with a slice of meat to follow; and then suddenly start up in the middle of their dinner to swallow, while they walk about, a plateful of pea-soup. A habit which they have of beginning each repast with what they call a "smörgos," not merely leads to much untidiness at mealtime, but makes them seem contented to live on bits and scraps. The smörgos consists of little dishes, such as slices of smoked reindeer and caviare and sardines, with pickles, cheese and other wheta provocatives of thirst. These are fished out with a fork of general utility, and laid on thumb-pieces of rye-cake, thickly smeared with butter, which serve by way of plate. Then they are bitten into, regardless of the fragments which may fall on other dainties (for your true smörgos-eater seldom sits to his repast), and they are finally washed down with a glass or two of spirits which stand handy by their side. Such a prelude to a meal is not merely unclenly, but must vitiate the palate and injure the digestion. Indeed, I feel convinced that were the smörgosbord abolished, not merely would the cookery in Sweden soon improve, but very many of the people would be gradually weaned from their weakness for strong drink.

PICTORIAL SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN ILLUSTRATED PRESS.

The Royal Wedding in Spain.

It is a sad commentary on the state of social and political affairs in Spain that within a month of the wedding of King Alfonso and the Austrian Archduchess, another attempt should have been made to assassinate the youthful sovereign. The interest in our illustrations of several features of the nuptial ceremonies will be intensified by the report of Gonzales's crime. The King and Queen were out driving, the former at the reins, when the would-be regicide discharged two pistol-shots at Alfonso, neither of which took effect. The King acted with great calmness, but the poor young Queen of a month was grievously shocked.

Effects of Snow in Paris.

The late snowstorm in Paris, together with the intense cold weather, created much inconvenience in the streets and led to a pretty severe interruption of business. In many of the thoroughfares the snow thrown from the sidewalks into the roadway caused frequent blockades of vehicles, and in no part of the city was the travel more difficult than in the vicinity of the new quarters of the Senate and Chamber of Deputies.

Bridge on the Pontcba-Udine Railroad.

Pontcba and Pontafel, two places in the Alps, have come into notice by the completion of an international road, or pair of roads, the Austrian from Tarvis to Pontcba, and the Italian from Pontcba to Udine. The Austrian part is complete and has cost 2,000,000 florins; but that on the Italian presented greater difficulties. The bridge at Ponte di Muro, shown in our illustration, gives some idea of the character of the country and the difficulties to be surmounted. Udine, lying between Venice and Trieste, and connected with them by rail, as it is now to be with Carnia, is a charming little city of 20,000 inhabitants, and has so many features of the city of the Doges that it is a very Venice in miniature.

Wedding Festivities in Gmünkammergret.

Weddings here are still general rejoicings; a large room in the inn is decorated for the occasion; a table is set, where the married couple receive their friends. This is called the Mahlleut. And in the tanzsaal, or dancing saloon, all join in the Mahlzeit in honor of the occasion. In our picture a curious ceremony is depicted. A friend of the bridegroom is repeating the old saw: "When a man marries he must have a hen-coop." The bride shows how she understands this. She has a neat little coop divided into two unequal rooms. The hen has the large and more comfortable, while the cock, rather dispirited and cowed, is confined to the smaller. These are among the homely presents at these rustic weddings and contribute not a little to the pleasantry and enjoyment, while as the wedding gifts are not for show, but for real service, the new-married pair find themselves better off than if they had received thirty silver napkin-rings and two dozen mustard-spoons.

Royal Honors to British Soldiers.

On December 8th, Queen Victoria personally decorated with the insignia of her Order of the Bath six newly appointed Knights Commanders and twenty-four Companions, most of whom have earned these honors by their conduct and service in the Afghan and Zulu wars. The ceremony took place in the White Drawing-room of Windsor Castle, Her Majesty being attended by several members of the royal family. In our illustration Colonel Pearson, who commanded the garrison in the defense of Ekowe, is seen kneeling before the Queen, who is in the act of fastening the cross of the order to the breast of his coat.

The Last Attempt on the Czar's Life.

The last attempt to kill the Czar was the most ingenious of any that has been made. A house was hired close by the railroad near Moscow, and a tunnel constructed from it a distance of 150 feet, a portion being built of stone. In this tunnel, which extended beneath the railroad track, was deposited an enormous quantity of explosives connected by wires with a battery in the house. On December 1st the train, with the Czar and suite on board, passed safely over the mine on the way to Moscow, but when the second train, containing the baggage, which usually precedes the Czar, came along, some people on the embankment cheered, and the mine was at once exploded, blowing one van to pieces and overturning seven others, but injuring no one. The conspirators had been at work on the mine since the early part of September.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

—THERE are now ten thousand miners on strike in the Meuse district of Belgium.

—THE trade of Dallas, Texas, for the year ending September 1st, 1879, amounted to $7,000,000.

—EXPERIMENTS in the manufacture of ice have been made at Wilmington, N. C., with most satisfactory results.

—THE fair-grounds at Nashville have been sold for $40,000 to a firm of Northern capitalists, who propose erecting thereon furnaces and an iron mill.

—TELEGRAPHIC advices to the 20th of December from Callao state that perfect order prevailed in Lima, and there had been no change in the Government.

—THE present session of the Spanish Cortez will close when the Bill for the abolition of slavery in Cuba is disposed of. The new session will begin in March.

—THE introduction of American anthracite into Switzerland has directed the attention of the Swiss to their own coal-fields, which they believe may be made to supply their wants.

—THE small islands of the West Indies, known as the Leeward Islands, are becoming a source of sugar supply to this country. Five years ago none was received from there. Last year $300,000 worth was shipped.

—SIX carloads of silkworm-eggs lately came across the continent, having been shipped this way from Japan to Italy. They are in charge of five Italians, who make a profitable business of buying them of the Japanese raisers and selling them to farmers in Italy.

—A PERSON known for the past twenty-five years as Charles Parkhurst, who has led the life of a stage-driver and farmer during this time in California, has just died near Watsonville, when it became known for the first time that the deceased was a woman.

—A COMMITTEE of ladies entered Parliament recently, on the floor of the House, having a petition signed by 70,500 ladies asking for the Sunday closing of liquor houses in England. This is the first time women have ever appeared on the floor, a latticed gallery being assigned them.

—THE Governor of North Carolina will call a special meeting of the Legislature of that State to act upon an offer on the part of capitalists to buy the Western North Carolina railroad from the State at $800,000, binding the new company to extend that road to Dunkirk, Texas, on or before 1882.

—THE ladies of Pennsylvania, having succeeded in purchasing the mansion which General Washington occupied as his headquarters at Valley Forge, have now started the movement to buy the 2,000 acres adjoining, in which the old breastworks are still in good preservation, and then erect a soldiers' home there.

—ACCORDING to Dr. Dollinger, the Mohammedan religion is making good headway. There have been great numbers of conversions in China; a single Moslem college at Sierra Leone is about to send out 1,000 teachers among the Africans tribes; and among the Malays the converts are literally reckoned by millions.

—COMMISSIONER-GENERAL McCORMICK has completed a list of all expenditures upon the part of the United States at the Paris Exposition, and the same will be sent to Congress by the Secretary of State. Of the two Congressional appropriations, amounting together to $190,000, the Commissioner-General reports an unexpended balance of between $10,000 and $12,000.

—EX-GOVERNOR WASHBURN, of Wisconsin, has just given the Wisconsin Industrial Association forty acres of land in the vicinity of Mineral Point, his old home, to be used as permanent fair-grounds. He had previously given $50,000 to the State University for an astronomical observatory, and had given the State his country seat, near Madison, for an industrial school for girls.

—THE total number of arrivals of vessels at the port of New York during 1879 was 21,421, against 19,110 in 1878, and 19,856 in 1877. This increase is in the trade with foreign and the Eastern domestic ports. Of the arrivals, 8,077 were from foreign ports, against 7,358 in 1878, 6,244 in 1877, and 5,731 in 1876. The increase is principally in the number of steamers, ships and barks, showing an increased commerce with ports at a distance.

—ACCORDING to the Journal de Genève several articles belonging to the Polished Stone Period were found in the course of some recent excavations at La Coulouvrenière. One of the most curious is a green jade stone scraper, no larger than a finger, slightly curved inside and splendidly polished. Its edge is still as keen as when it left the maker's hands. The discovery is all the more remarkable from the fact that jade comes from Asia, and is not found in Switzerland.

—THE Clarkson Nott Potter scholarship, at Union, N. Y., was established by the trustees Mr. Potter persistently refused all payment for laborious legal services, which has saved the college more than $250,000, and the trustees, estimating his compensation at $5,000 at least, resolved to devote that sum out of the Nott trust fund to found a scholarship in Mr. Potter's name. The presentation to it rests with Mr. Potter during his life and with the presidents of the college thereafter.

—ADVICES from Japan state that M. Fujita, the largest contractor in the country, M. Nakano, one of the first merchants, and sixty of their principal friends, have been arrested for having caused to be produced in Germany forged Treasury bonds to the value of about 15,000,000 francs, which they managed in such a way that they were put in circulation by the Treasury itself. The discovery of this fact produced a crisis unexampled in Yokohama. A terrible panic on the Bourse ensued, and the most scandalous scenes took place.

—THE bank clearings in Louisville, Ky., in 1879, were $255,106,075. There were 17,916 hogsheads of leaf-tobacco sold, and 5,200,000 pounds of manufactured tobacco paid revenue tax. The receipts of cattle were 54,966 head; hogs, 248,732 head; sheep, 143,673 head; horses and mules, 7,918 head. The receipts of merchandise in the last six months were, for leading articles: Hams, 3,906,030 pounds; bacon, 26,704,471 pounds; butter, 1,068,013 pounds; cheese, 2,161,165 pounds; coffee, 5,965,317 pounds; merchandise and sundries, 365,602 packages. The internal revenue receipts amounted to $3,919,411.

—THE tomb of Pius IX., at Rome, in the Church of San Lorenzo Beyond the Walls, is said to be almost covered with inscriptions in various languages, besides wreaths, flowers and other memorial offerings. They were written by persons from many walks of life, by priests, as well as by laymen; by pontifical soldiers, and soldiers in the Italian Army; by widows, orphans and representatives of monasteries, colleges, schools and societies. A peculiarity of many of the inscriptions is that the former pontiff is not prayed for, but invoked, this being an outcome of a belief prevalent among Italian Catholics that Pius IX. has entered into heaven, and is now in the position of an intercessor.

SONNET.

To ——.

IN a Sevillian cloister, old and quaint,
I wandered once, and saw a picture rare—
A goddess, with sublimities of hair,
Holding a rosebud to a suppliant saint.

Her dark and perfect locks, without restraint,
Fell on an ample bosom, whitely fair:
And, wondering much, I murmured, half in prayer,
"'Tis but a dream an artist loved to paint:

"A vagrant fancy of a fevered mind,
For none beheld such glorious tresses shine
On earth or sea, and they will ne'er be seen!"

This I believed, until my eyes did find
The misty marvel of your hair divine,
Fit for the brow of some celestial queen!

F. S. SALTUS.

THE HIDDEN WITNESS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THAT HUSBAND OF MINE."

CHAPTER XIX.—(CONTINUED).

THE diminutive African tottered along behind them as well as he could under the pressure of that mighty name, and Salome carried Sylve at once into a large room, bare of carpet, but otherwise substantially furnished. There was a fire on the hearth, and a large red-and-white screen before it, so that presently Sylve's chilled limbs were comfortable, and a substantial black woman had brought a little stand to her side, and coffee and golden fare. She said to Salome that breakfast had never tasted so good before.

"That's because you've earned it, my dear. Do you know that since mamma died, and I have had the care of the house, I enjoy perfect health? You see all our slaves ran off with the exception of Maum Barbadoes, and she preferred to stay because she is so very deaf, and this poor little Samson, who was ailing, and so they did not take him. Barby, as she is called, is worth her weight in gold, she is so capable and willing, and Samson is growing stronger, though I think it will take him some time yet to emulate the strength of his namesake. Do you know, we milk six cows between us, and I make all the butter, and Barby all the cheese, so we really don't miss most of the comforts we have always had. There are plenty of Southern girls will tell you the same story, and that they are healthier and happier than when they had the moral and physical welfare of the negroes to look after. There was always a mine under our feet, ready to be sprung; but there is none of that feeling now."

"I shall keep on trying to earn my meals," said Sylve, bravely, "for I intend, as Miss Nellie Brown, to come among you as a teacher from the West—mind, it's to be the West."

"You theatrical child!" exclaimed Salome, whose black eyes, square brow, bright, plump lips, and brown hands, were alive with energy; "haven't you got over your romantic proclivities yet? You a teacher—you dainty little thing! Do you know what teaching means here?"

"I don't care what it means," said Sylve, determinedly, "I am going to undertake it. I'm tired of living in idleness—that's why I came to you."

"But as Nellie Brown!—why change your own beautiful name? Don't you know that as Sylve de Latude you will be a thousand times more popular and even respected than as plain Miss Brown? Oh, Sylve! don't do it."

"But I must, Salome. Oh, don't you discourage me at the onset. I'm not at all theatrical or romantic—you mustn't think that; but, you see, as Sylve they would find me sooner. As Miss Brown—they would never suspect."

"And who are they?—and what are you talking about?" queried Salome, dismay in her countenance.

"Oh, Salome, you haven't guessed yet that I have run away?" Salome had been kneeling on a hassock at Sylve's knee. Now she sprang to her feet her resolute face grown pale and troubled.

"Run away! Sylve, are you crazy? Do you mean you have left the Foresters—left that pleasant, beautiful home? Oh! then the suit has gone against you?" she added, her arm instinctively twining itself about the other's neck.

"No: on the contrary, the suit is going to be prosperous, and make me quite rich," said Sylve, with dignity.

"I can't understand your running away, then," and the arm loosened its hold. "I don't like it, and I won't be a party to it, unless you have a wonderfully good reason," said Salome.

"Now you are going to desert me, and send me among strangers," said Sylve, bursting into tears, "for I won't go back; nothing you could say would induce me to go back. I tell you, Salome, I have good and sufficient reasons, which I won't tell any one yet a while—and you must be my friend if I am friendless."

"But, my child, they will surely send here," said Salome.

"How can they ever know of you?" queried Sylve.

"Why, don't you see, Mr. Forester is a lawyer, and will leave no stone unturned."

"Spare your zeal, my dear," said Sylve, interrupting her. "Flix and I are not good friends at all. He is very glad to be rid of me—and—and I—of him."

"Then," thought Salome, to herself, "there has been a quarrel—a lover's quarrel—I don't doubt, young as she is."

"You see they will write to the teachers of the old Windmill, and they will furnish them with a list of all your friends; then will come letters—perhaps the veritable Flix, as you call him, himself, in person."

"Oh, gracious!" exclaimed Sylve, as this formidable possibility was put thus before her; "but you need not worry yourself, or me, for—and"—she whispered in Salome's ear—"he hates the very sight of me," and fell to crying again.

"You poor little goose," half-laughed Salome, gathering her up in her arms, "you don't seem over-jubilant on getting away from such treatment. Is the hurt all on one side?"

That touched pride.

"No!" said Sylve, bravely, making short work of the tears, and the handkerchief that held them; "but I do love Mrs. Forester, dearly. However, that's passed. Now, Salome, you will stand my friend as you used so often at the old Windmill, and I'll be such good company! I'll help you milk, make beds, or any other sociable work, and when I get my money, if you like, I'll share it with you. What good is it going to do me, I should like to know?" and down rained the tears again. "Don't laugh at me," she sobbed, "but this fire did put me so much in mind of dear Mrs. Forester's room—but that's the last of it—there! I'm not going to cry or feel bad any ore. Come, give me something to do."

"I shall give you a room and a bed to sleep in, just now," said Salome, kissing the pale cheek, "and, meantime, I'll think over this matter. If I can't reconcile it to my conscience, why——"

Two arms held her tightly, a trifle dangerously so, by the throat, and Sylve hung on her breast, begging her for the love she bore her to decide now. "If you don't I shall never go to sleep," she said.

"In that case I could never decide," laughed Salome.

"Oh, but you have; I see it in your eyes; kiss me, and I'll take it for Yes."

"You bad child," said Salome, but she kissed her, and there were tears in her eyes.

"Now seal the compact by calling me Nellie."

"Never!" exclaimed Salome; but she did after a little more coaxing.

"Now I shall take a good long rest, preparatory to entering upon my new life," said Sylve. "Mind you, I don't much blame Flix Forester, after all, for disliking me, for I have been a very hard girl—you know I have—and how you had to screen me often for my mischief at the Windmill."

"Nonsense! Say for thoughtlessness, not right down wickedness," replied Salome, with emphasis; "and as for Flix Forester—see how pat I've got the name—as for his disliking you—why—he'll marry you yet."

The quick cry and scared, half-shamed look that followed this speech, started Salome.

"I think that told the story," she said, on her way back to her work; "the child loves him, whether he loves her or not. What a pity!"

"Barbe," she said, addressing the old negress, in her soft, clear voice, "I should like to keep this pretty little girl for a few months. She is an orphan, and homeless at present."

"Is she pore, miss—right pore?" queried the old woman, in a melancholy voice.

"I expect so," was the reply, for Salome knew nothing of Sylve's resources, supposing, of course, that she would not care to work if she had had money.

"Sartin you ought to keep her, honey; it won't take much more for to keep sich a bird as she, I specs. I pities de pore, always, though I'se pore myself, de good Lord knows."

Barbe's equanimity in "doing for" this child of poverty, as she considered her, was somewhat shaken by the present of a finer dress than she had ever owned, during the first week, besides a splendid Madras handkerchief and a showy brooch. She received them, however, as from the Lord, and was ever after unwearied in her efforts to please the newcomer's somewhat fastidious appetite.

CHAPTER XX.—"I'LL NEVER LEAVE YE NOR FORSAKE YE."

ORIGINALLY the homestead belonging to Salome's family had been built of logs, then modernized and plastered, then added to by successive generations, always in width, never in height, until, as Sylve expressed it, it looked like a miniature village. It was situated far from the road, and the forest by which it was shielded from easterly storms, had never been cut down. The house was nearly two hundred years old, and though piazzas had been built around it, and many modern conveniences introduced, it reminded one of some wind and storm-painted Swiss chalet, save that it was not perched in mid-air, or at the base of picturesque gray rocks.

There were plenty of outbuildings, irregular ground carefully planted and dotted here and there by whitewashed slave huts. There were mossy dells in the belt of woods, lovely paths all smooth and bright with fir needles, sweet shining bits of water, beside which grew wild pinks and violets, and, where the sweet mosses crowded in between, a very harvest of beauty to the poetical eye. This wood had been the pet of all the Braddocks; in fact, it went by the name of Braddock's Grove. There were places of sylvan solitude, where some kind hands had twisted the brown knotty roots into the semblance of a chair. A beautiful rising hill, covered with larches, held at its crown an arbor made of young saplings twisted together, and as fast as they grew, the branches were lopped off towards the west, so that through the opening one had a glorious view of field and valley, cultivated farms, and the lovely luxuriant wildernesses of nature. Such spots as could be seen from this choice location! Such heart of green embosomed among rolling hills, on which the cattle lazily fed, or pampered horses let out to feed pranced and careened over the fertile meads, shaking their long manes and neighing with the ecstasy of thorough freedom.

From this place could also be seen Colonel Lewin's now dilapidated estate. The two families had been quite intimate, and frequently before the war Colonel Lewin's daughter, visitors and slaves, felt themselves at liberty to roam through the Braddock woods. Their own strip of forest was not susceptible of that peculiar kind of cultivation or ornamentation, it lying low at the base of a hill, whereas the other crowned its top.

One memorable day, soon after peace had been proclaimed, two figures might have been seen standing in the doorway of the deserted bower, for it was long since friendly ax or hand had attended to its wants. One was short, thick-set, with a head of remarkable size, covered with gray and white wool. He had been the preacher on that circuit for many years, but his usefulness was now gone, and he was only known as Dee's ole man. Dee, or Desire, if the reader remembers, was the nurse of Eve Lewin, and, being nearly sixteen years her husband's junior, showed few signs of age, though she was nearly fifty. Tall, stout, strong, with a ringing voice, and eyes like black diamonds, she was still the pride of the place, and the only living thing that Eve clung to now that her father was dead, for the colonel had died at the post of duty. One mail brought the news of his death at the head of his charge; the other, that of Colonel Wilde, so that both Raphael Wilde and Eve Lewin were orphans.

The setting sun shone resplendently upon the hill-top, bathing in its wonderful crimson light the shining black face of Crow—or "Father Crow," as he was generally called. Never had the prospect looked more beautiful, with its shifting shadows of dun and brown and red. The branches were tinged, and whole trees here and there bathed in the flood of rosy flame. The hills beyond were beautiful with tints of carmine and orange, and long purple and pale green streaks of cloud floated like moving islands in the rich light, their edges burning with feathery plumes, that dipped in the pale blue of the horizon like miniature willows.

"Well, ole man," said Dee, settling her handkerchief about her broad forehead, and folding her arms, "what 'clusion hev ye come to takin'? I's ready to follow yer advice, of it looks 'sponsible?"

"The rest is all gone, Dee, and we'll never hab anoder chance," said Crow, casting his glance to the ground. "I's been prayin' for light, an' it seems as if the Lord said, 'Go, follow Moses.'"

"Inter de promised lan', eh, ole man?" said Dee. "Well, it seems to me someways like dying—you don't zactly know whar you's gwine to."

"The res' of em has found a home, ole 'oman," said Crow, "an' dem ar sojers give me 'ticular directions. Freedom's wuth havin'."

"Well, we's jes as free here as we is anywhar else, I reckon," said Dee.

"'Tain't the same feelin'," the old man grimly responded. "You see, all the res' of 'em is gone, an' it makes one sort o' lonesome. Den dars money dar, ole 'oman, an' though my days o' usefulness is past, Lord love ye, dey trows away money, dem ar Nordeners."

"It's de only fault I's ever found wid ye, ole man, ye's mavericious. A preacher o' de tarnal salvation don't ought to do dat ar; he ought to keep his hands free from filthy lukey, or whatever they calls it. But, then, I'll be boun' by what yo' says, ef I keeps de same mind when we starts."

Just before the war, Colonel Lewin had made some money in a fortunate speculation. Instead of making himself and his family comfortable, repairing the house and beautifying the premises, he had bought slaves—a reckless venture, as his best friends told him. During the last years of the conflict, his house had been used as quarters, and—the truth must be told—foully abused, as indeed was all the land about. A few trees from the woods might have been felled, but instead of that the soldiers tore down all the rails that inclosed the farm, the handsomely ornamented piazza-balustrades, and burned several pieces of the furniture for mere wantonness. When they left, nearly all of the new Lewin gang went with them. It was a time of terror to pretty, delicate Eve, but Dee watched over her as a tigress watches its cub. Whatever happened she was never neglected. Dee would fight for her "chile" before harm should come to her, and the slight girl of fourteen knew no other protector. When the rest of them ran off, she implored Dee not to desert her, and although the faithful woman had listened with the rest to the golden story of freedom, and though it looked like some paradise where she might rest a while before going to the promised land, yet her heart was terribly divided. She loved and respected her "ole man," who had been a power in the slave community, but she loved and pitied with the added sense of protection, such as no other mortal could bestow, her "chile." Many a night after the house was left to Crow and herself—the ruined, broken, desolate homestead—did she lie awake pondering over these things. She had resisted the appeal of her own heart when the general stampede occurred, but her "ole man" had a revelation, or said he had, that they must both go to the promised land, there to die in the midst of liberty. When she told Eve of this, the child listened like one stunned.

"To leave me, to leave me?" she repeated.

"Honey, we'll take you 'long, too," said Dee, breaking down.

"No, Dee, I'll stay. I can't go from my father's home."

"But who'll car' for ye, chile?"

"God," was the answer, choked with sobs.

"You don't think He'll come down to old Virginny, do ye?"

"He'll send somebody," said the girl; then overcome with the horror of the prospect, she sank down half fainting. Old Dee caught her to her ample bosom.

"Don't you weep an' wail no mo', honey," she cried. "Dee's made up her mind. So, bress her, she sha'n't go travelin' and bruise her feet an' git sick by the way. You b'leeve Dee, don't you? She never meant to leave her chicken."

The child clung to her only friend, sobbing now with joy.

"Yes, I'se settled it. Ef Crow feels it's his duty, an' his Master's tole him to go, why he goes 'thout me. My fustest duty is to pertect de helpless—though the good Lord knows which of 'em is most helpless," she added, her mind recurring to Crow's growing infirmities. "Never you mind, honey, Dee is gwine to stick to de ole place; now you wait till I tell Crow." She hurried up-stairs to the room where the old man was packing. He sat on a high blue chest, surrounded by his worldly goods and chattels, and thoroughly perplexed as to what he should take and what leave.

"Crow," said Desire, looking towards the window, fast growing dusk in the waning light, "I can't go."

Crow said nothing, looked contemplative and crossed one knee over the other.

"Well, ole 'ooman," he slowly began, when Desire dashed in——

"You git along yourself, Crow; go find some o' yo' people, they'll har ye compery. Ole man, yo' see this are the way it is. I can't desert dat poro chile, and leave her to de chillin' ways ob de world. She'd break her pore little heart afore I'd dun gone a week an' die, an' I'se had a mighty hard time a raisin' her. I can't do it, Crow—'fore my blessed Master, I dassent."

"All right, ole ooman," said her lord and master, with a huge sigh—was it of relief or disappointment?—"all right. If you stays I stays," he added, with ponderous deliberation. "Bress de Lord, dat stops de jackin' an' saves de rheumatismal pains dat I's 'feared of, ef we has to go into ole swamps an' things."

"But, Crow," said Dee, secretly exultant over her power, "what comes ob de command you heerd in your prayer—'go long o' Moses.'"

"De Lord is taken it out o' my hand," said Crow, closing his eyes resignedly, "'sides which dar ain't no Moses any mo'. De chillen ob Isrel am free. I did hate to leave dem yer chickens, an' ole Philly—thar wouldn't a been a soul to milk her. I'll bet dem ar Unions telled a heap o' lies," he added, springing up with a brisk motion, now that the care of the matter had fallen from his shoulders.

"An' ole man, we's de lords ob de house," said Dee, gravely. "Do you think anybody 'd gib ye a hull house ober thar, ef it is mighty nigh spiled."

"No, ole ooman, I don't reckon they would. What did they want to cut dis in splinters for? Dee, now it's all settled, I's been quakin' ober dis yer matter. Yo' see, de Lord don't talk to de chillen ob dis generation, an' though I thought He meant we must go to de Norf land, liker 'twas de debbil. I isn't quite clar in my mind 'bout dat."

"Well, while you're gettin' clar, ole man, I'll go to my chile an' comfort her."

"It's all fixed," she said, joyfully. "Crow, he won't go nother, an' I's so glad, for he mighty useful 'bout de dumb critters."

"Are you sure, Dee? Won't you be sorry for having decided to stay in this lonesome place with only me?"

"Deed, honey, I's ready to swar more my Lord," cried the woman, passionately, gathering the girl in her ebony arms, "and in presence ob dese yer witnesses, which is on'y chairs an' tables, though they's got better hearts than some humans, I'll neber leave ye nor forsake ye. Me an' my ole man'll work our fingers to de bone for ye. Crow's mighty unsartin, cause he's slow on his feet, owin' mostly to his jints and de rheumatiz; but I's a hull white army! Can't I do mos' eberything? Can't I plant and rake and hoe—'specially wid the ole man's help? Cheer up, missy; me'n Crow ain't got no mean white blood in us—we's de royal color, we's coffee 'thout any milk—good strong coffee, too!"

This simile had at least the effect of rousing the child from her sudden and profound sorrow. A smile dimpled the quivering lips, and she snuggled closer to her only earthly friend and protector.

"Den dar's Rafe," continued Dee; "why, hum's mos' a growed man when he come here las' Spring. He'll be a mighty smart gen'leman, and, bress de Lord! when missie's a woman, dar'll be a weddin' maybe."

"A wedding!—here?" murmured Eve, casting despondent glances on the dilapidated household goods—"a wedding! Oh, no, Dee, there'll never be a wedding. Ray will make new friends where he is and forget the old. Papa said he was a genius, and there was greatness before him. Great men don't marry out of places like this. No, he'll learn to love those cold-blooded people where he is at school, while I must stay in this wretched house. Why, Dee, do you know the rain comes through into every room up-stairs, and I'm so sick of seeing the rained furniture and the smoky walls! I'll never forgive those people for spoiling dear, dead papa's home!—never, never!"

"Never mind, honey, we won't talk ob dat ar now. We'll patch up de places an' set Crow to work. After all, up-stairs ain't anything nohow, case ye see we's on'y three in de family. Now, to my mind, dar ain't a pleasanter place in ole Varginy dan de kitchen—why, chile, it's more like a ballroom, an' dat's what old massa conterplated. Tell ye what, honey, we'll bring lots o' things in here—chests an' lounges, and de best part ob de carpet in de saloon parlor for yo' to sit on, an' we'll play dat de fustest part—say to here"—making an imaginary line in the centre of the apartment—"is quality, where you does your sewin' an' needlework, an' dis secondly part is de kitchen. Miss Eve she shall eat in de quality half, an' we'll put up de best beds in de parlor an' all de nicest furniture to keep it. What! won't we have good, genteel times, hey? I'd like to know!" she cried, hugging

Eve, rapturously. "Dar's de yeth to give us corn an' potatoes and peas and hominy, and there's three blessed pigs them ar Unions left wid dar mother; and here's a roof to cover our unworthy heads. Why, jes s'pose dey'd burned us up like dey did good many plantations long de river. Tells you what, missee, we's alleys got somethin' to be thankful for. As for Mars Rafe's done forgittin' you, chile. Why, las' time he come didn't he beg that ole photography ob Miss Eve's out o' my ole album, and didn't I see him a kissin' an' a kissin' it?"

It was with a grin of genuine African delight that she imparted this news to the beautiful girl, more than repaid by the smile of joy that brightened the sweet blue eyes.

"You really think he won't forget me?"

"Never, please de Lord—an' he's got heaps o' money, too. Now, brighten your pretty face, an' come help ole aunty fix up."

It was a mighty undertaking, but, with Crow's help and Dee's patience, order came out of the chaos that had so lately reigned in the old house. Its symmetry of proportion had not been materially injured. The hall was as spacious, the staircase still wound in graceful spirals out of the broad skylighted hall, in which stood one statue uninjured that had been the colonel's pride. Parlor, kitchen and bedroom were successfully evolved out of the two apartments left presentable. The kitchen was a marvel of ingenuity in its arrangement. It was true that Colonel Lewin had intended at some future time to transform it into a ballroom, and at one end had caused to be built a singularly handsome fireplace, after the fashion of some old baronial hall. The room being finished in oak, and the furniture simple, had not been injured by the enemy. But the parlor, into which had been removed the remains of the ancient splendor of the house, had not met with so much favor. There the marks of wanton destruction were visible everywhere. A superb sofa of rose-colored satin showed grim rents, slashed by the sword. An immense mirror, a fixture in a frame of oak, that was in itself as exquisite as a picture, bore two fractures that extended its whole length. A few paintings had been saved from the spoiler, but chairs, tables, even the ancient four-post bedstead, covered with rich damask, bore evidence of the hate or thoughtlessness of the party there and then in power. But they could not change the grand location, or spoil the view that spread out for leagues and leagues on every side. Even now to persons coming up the valley the fine old house had lost none of its attractiveness. It still seemed a castle, sitting on the heights, and though many called it "Lewin's Folly," yet the Virginians in that part of the country were rather proud of the grand columnar front and imposing roof. So, for three years Dee managed the place, and kept herself and her charge from want.

THE SITUATION IN MAINE.

THERE has been as yet no breach of the peace in Maine, although intense excitement has prevailed throughout the State since the publication of our last issue. On Wednesday, December 31st, Governor Garcelon forwarded to Chief-Justice Appleton certain questions of law, relating to the counting of the election returns, which are believed to cover the essential points in the letter addressed to him by ex-Senator Morrill. It is said that not a single member of the Executive Council agreed with the Governor in his determination to invoke the opinion of the Supreme Court in the emergency, and his action in so doing excited a quieting influence at once.

On receipt of the communication the Chief-Justice summoned all the Associate Justices to assemble in Bangor, on January 2d, to consider the questions propounded. While awaiting the decision of this body the citizens kept up the meeting to indorse and deprecate the Governor's action, and grave apprehensions were expressed lest a serious conflict would be precipitated on January 7th, when the Legislature assembles. The Mayor of Augusta, in connection with the Committee on Public Safety, besought the Governor to keep the military from the capital, pledging that the augmented police force would maintain order and quell any disturbance that might arise. Governor Garcelon is said to have replied that he had full power to call the Legislature wherever he pleased, and that on the slightest disturbance he would take it away from Augusta. That wiser councils have prevailed is shown by the fact that a second attempt to remove the arms and ammunition from the State arsenal at Bangor to Augusta was accomplished without any trouble. The first attempt was made on Christmas Day, when Major French, acting under the orders of the Governor, went to the arsenal and made arrangements for shipping the arms to the Capital. His presence and intention becoming known, a great number of citizens assembled, and when the drays that had been loaded at the arsenal were on their way through the streets, the drivers were suddenly confronted by the citizens, who completely barred the passage. The greatest excitement ensued for a while; then Major French decided to return the arms, rather than risk the riot that appeared inevitable, and, under the escort of a police force, the drays were driven back and unloaded.

The second attempt was made on December 30th, when the arsenal was opened by Adjutant-General Leavitt, who previously informed Mayor Brown of the Governor's order for the removal of the arms. Several wagons loaded with arms and ammunition, without any military or police guard, were driven, without molestation, through the streets to the Maine Central Depot, although the people, in large numbers, stood on the sidewalks. The shipment was made at night by an express train.

THE GREAT RAILROAD ACCIDENT IN SCOTLAND.

BUT few particulars have as yet been received of the frightful accident on the great bridge crossing the Firth of Tay, in Scotland, on Sunday evening, December 28th. The first accounts placed the loss of life at the total of the passengers and employés, the number being estimated, from 100 to 200. Subsequently it was reported that there were not over 90 people on the ill-fated train at the time, while later dispatches, placing the number at nearly 300, confirmed the others in the awful rumor, "not a soul was saved."

The train started from Edinburgh for Dundee on Sunday evening, and had reached the Firth of Tay, on which Dundee is situated, and was crossing the long bridge that spans that broad and tempestuous estuary. A tremendous gale was blowing, and, as the train thundered over the great bridge, a portion of the structure was broken out by the winds and waves, and the railroad coaches were precipitated into the Firth. Nothing was seen of the cars, but several mail-bags were washed ashore four miles from the scene of the disaster. It is believed that the cars neither floated nor were carried far from the wrecked bridge, but that they sank instantly.

The Firth of Tay receives more water than any other inlet in Scotland. It receives the drainage of all of Perth and parts of Forfarshire. Two streams unite to form it. It also receives six or seven other streams. It is navigable fifteen miles from its mouth for vessels of 500 tons burden, and smaller vessels are able to ascend it to the town of Perth.

The Tay Bridge, one of the most remarkable in Great Britain, was built in 1873, and is said to be the largest iron bridge in the world. It is 1¼ miles west of Dundee. It is 10,320 feet in length, commencing from the south or Fife side. It contains three spans of 61 feet, two of 80 feet, twenty-two of 120 feet, fourteen of 200 feet, sixteen of 150 feet, twenty-five of 66 feet, one of 160 feet, and six of 27 feet. It passes at a height of eighteen feet over Magdalen Point. The great 200 feet spans cross the channel of the river 88 feet above high water. Its direction is northward, and its northern end is in the City of Dundee.

The opinion of Sir Thomas Bouch, the engineer of the bridge, who inspected it on Monday, is that the train proceeded without interruption until it reached the high girders; then one or more of the back carriages went off the rails, coming against the lattice-work, and tore the structure to pieces, causing the disaster. The showers of sparks seen by those on shore are believed to have been caused by collision of the carriages with the ironwork. The place where the train sank is full of quicksands, and if the bodies of the drowned are not recovered very soon, it is believed they will be imbedded with the cars beyond recovery.

Our illustration of the bridge is from a sketch made last Summer at the time of Queen Victoria's visit to Balmoral Castle, and represents Her Majesty in the act of looking down upon the waters of the Firth from a window of her State coach.

A dispatch from the scene of the accident, on January 1st, reported that diving in the Tay, at the scene of the recent bridge disaster, had been suspended, owing to the boisterous weather. The railway authorities said there is little doubt that the bodies have been washed seaward, and a boat expedition has been organized to search for them.

THE CUSTER MASSACRE MEMORIAL.

A SAD memorial of the Custer massacre on the Little Big Horn River, on June 25th, 1876, has been erected on the spot of the memorable strife. It consists solely of the bones of the soldiers, Indians and horses killed by the Sioux in that surprise, which have been arranged in the form of a mound, the pieces being held in place by lengths of cord-wood. Our illustration was made during a recent snow-storm, and while a party of Crow Indians were passing the mound on their way to the agency.

STOCKHOLDERS' BALL.

THE masked ball at the Academy of Music on Monday night was a signal success, combining as it did the flavor of the abandon and mad waggery of the Carnival with the quieter and more dignified movements which society with the big S rigidly exacts at the hands of her votaries. Flashing lights, perfumed blossoms, timid ferns ever so refreshing to the eye, beautiful women—ay, beautiful, despite their cuvious masks, for are not pearly teeth and rosebud lips pretty fair indications of equally fetching charms?—superb toilets, and music after Strauss and Lecocq, and a floor fit for Taglioni! The air was laden with the invisible and electrical atmosphere of fun—downright, hearty, joyous, and in full measure. A great "Comedy of Errors" was being performed on the boards of the Academy, and cross purposes played themselves as crassly as the tangled threads of a skein of silk. Husbands flirted—the unconscious villains!—with their own wives in mistake for those of their neighbors'. Engaged ones spooned away to their hearts' content, but not with the adored Angelina or the darling Edwin. Pompous old bachelors skipped about as in their Yale or Harvard days, and elderly spinsters for a "sweet bitter moment" enjoyed the delirious ecstasy of hearing charms praised that, say, twenty years ago were in full blossom. Behind the screen of the mask came many sharp truths, many stinging sarcasms, many biting innuendoes; the cold steel was driven to the hilt, the nerves laid bare beneath the merciless scalpel. Many men, and many women, in that excited, joyous, bustling crowd, would have given the price of their ticket one thousand times told for just ever so slight a peep at the face behind the bit of black crape, and not a few were puzzled at the discovery that the secret of the combination locks of the chambers of their inner lives were so mysteriously in the keeping of others. It was a mad, merry scene, as the voluptuous strains of the waltz floated like perfume on the air, and hundreds of nameless, mysterious people whirled dreamily in the dance. It was strange to see the eager endeavors of mankind to peer into the sparkling depths of the eyelet-holes of fair maskers. It was intensely amusing to listen to the artful questions put and parried, and to picture baffled hopes on blank faces. What fierce flirtations! What gush and spoon! What pressure of hands! What entreaties for souvenirs—a flower, a ribbon—anything for a clew to the mystery of the night! What allusions to the coming Jeune "Personals"! What silvery laughter of fair woman! Then the masks would occasionally come away, and thoroughly independent, or thoroughly heated, dancers would remove the screen from their identity. Some there were who held levees in private boxes, and many a courtier made his bow and flung his williams without knowing under heaven the name, rank or title of the sovereign of the moment.

The mise en scène was admirable, the dark background; the rustic bridge with its real greenery, the sky with the gentle Luna shedding silvern rays on the mad waggery, and its real water plashing in softest murmur to the sensuous strains of Strauss. The balconies, too, on either hand, thronged with maskers, reminded me of a scene in Venice not yet a decade old. And shall I forget the supper, so piquant and appetizing, and the tiny white card, bearing the cabalistic words: "Good for one bottle of wine"? The Stockholders' Masked Ball, like O'Rourke's noble feast, will long be remembered "by those who were there and by those who were not."

Ice Yachts.

ICE-YACHTS cost from $15 to $1,000 each. When I mention the $15 boats, I refer to those of our schoolboy days, built of refuse boards, with three-shilling skate-runners, using bent nails thrown away by carpenters. What a contrast to the ice-yacht of the present day, exquisitely shaped and lined, with hull constructed of alternate strips of hard wood, wire rigging, A No. 1 duck for sails, brass cleats and blocks, full sets of colors, splendid spars, booms, bowsprit, polished steel runners, nickel-plated ornaments, buffalo robes, etc. The time made by ice-yachts is wonderful. A mile a minute is an every-day occurrence when the ice is in good condition, and the wind blows. In the Winter of 1860 the ice-yacht Snowflake ran nine miles north, from Newburg dock, in eight minutes! When the ice is in good condition, and the wind blows heartily, railway trains cannot compete with ice-yachts in point of speed. Time and again have they run up alongside of trains on the Hudson River Railroad, and beaten them easily. On January 19th, 1871, the Zephyr and Ivanhoe, both Poughkeepsie ice-yachts, raced for two miles with the Chicago express, the fastest train on the Hudson River Railroad, and at the end of two miles had to wait for the train to come up. Many would suppose that great danger existed in consequence of the vessels going with such lightning velocity. Such is not the case, as nothing but extreme carelessness on the part of the helmsman results in injuries. With a light breeze the craft will not carry over two persons to advantage. In a heavy blow, however, they will hold six or eight. In fact, during the prevalence of a heavy wind, it is necessary to carry as many in order to keep the vessel down on the ice. What is meant by keeping them down is, that unless sufficient weight rests forward, the windward runner will leave the ice, and rise oftentimes to an angle of 45 degrees. This only occurs when a sudden flaw of wind strikes the craft. In such a case, although the helmsman does not lose control of the vessel, he is compelled to bring her up in the wind's eye, or nearly so, to get her down again.

Every One Acquainted with microscopic researches is aware of the importance, and, at the same time, the extreme difficulty of obtaining accurate measurements of the minute objects subjected to examination. M. Govi has surmounted this difficulty by the invention of a new micrometre. In this instrument the threads formerly used are replaced by a very thin layer of silver, gold or platinum laid on the face of a piece of glass, the surfaces of which are perfectly polished and absolutely parallel. Such metallic castings can be applied of a thickness or thinness not exceeding some hundred thousandths of a millimetre. The lines to be used as a scale are traced by an extremely fine pointed steel instrument. As the layer is so delicate, the drawing of the lines leaves no jagged edges to interfere with the optical investigation, nor does it intercept the light reflected by the object under examination. The new micrometre is unalterable under all changes of temperature, so that, once provided with one, the operator is sure of always working by the same standard.

Cheap Disinfectants.—The committee of experts appointed by the National Board of Health recommends the following disinfectants: First, roll sulphur (brimstone) for fumigation; second, sulphate of iron (copperas) dissolved in water, in the proportion of one and a half pounds to the gallon, for soil, sewers, etc.; third, sulphate of zinc and common salt dissolved together in water, in the proportion of four ounces of salt to the gallon, for clothing and linen, etc. Carbolic acid is excluded from the list on account of the difficulty in procuring it of fixed strength and proper quality; in the hands of scientific men it is a most valuable agent. Pure air and cleanliness are regarded as the cheapest and best of all agents. Towels, clothing and bed-linen should be plunged at once into a boiling-hot solution of the zinc solution. All discharges must be received, if possible, in vessels containing copperas solution, or, when that is impracticable, should be immediately covered with copperas solution. Fumigation with sulphur is the only practicable method of disinfecting the house.

A New Thermo-electric Battery.—M. Clamond, a French electrician, has invented a thermo-electric battery consisting of three parts: an inner one, composed of pieces of iron, arranged in the form of a crown, which can be heated in the interior and is called the collector, as its purpose is to collect the heat and then communicate it to the adjacent thermopile proper; the thermopile which consists of a flexible chain, of any desired length, composed of cubes of antimony and zinc, soldered together by sheets of tin, and containing 6,000 "couples"; plates of copper to diffuse the heat of the collector and expose a large surface to the air, in order that as great a difference of temperature as possible may be maintained between the collector and the diffuser, for upon this difference the strength of the current chiefly depends. M. Clamond has been enabled to light two Serrin's electric lamps with this powerful battery with a consumption of twenty pounds of coke an hour. The apparatus gives warmth as well as light, since its large exterior surface causes it to radiate a considerable quantity of heat.

New Properties of Metals.—Mr. Thomas A. Edison has made some discoveries in reference to the behavior of metals when heated in vacuo, which are likely to have extensive application in the arts. He has succeeded in reducing platinum to a state hitherto unknown, and in rendering it absolutely stable at a temperature when nearly all substances are consumed. After the platinum has been put through his process it is just as elastic at a white heat as it is in the cold, and cannot be annealed by any known method. The change in the molecular condition of the platinum is accomplished by heating and cooling the wire under the receiver of an air pump. At first only moderate heat is applied, but by degrees the temperature is raised until it reaches a point at which the metal would have fused when in its original state. A coil of wire which only afforded one candle illuminating power at the commencement of the experiment and which readily melted, after treatment during an hour and a half in vacuo, gave the light of eight standard candles and showed no signs of melting. One spiral which had been brought to high temperature more slowly gave a light equal to thirty standard candles. Other metals afford similar results when tested in vacuo.

TESTING THE VISION FOR COLOR-BLINDNESS.

THERE has been quite a general discussion of the subject of color-blindness, both in this and in European countries, during the past two years, arising particularly from some startling statements made by a German oculist in the Ophthalmic Congress, the strongest of which was, that a majority of railway accidents and collisions at sea resulted from color-blindness in employés. Since that time tests have been made in various quarters of the globe, and on all German railroads at this time applicants for employment are examined as to their perception of colors. A few weeks ago a number of tests were made in Philadelphia, and many men of defective color-sense were removed from the local railroads. These tests are now being repeated in New York by Dr. Robert White, at the office of the United States Marine Hospital, at the rear of the Custom-House, his first "patients" being the pilots and look-outs of the ferryboats operated by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company.

It is to be hoped that all persons responsible for passenger transportation will possess approved vision.

The methods of testing are very simple, as will be seen. A confused bundle of skeins of Berlin worsted, of all colors and shades, are placed before the man to be examined, and he is requested to pick out all the shades of green, then all the shades of blue, and so on. Men whose sense of color is perfect have no difficulty in picking out what is called for, but those whose sense is imperfect are confused between the lighter shades of green and blue, and between the darker shades of green, blue and brown. It is plain to be seen how a defect that manifests itself within the narrow confines of a room may be magnified at sea, or when the sight makes long excursions to a colored object, such as a switch-signal or the like.

AMUSEMENTS.

THE Fifth Avenue Theatre is besieged nightly, not by the "Pirates of Penzance," but by those who are desirous of hearing the catching successor to "Pinafore." The "Pirates" are likely to fill the treasury to overflowing, and this, too, by gold not obtained after the fashion of Captain Kidd.

"An Arabian Night" is likely to run as long as the Princess Scheherezade's stories. The public have taken to it, and this is the realization of managerial bliss.

"French Flats" still convulse thronged audiences at the Union Square, and Mr. Edgar Fawcett's play, "The False Friend," will not be produced until the "guffaw" merges into a ripple.

"Tourists in a Pullman Car" have stopped the car at Haverly's, and hundreds crowd around to gaze at the farce going on inside. The car cannot remain long, as it is due at several stations on the line, so those who would enjoy a laugh should not lose it by delaying to visit the car.

American Birds, Animals and Fishes for the New Zealanders.

THE persistent efforts of New Zealand in the work of acclimatization deserves the utmost commendation. Half a century ago there was no domestic animals in that country, except a few head of cattle and horses, introduced by the early missionaries at the Bay of Islands, near the extreme north of the Northern Island. The celebrated discoverer, Captain Cook, had introduced sheep and swine half a century earlier, but the sheep very soon perished. The swine, however, increased rapidly, and became a nuisance to sheep-farmers after the colonization of the country, rewards being paid for their destruction, as if they were noxious vermin. The colony was founded in 1840, and the natives had then barely abandoned their cannibal practices, desolating inter-tribal wars having lasted till within a few years of that date. Since then the progress of the country has been the most remarkable on record. It has succeeded in acclimatizing nearly all the game birds of the Old and New Worlds. California quail are more plentiful there than in that State; pheasants, grouse, partridge, etc., afford excellent sport, the several Provinces competing with each other in the work of acclimatizing them. The song-birds of England are fully represented, and these, with the native songsters, make mountain and plain vocal the year round. Prairie chickens and mountain quail have likewise been introduced, sixteen of the latter birds out of twenty-two recently sent to Nelson by Robert J. Creighton, agent of the colony, having arrived there. These birds were forwarded from Emigrant Gap by J. B. Chinn, who took great interest in the matter. Deer-stalking is now possible in many parts of New Zealand, red and fallow deer having been introduced and increased wonderfully. The rivers are full of English and California trout, Eastern trout being likewise represented. In the San Francisco Post particulars were published of a cross between Eastern and English trout by Mr. Johnson, of Oparve, in the Canterbury Province of New Zealand, the hybrid growing larger and faster than the pure fish of either variety. California salmon have likewise been acclimatized, and are in almost every river of any volume in the islands. English salmon are established in New Zealand, also salmon trout. The latter fish has increased very fast, and is now purchasable in most of the markets of the colony. But the great interior lakes of the country are comparatively without fish; indeed, in several of them and tributary rivers, fish-life can scarcely be said to exist. To remedy this defect two attempts were made to stock the lakes with white-fish from Lake Michigan. These attempts failed in the colony from local causes. This year, however, another effort is being made on a much larger scale than formerly. Mr. Creighton has arranged for the shipment of over 2,000,000 white-fish eggs from the fish-hatching establishment of Frederick N. Clark, Northville, Mich., by the mail steamer Australia. The eggs will be packed in mountain ice and carefully watched during the voyage. On their arrival at Auckland they will be transferred to a colonial steamer, preparations having been made for their reception and distribution throughout the colony. Mr. Clark kindly forwarded to Mr. Creighton models of his patent hatching-boxes, and these are already in the colony, so that no hitch will occur in that regard. Mr. Clark telegraphed from Omaha on the 15th that the eggs had been shipped in good condition and would arrive in San Francisco on the 19th. Mr. Clark came with the shipment from Northville to Omaha, to insure against any damage or accident en route. The friends of acclimatization in this State will be gratified, no doubt, at the success of the experiment. Of the Australian group of colonies, New Zealand is more closely identified with this country than any other.

Tapestry.

IT is difficult to fix the precise period at which the manufacture of tapestry in a loom began in European countries. Several documents, going back to the tenth and eleventh centuries, establish the fact that in certain convents in France carpets made of wool, ornamented with flowers and animals, and even hangings representing religious subjects, as well as portraits of kings or emperors, were woven for the decoration of churches and palaces, but no positive knowledge of the mode of manufacture employed at that time has come down to us. It is probable that these hangings were rather embroidered stuffs—like that preserved in the manse at Bayeux, which records events in the conquest of England by the Normans, in 1066—than actual tapestries made in a loom. This kind of fabric was known in the Middle Ages by the name of "Sarrazinois" carpets, and had, doubtless, been brought from the East either by the Saracens of Spain or at the close of the Crusades. It was towards the end of the twelfth century that the Flemish weavers began to make use of high-warp and low-warp looms, and to manufacture real tapestry. The art rapidly developed in their country, both on account of the excellent methods of dyeing employed by the weavers, and also by reason of the abundance and quality of the wool, which was sent to them from England. France, so prosperous in the thirteenth century, soon followed the towns of the North in this branch of industry. These new manufactures became from that time the rivals of the Sarrazinois tapestries, which were very inferior in workmanship, and many disputes arose, both in Flanders and in Paris, between the representatives of the two industries. It appears that in Paris the demand for Sarrazinois tapestries had even increased, and the workmen employed on them had formed a powerful corporation. In the inventories or accounts of that period which have come down to us, the Sarrazinois tapestries are distinguished from high and low warp tapestries. The former are designated embroideries, the latter are generally called Arras. This distinction was kept up till the period of the Renaissance.

FUN.

In one little mouse in the plural is mice,
The plural of house should be certainly hice.

A YOUNG lady in Chicago, when asked by the officiating minister, "Will you love, honor and obey this man as your husband and be to him a true wife?" said plainly, "Yes, if he does what he promised me financially."

"Hi, cabby, have you got a hot brick in your hack?" "Yes, boss." (Enter fare.) "I say, cabby, this hack is as cold as Greenland—I thought you said you had some hot bricks." "So I have—they're under my feet out here. G'lang!"

"I SAY, old fel, you haven't got a five-franc piece about you that you don't know what to do with, have you?" "There's one." "Thanks—but, hello, I say, you know, it's bad!" "You asked me for one I didn't know what to do with!"

A MAN who had sixty-five dollars stolen from him received a note, with twenty-five dollars, saying: "I stoled your money. Remorse saws at my conshens, and I send some of it back. When remorse saws again I'll send you some more."

LORD C——, whose popularity was not excessive in the Scotch town of A——, having refused an importunate beggar, she renewed her application with, "Now, me lord, if ye'd just give me one little sixpence, I could treat every friend ye have in the town."

THE Abbé Prince von Salm-Kyrbourg, who was absurdly, tragically deformed, was one day crossing the royal ante-chamber at Versailles where a number of nobles were warming themselves, when one observed, "Ah, there's Æsop at court." "That is a flattering comparison—for me," said the Abbé; "Æsop, you will remember, made the beasts speak."

A BRIDAL party approached the hymeneal altar, and the clergyman proceeds with the service. "Wilt thou, Mary, take, etc.," he inquires. "Naw!" is the reply. "What!" cries the good pastor; "if you didn't want to marry this gentleman why didn't you say so sooner? What made you wait till the moment of the ceremony?" "Because, sir, you are the first person that has condescended to ask my advice or consent in the matter."

LEBANON (Me.) is proud of possessing the stupidest man in the United States. He is a farm hand, and was engaged to plow a ten-acre lot. Wishing him to draw a straight furrow, his employer directed his attention to a cow grazing right opposite, telling him to drive directly towards that cow. He started his horses, and his employer's attention was drawn to something else; but in a short time, looking around, he found that the cow had left her place, while the sagacious plowman was following her, drawing a zigzag furrow all over the field.

A VERY rich old man had married a young wife and died suddenly, on which the widow raved like a maniac, and exclaimed to the doctor who stood by the bedside of the deceased: "Oh, I'll not believe that my dear partner is dead; he could not die and leave me! No, no! he's alive—I'm sure he's alive! Tell me, don't you think so?" "Madam," replied the medical man, with much gravity, "I confess that it is quite possible that he may be revived. I will apply the galvanic battery." "Oh, no, no," cried the grief-stricken widow. "Hard as it is to bear my fate, I will have no experiment against the law of nature. Let him rest in peace."

THE LADIES' FAVORITE.

AMONG the many thousands of ladies who have used DR. PIERCE'S FAVORITE PRESCRIPTION and pronounced it their favorite remedy, because so efficient in the diseases and weaknesses peculiar to women, are many who are well and favorably known in the world of letters, as well as artists, musicians and a whole host of names from the brilliant ranks of wealth and fashion. It is pre-eminently the ladies' Favorite Prescription. Its use, while being far more safe and efficient, exempting them from those painful, caustic operations, and the wearing of those mechanical contrivances made like Peter Pindar's razor—seller's razors—to sell, rather than to cure.

KILLMORE, Ind., March 20th, 1878.

DR. R. V. PIERCE:

Dear Sir—Your Favorite Prescription has restored me to perfect health. Yours truly,

SANTA CLAUS.

THE first institution named for New York's patron saint was the St. Nicholas Society, organized in 1835; next the famous SAINT NICHOLAS HOTEL, opened in 1853. Then the St. Nicholas Club, instituted in 1875; and, finally, the chef d'œuvre of children's magazines. The hotel has a fine painting of Santa Claus, loaded with Christmas presents, which always attracts much attention, and is pleasantly indicative of the comfort and good cheer always found within its hospitable walls.

It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. The New York Tribune.

THE TRIBUNE is conceded by eminent men in this country and Europe to be "THE LEADING AMERICAN NEWSPAPER." It is now spending more labor and money than ever before to deserve that pre-eminence. It secured, and means to retain it, by becoming the medium of the best thought and the voice of the best conscience of the time, by keeping abreast of the highest progress, favoring the freest discussion, hearing all sides, appealing always to the best intelligence and the purest morality, and refusing to cater to the tastes of the vile or the prejudices of the ignorant.

Premiums for 1879-'80---Extraordinary Offers.

THE TRIBUNE has always dealt liberally with its friends who have used their time and influence in extending its circulation, but it now announces a Premium List surpassing in liberality any heretofore offered by any newspaper. We take pleasure in calling attention to the following:

THE LIBRARY OF UNIVERSAL KNOWLEDGE,

Being the last (1879) edition of CHAMBERS'S ENCYCLOPEDIA, a Dictionary of Universal Knowledge for the People, complete and Unabridged, with large editions upon topics of special interest to American readers, in twenty volumes, the first fourteen comprising the exact and entire text of Chambers's Encyclopedia, omitting only the cuts, and the last six containing several thousand topics not found in the original work, besides additional treatment of many there presented. This portion is designed to meet the special wants of American readers, supplying the natural deficiencies of the English work.

The twenty volumes will actually contain over 12 per cent. more matter than Appleton's Cyclopedia, which sells at eighty dollars!

Two of the volumes are now ready for delivery, the third is in press and will be ready in a few days, and then they will be issued at the rate of two volumes per month until the entire twenty volumes are completed, which will be about August or September, 1880.

We offer this valuable work on the following terms:

For $12.—THE LIBRARY OF UNIVERSAL KNOWLEDGE, 20 vols., substantially bound in cloth, and THE WEEKLY TRIBUNE 5 years to one subscriber.

For $18.—THE LIBRARY OF UNIVERSAL KNOWLEDGE, 20 vols., as above, and THE SEMI-WEEKLY TRIBUNE 5 years.

For $18.—THE LIBRARY OF UNIVERSAL KNOWLEDGE, 20 vols., as above, and ten copies of THE WEEKLY TRIBUNE, one year.

For $27.—THE LIBRARY OF UNIVERSAL KNOWLEDGE, 20 vols., as above, and twenty copies of THE WEEKLY TRIBUNE, one year.

For $26.—THE LIBRARY OF UNIVERSAL KNOWLEDGE, 20 vols., as above, and the DAILY TRIBUNE, two years, excluding Sunday edition.

The books will in all cases be sent by mail, express or otherwise as the subscriber may direct, at his expense, but with no charge for packing. We shall begin sending them in the order in which subscriptions have been received on the 1st of January, 1880, when certainly five and probably six volumes will be ready, and shall send thenceforward, as subscribers may direct.

A MAGNIFICENT GIFT!

$30 for a single three-years' subscription in advance to THE DAILY TRIBUNE, excluding Sunday edition.

For one dollar extra for postage the Dictionary can be sent by mail to any part of the United States.

Ten copies, 1 year, each	2.00	Ten copies, 1 year, each	1.00
And one free copy for every ten subscribers.		And one free copy for every ten subscribers.

When the fact is considered that THE WEEKLY TRIBUNE, both in the quantity and the quality of its reading matter, is the equal of any, and the superior of most of the $3 and $4 literary and religious papers, and that THE SEMI-WEEKLY contains twice as much reading matter every week as THE WEEKLY, this reduction in price is one of the most notable instances of journalistic enterprise.

Remittances should be made by Draft on New York, Post-office Order, or in Registered Letter. Address,

THE TRIBUNE, New York.

KNOW THYSELF.

THE untold miseries that result from indiscretion in early life may be alleviated and cured. PLAY IN HEARTS.

BY MRS. ANN S. STEPHENS.

CHAPTER I.

"JULIA!" A girl who was standing on the top of an old garden-wall, picking plums from a tree laden down with the purple fruit, peeped archly through the leaves and hurled a plum at one of the handsomest young fellows you ever saw, who caught it dexterously between his two hands, and repeated the name as if he liked the sound of it better than the fruit, with all that purple bloom upon it.

"Julia!"

"Well! Do you want another? If you do, reach up and help yourself," answered the girl, with a mischievous laugh upon her lips and a flood of rich crimson in her cheeks.

Here she bent down a branch already drooping under its ripe burden almost to the young man's reach, where she held it convenient for plucking.

"There, will that content you?"

"No, indeed, nor anything else, till you become a little more in earnest," answered the young man, pushing the branch on one side. The girl laughed, and slanted a basket that she had fastened into a fork of the tree, that he might observe how full it was.

"Could any girl living work more earnestly than that? Why, it's so heavy that I shall have to call for help to get it down."

The young man's eyes brightened and his face flushed.

"Do you mean that for me?" he cried out, swinging himself up to the top of the wall, and, with an audacious pretense of steadying himself, throwing one arm around the waist of that pretty temptress.

She struggled to free herself, ashamed of the challenge he had accepted so promptly, and got up a little feigned anger that was wonderfully becoming.

"No; I didn't mean you, of course. Who could dream of such a thing? Besides, the basket isn't quite full yet."

"Exactly; that is the reason I climbed up here to help you."

"Then, why don't you busy your hands with the plums, or, at any rate, let me."

"Because I have got you for once where it is difficult to run away, as you did the other night, and I want to talk a little before we fall to work."

"What, standing here with nothing but this shaky old wall under us?"

"Yes; I rather like it."

Well he might—the handsome rogue—for Julia really was a little uncertain in her foothold, and clung to him in spite of herself, trembling somewhat and blushing a great deal.

"No; not here! Only think what a picture we should make if any one came by," she pleaded.

"But you must listen to me. It isn't fair to put me aside in this way, when you know——"

"I don't know anything about it—only this—you are making me ridiculous—and—and—yourself too. It's ungenerous."

The girl was in earnest now, for her voice trembled and her eyes were full of tears.

"Yes, it is ungenerous!" exclaimed the young fellow. Then, relinquishing his hold upon her very gently, and leaping to the ground, he seemed about to go away, but thought better of it, and, returning, held out his arms.

"If you are not very angry with me, Julia, come down and I will beg your pardon."

The girl, whose heart had stopped beating when her lover seemed about to depart, held to a branch of the tree with one hand, brushed the tears from her eyes with the other, and looked down upon him half-smiling. He was such a fine young fellow, standing there with his head thrown back, his arms extended and the sunlight glinting over the waves of his raven hair, that any girl would have smiled upon him, spite of herself.

"Don't be afraid; I will take care of you," he said, with such confidence that she forsook her hold on the branch and leaped into his arms.

He held her a single moment to his heart with such tender reverence that she could not even pretend to be angry with him.

A wooden bench had been placed under the plum-tree, and to this young Bruce had attempted to draw her; but Julia was a born coquette, and, once on the ground, her first impulse was to torment him.

"Dear me, you have forgotten the basket of plums," she cried.

"You will wait for me?" said Bruce, a little doubtfully.

"Oh, yes; how can I help it?" she answered, with the seriousness of a little martyr bound to one spot by force.

Bruce climbed the fence again, and came down laden with her harvest of fruit.

"Now," he said, placing himself beside her on the bench, "everything is quiet and pleasant here; we can have a serious talk, and no one the wiser. Now, look about the old garden, and tell me does it not remind you how long it is since we were engaged? Why, this very tree was but just out of blossom. Don't you remember, dear?"

The girl turned her beautiful face away, that he might not see the mischief in it while she answered him.

"Oh, yes! I remember very well. You would give me no peace till I made a little goose of myself; but, please don't keep reminding me of it."

Still the girl looked another way, and refused to meet the startled and suddenly reproachful eyes turned anxiously upon her.

"Will nothing ever be settled between us?" he said.

"Settled; of course not. Why, I haven't got used to the engagement-ring yet; besides, I want time to consider."

"But you have had months for that, if you had only cared to count them. Why, the roses were in their glory all over the veranda there, and the dear old garden was full of white lilies. I really do not wonder that some people almost worship white lilies. From that time I have adored them."

The young lover's face was all aglow with remembered happiness, and his fine eyes, suffused with tender devotion, sought an answering look from its object; but she was stooping downwards, with one hand in the basket, and withdrew it with a plum, rich with purple bloom, in her fingers. While he was talking of the lilies she buried her white teeth in the fruit, and seemed to give herself up to the enjoyment of it.

"Yes," she said, "they are delicious!"

Bruce looked at her doubtfully. He really could not decide whether she was thinking of the languid beauty of lilies or the fruit that had left the flavor in her mouth.

"But you see how the year has changed," he said, looking around at the old-fashioned garden, where chrysanthemums and asters soberly filled the beds that had been ablaze with tulips and peonies, and across to the verandas of a fine old country-house, where the Virginia creepers were turning from green to scarlet.

"Are you vexed because we have not changed also?" questioned the girl, demurely, wicked in her coquetry.

"Changed!" exclaimed Bruce. "Changed! That is impossible—at least, to me."

The girl shook her head, and pretended to sigh.

"We are so young," she said.

Bruce could not speak at once; the thought she had suggested took away his breath.

"I know," he said, at last, with pain in his voice, "I am four years older than you are."

"Four years and six months. Of course, a man of that age, just short of six feet high, must know his own mind."

"I fancy some men twenty-four years old with the months you speak of thrown in, may possibly change their minds, but I am not of the number. When a man offers his heart he pledges his honor."

"Honor! I wonder if any woman ever wanted to hold a man by his honor when his inclinations changed?"

That provoking young creature spoke thoughtfully, as if the subject had been one of anxious deliberation to her. Then she lifted those heavenly blue eyes to his with an innocent look, apparently expecting him to solve the matter for her.

"I suppose men do not mind much when a poor girl happens to discover that she has made a bitter mistake, because she goes by feelings and doesn't think so much about honor."

Bruce did not speak—he could not. Her words came upon him with a shock that quite unmanned him. The girl gave one glance at his changing countenance, and a smile quivered about her lips as she dropped her head again. Now, that young creature could not have rudely broken the stem of a flower without feeling that she had hurt it, but her little fluttering heart rather enjoyed the anguish in that handsome face. Indeed, vanity is often more cruel than wrath, and sometimes works greater harm.

Bruce stood up wounded, but manly in his pain. "I had thought," he said, with a thrill of disappointment in his voice, "of asking you to name Christmas as our wedding-day."

"Christmas! Why, Mr. Easton, what on earth possessed you to think of that! I am sure nothing that I ever said gave you a right. Indeed, I am not certain—I—I want more time to make up my mind."

"With that upon your finger?" said Bruce, pointing to a fine solitaire diamond that flashed on the hand which was waved slightly as if to repulse him.

"There is but one kind of ring that cannot be easily taken off," said Julia, half-slipping the diamond from her finger. "Can you blame me for hesitating to put it on?"

"I can blame you for nothing, Julia; you have been too dear for that. Forgive me if I have been importunate."

"You are not angry with me, Bruce. You know one is not always——"

The girl hesitated, relenting; but with the vanity fiend still busy at her heart.

"Always mistress of her own heart," said Bruce, accepting her hesitation according to his fears. Heaven forbid that I should ever ask or take the love that is not freely given.

He turned to go, grieved to the soul, but too proud for expostulation or entreaty. The girl's heart sank and her color paled.

"But—but you spoke about Christmas," she faltered.

"I know it—forgive me—I was too hopeful."

"Of course I forgive you, but——"

Julia was trying her best to recall her lover without sinking her own pride in the attempt, but she could not command language, and said this with the air of an empress forgiving the fault of a subject. This stung his pride, and he turned away.

"I have my answer, and will go," he said; but his heart misgave him, and he turned slowly back.

"Did you come back for this?"

What possessed the girl? A moment before she would have given ten years of life to see him return, but now a faint, nervous laugh broke from her, and, drawing the engagement-ring from her finger, she held it up, flashing like a tiny coal of fire.

Bruce saw nothing else, or that look, half-audacious, half-frightened, would have been a revelation to him.

"If you do not care to keep it," he said, coldly, reaching out his hand.

The girl drew back, clutching her fingers

PLAY IN HEARTS.—"'I HAVE MY ANSWER, AND WILL GO,' HE SAID; BUT HIS HEART MISGAVE HIM, AND HE TURNED SLOWLY BACK."

over the gem, as if the last spark of her life were burning in it.

Bruce did not see this, for his eyes were clouded with mist, that might well become tears when he was quite alone, and he still reached out his hand, as blind men grope for objects in the dark; but he started, as if a blow had been struck him, when the diamond fell into his palm.

"You will not go off hating me?" said the girl.

"No."

"We—we can be friends yet?"

Bruce answered with a scornful laugh.

"That is the usual form, I am told; toss a man's love back to his keeping with a laugh, and ask him to mold it into friendship. Oh, yes, we shall be excellent friends, no doubt—say before Christmas Day."

Hurling these sharp words behind him, the young man strode across that old-fashioned garden almost blindly, trampled down the Autumn flowers in his path as the girl out yonder, gazing after him with wide-open, troubled eyes, seemed to have trampled on his heart.

CHAPTER II.

A PRIM, elderly lady was gently swaying herself in a rocking-chair on the front veranda when Bruce Easton came around a corner of the house and was making for the front gate without observing her presence. The excitement under which he labored was so evident that the good woman dropped her hands, still holding the two long ivory needles, with which she was fabricating a shawl for Winter, upon the heap of scarlet worsted in her lap, and called out to him:

"Why, Bruce, what has come over you? Rushing by one in that fashion, and not a word to say."

Bruce turned back, tried to smile, and stammered something that he intended for an apology.

"You have seen Julia," remarked the good lady, who was called Aunt Hannah by half the neighbors, "and——"

"Yes, Aunt Hannah, I have seen her; and, instead of naming Christmas as the day, here is her engagement ring."

Bruce unclosed his hand, exposing the ring.

"Ah!" said Aunt Hannah, raising her ivory needles, and shaking up the scarlet web in her lap before she went to work again. "You have been really quarreling."

"Yes, in dead earnest, for once," answered the young man, bitterly enough. "She is tired of the whole thing."

"And you?" questioned Aunt Hannah. "Come, now, tell me all about it."

Bruce sat down on the steps of the veranda, and gave the good lady a brief but very fair account of his interview with her niece under the plum-tree. More than once, when he looked into her face for some of the resentment that filled his own bosom, he saw that a smile was quivering around her lips.

"You think I have been precipitate, Aunt Hannah?" he broke forth, stung by her want of feeling.

"No."

"Foolish, then?"

"Oh, no; it was full time things were settled or broken off."

"Well, they are broken off, you see."

"That would be a great pity, Bruce—to me almost a calamity, for I had set my heart on having you in the family. The property joins so nicely, and I have long wanted a smart young fellow to manage for me. No one else will ever answer. But Julia is unmanageable as a wild bird; being an only child, my poor brother spoiled her terribly. No princess was ever brought up with more lofty ideas of herself; and since she has been in a sort of way adopted here, poor child—for her father left her nothing but the memory of his devoted love—I haven't improved matters much. She is a dear, sweet, wayward creature—I mean to an old woman like me, who sees her faults but cannot find the heart to punish them."

Bruce could not talk patiently of the girl who had so cruelly wounded him. He arose to go.

"Don't go! You mustn't be angry and make things worse by keeping away from us," said Aunt Hannah. "The house wouldn't seem like home if you abandoned it. Of course my niece has done very wrong, and ought to be punished."

"No, no; not in my behalf."

"Besides," continued Aunt Hannah, "she isn't the only girl in the world, and that she will discover before my niece, Laura—on the mother's side, you know—has been here a fortnight—a splendid young creature. I really am proud of my niece, Laura Cummins. You must not abandon me now, for I am expecting her every day. Besides, you must not let a fickle girl drive you from the field. At heart she is all right."

"Yes, if her heart was mine; but it is not."

"What a hasty thing youth is," said Aunt Hannah, holding out her hand with a cordial smile. "At any rate I have not offended you."

Bruce took the hand and bent over it as if she had been an empress, for he was a graceful young fellow and did everything well.

"No, no; you have always been my friend."

That moment a carriage drove up to the front gate, and a bright female face looked out from the window.

"Dear me, it is Laura, now! Come and help her out. You see how impossible it is to spare you."

Aunt Hannah went down the broad path which led from the front door of her dwelling to the gate—a path bordered deeply with Autumn flowers, tall hollyhocks, marigolds and grand old-fashioned plants that are fast going out of sight about our New England houses.

Before they reached the gate a neatly gloved hand had been thrust through the open window, the carriage-door was flung open, a dainty French boot just touched the steps and a radiant young creature, in her traveling dress, laid her hand on the gate. Tall, slender, full of inimitable grace, she came towards them, her beautiful features beaming and her splendid eyes bright with gladness.

"Aunt Hannah! dear, dear aunt! How glad I am! How well you are looking. Come before I was expected, didn't I? But you always have a welcome for me. I—I beg pardon!"

Here Laura Cummins became conscious that a gentleman was present and stepped back, blushing a little and somewhat confused.

"Mr. Easton; our neighbor and friend," said Aunt Hannah.

The young lady seemed to comprehend the position at once. In fact, she had been in confidential correspondence with her aunt for months, so she reached out her hand and smiled into his face with a charm of greeting that brought a glow of pleasure to his heavy heart and disturbed the sense of desolation that had fallen upon it.

When Julia Mills, who had been aroused by the sound of carriage-wheels, came through the garden-door and stood in the hall which cleft the old mansion in twain, her first glance fell on those two, smiling upon each other, blushing, too, and apparently talking as if they had been friends for years. How beautiful this cousin was! What a grand couple they seemed, standing there in the mellow sunlight, with that great sheaf of crimson hollyhocks blooming beside them.

If Julia had intended to go out and meet her cousin, she gave up the idea at once. Turning to the stairs, she ran up them like a creature pursued, entered her own chamber, locked the door, and, casting herself down on the old-fashioned sofa, gave herself up to a fit of crying that no effort of hers could conquer.

Was the girl jealous? She did not know. Emotions of sorrow were new to her, and now that so many had been crowded into a single hour, she could not comprehend the agony of it.

Meantime, Aunt Hannah and her guest had gone up to the "spare chamber," that looked out upon the garden with its flower-beds, its vine-covered walls and its fruit-trees crowded into corners or drooping over the walls from an orchard beyond. The scent of ripe grapes and Fall-tinted leaves came in through the open windows, richer than the perfumes of Spring-time.

Laura took off her bonnet and traveling shawl, pushed back the thick light masses of hair from her temples with both hands, and threw herself into a great easy-chair, covered with old-fashioned white dimity, that stood near the window.

"Now, aunt, tell me all about it."

Aunt Hannah drew a seat close to the window, looked through to make sure that no one was in the garden, and was about to speak when something like a sob broke upon her from across the hall. This seemed to disturb her so much that she spoke low and earnestly, like one who had a great strain of anxiety on her mind.

Laura Cummins listened, with her beautiful eyes veiled sleepily under their white lids, and a smile coming and going about her mouth. Sometimes she leaned forward and laughed, sometimes she rolled the palms of her white hands together as if a keen sense of enjoyment had seized upon her. At last she started from her seat, took the old lady's head between both hands and kissed her.

"Bless your old heart—is that all?" she said. "I thought there was really something serious. There—there, don't say another word; I understand the whole affair. Why, Aunt Hannah, in our world we are playing with this kind of fire all the time. Now, just sit down again and listen to me, for I have got lots of things on my mind, and mean to tell you every one of them."

That dear old lady went out a moment, came back with both ivory knitting-needles in her hands, and the scarlet web tucked under one arm, ready to listen without loss of time. Thus a good hour passed, in which Laura lay back luxuriously in her great chair, talking melodiously, like a mountain brook, and Aunt Hannah listened, while her fingers flew in and out through those scarlet threads, and smiles now and then broke the anxious, sometimes repellent, expression of her face.

All this time Bruce Easton was on his way home, whipping off the heads of mullens and golden-rod with his cane from a footpath on the wayside, and sometimes giving a vicious kick to some harmless little boulder that happened to lie within reach of his foot. He was thinking over the events of that morning, and reflection by no means served to quell the sense of humiliation and wrong that had stung him from the first.

"Yes, I will take Aunt Hannah's advice. That cruel-hearted girl shall not drive me from a house that has been almost like home since I can remember. I will prove to her that she has neither humbled me nor broken my heart."

With this the young man made a terrible sweep with his cane, sent the imperial head of a great purple thistle flying over the rail fence, and walked on with the sensation of a man who had conquered something.

Poor Julia lay all this time sobbing among the chintz cushions of that old sofa, so penitent and miserable that she could not have found strength to tear up a snowdrop by the roots, much less disrown a thistle, bristling all over with thorns. Still, it would be very difficult to say which of these two persons was the most unhappy.

Really that old house seemed flooded with sunshine after Laura Cummins entered it, for, though Julia had broken her engagement, and was wretchedly unhappy, she kept up a brave appearance of satisfaction, even when Bruce came the next day and never mentioned the subject, but, while gentle and polite to her, gave all his attention to the cousin, to whom his call was evidently made. Indeed, these two seemed to have dropped into a pleasant acquaintance at first sight, and in less than half an hour they were out on the front-door yard, walking up and down the graveled path, talking earnestly. They paused now and then to gather some of the late flowers, from which she selected the choicest and fashioned into a tiny bouquet, holding it up that he might inhale the perfume before it was half finished.

Aunt Hannah sat in her rocking-chair under the reddening Virginia creepers and watched these proceedings complacently; sometimes smiling as she looked up from counting her stitches, as if the whole thing pleased her. After all, why not? These two nieces were all the relatives she had on earth to care for or divide her property between. If Julia chose to throw up all chances of doubling the estate and inheriting the old homestead by a marriage with Bruce Easton—as fine a young fellow as ever lived—surely there was no reason why Laura should not take her chances. Perhaps the old lady reasoned after this fashion and was well satisfied, while Julia sat behind the lace curtains in her own room, with red cheeks and burning eyes, watching each movement of the young couple till the heart in her bosom grew faint with pain—such pain as no one ever felt before, she really believed. The poor girl started up with clinched hands and locked teeth when she saw Cousin Laura attempting to fasten that pretty tuft of flowers in her old lover's button-hole. When he took it from her hands and put it inside his vest a great sob broke from her, and she began to race up and down the room like a shot antelope seeking some place in which to hide the agony of its wounds. Still the girl had a world of pride under all the girlish coquetry that had brought her to grief. She would not have had that beautiful cousin or her recreant lover—she could not help thinking him that—see a tear in her eye or hear a moan break from her bosom to have saved her own life. They should find that she could look on and see him drift away into a new love without seeming to mind it.

CHAPTER III.

JULIA had plenty of opportunities to test her strength during the bright October month that followed, for scarcely a day passed in which Bruce Easton and Laura Cummins were not seen together, cheerful and happy as the birds that still lingered among the rich gorgeousness of ripe leaves and the fruity odor of orchards, golden and red with heaped-up apples.

Aunt Hannah looked on complacently while they took long walks together, and it was no unusual thing for Bruce Easton to come riding up to her front gate on his fine bay saddle-horse, which was soon mated from the homestead stables; and Julia, who always refused to be one of the party, would see them ride away into that soft Indian Summer atmosphere evidently without a thought of the anguish she was so bravely hiding.

One day, when a sharp frost had turned half the green of the forests to blood-red or lined them with old gold tints, the young people had taken a long afternoon in the country, riding together in a slow idle fashion, as if a thorough understanding had been completed between them. It was pleasant in the woods, where the scent of frost-bitten ferns filled the air and "the sound of dropping nuts was heard" from the briery and star-shaped chestnut-burrs; so they walked their horses dreamily till the homestead came in view. Then Laura took off her gauntlet, reached out her hand, which Bruce held between both his for a moment, then raised it to his lips.

"Now, you will be faithful to this," she said, drawing on her glove. "There must be no wooing when I am gone."

"There will be none," was the answer, "for when you are gone I shall have no heart to remain."

A young girl down in a hollow, close by the chestnut-tree under which they had halted, heard this, dropped the rare leaves she had gathered, and stood among them mute and pale, like some lost spirit of the wood. Then she started, saw that no one was under the chestnut-tree, and fled along a sheltered foot-path home.

When Bruce and Laura rode up to the gate that girl was ready to meet them.

Laura came into the hall, after her drive in the fresh air that day, beautiful as a Hebe. Throwing her whip on the table, she drew off her gloves and lifted both hands to remove the hat which crowned her abundant hair. Then Julia saw a solitaire diamond blazing on her finger.

"Yes," said Laura, smiling, "it is our engagement-ring. On Christmas Day I am coming here to be married if Aunt Hannah will let me. Will you be my bridesmaid, Julia?"

"I—I—— Oh, yes, with pleasure. Why not?"

The next moment Julia was running up the stairs breathless. She could not have remained under those bright, happy eyes another minute to have saved her life.

Dreary, dreary—ah, how dreary were the weeks that followed! Laura had gone back to New York to prepare for her wedding. Bruce Easton was away, and the old homestead seemed worse than deserted. Aunt Hannah was quiet, and seemed entirely unconscious that her calm was not shared by the young creature, who began to droop now like the frost-bitten flowers that had perished in the woods, where the winds whistled through naked branches now and dead leaves filled all the hollows.

Letters came from Laura—happy, cheerful letters, that made Julia turn faint as she read them. The wedding-dress was ordered, she wrote—white satin, with a splendid embroidery of Mechlin and pearl beads—two dresses, in fact, for Aunt Hannah wished her nieces to be dressed alike; so Julia need have no trouble. Everything would be prepared for the bridesmaid as well as the bride.

Yes, Julia would wear the dress and try to look beautiful in it. They should not find her a pale, heartbroken creature, if pride could burn her cheeks with color or keep her lips from trembling.

The night before Christmas Eve Laura arrived at the homestead, and it was known that Bruce Easton and a young city man, who was to stand up with him, were at the Easton Place.

Julia knew that these persons would be at the homestead during the evening, and made a grand effort to receive them regally. She was standing before her glass, arrayed in the soft blue fabric that Bruce had loved to see her wear, fastening a cluster of roses in the lace of her corsage, when the door-bell rang; and she heard his step in the hall—only his, for those of the stranger passed for nothing with her. A swift glance in the glass revealed a face and form that satisfied even her feverish desire for the beauty that should smite her old lover with regret. With burning cheeks and eyes star-like with excitement, she went down.

The hand was burning when Bruce took it, but her lips were wreathed with smiles. She greeted the strange young man cheerfully. She fairly took the honors of the house from Aunt Hannah's hands. Never in her life had the girl sung with such passionate sweetness as she did that night; never had she conversed so well. In truth, Laura for once felt herself eclipsed. She grew serious, and, as time wore on, seemed most thoughtful of the two, and after a while begged to be excused. She was very tired and would go to her room.

Aunt Hannah went with her, and the two young men took their leave. Then Julia gave way. Seated on a low chair before that bright hickory-wood fire, she drooped forward, covered her face with both hands, and moaned piteously. Tears broke through her fingers, and she rocked to and fro, giving herself up to bitter anguish.

Then a shadow, more dark than those flickering from the firelight, crossed from the softly-opened door, and Bruce stood behind her chair.

"Julia."

The girl started up, her cheeks all aflame; her eyes full of fire.

"You here?" she said, pointing her quivering finger to the door. "Your bride has gone up-stairs."

"No; that is young Bigelow's bride. I have come to entreat for a double-wedding to-morrow night. Will you refuse me again, Julia?"

"You—you gave her my engagement-ring."

"No, no. I never did that. It was Bigelow's ring she put on that day for the first time."

"But you love her?"

"No, no; she is my friend, your friend. If she has seemed to be anything else, it was with a kindly intent to show us our own hearts and bring us together."

"But—but Aunt Hannah?"

"The dear old lady was in the conspiracy with her niece from the first; her heart is set on our being married to-morrow. The wedding-dress is here, veil and all."

The girl stood a moment shaken by a rush of wild, sweet emotions. Her eyes filled with tears; her arms trembled as she held them out.

"Oh, Bruce, how could you?"

* * * * * * *

The church was a picture that Christmas Eve. It had got abroad that a double wedding would be solemnized, and great efforts had been made to embellish the old edifice. Loads of ground pine, spruce, hemlock and crimson sumach-cones and golden clusters of bitter-sweet were woven into great garlands and wreathed around galleries and pillars. The reading-desk was one mass of white flowers: through them all glowed the crimson of velvet draperies and a star-like glow of light.

When those two brides turned from the altar, leaning on their young husbands, a burst of music seemed to throb and tremble through the garlands, and never did hallelujahs to God ring through the sacred building as they did that night.

MARTHA JACOBI.

BY F. W. ROBINSON.

THIS is a true story. I, Martha Jacobi—a woman who was never to be trusted, people said, and whose word was never worth much—vouch for every syllable I utter. This may be the death-bed of one of God's unfortunates, for what I know or care, and I am not likely to die with a lie in my mouth. If you do not believe me, it matters but little, and affects me not at all. It is not my story I am going to relate, although I look back at an unlucky past to explain who I was, and how the cruel days dragged on and left me here. It is a story of other lives and temptations, and it is upon my mind. Lying thus bedridden, and helpless, for good or evil, it weighs me down, and I must speak of it.

I was forty-five years of age when I left the Fulham Refuge for service with the Mayfields. They had been forty-five strange, wicked years to me, and I was glad to turn my back upon them. I had been more than once in prison, and had been more than once sorry for the sins which I had committed. "This is the last time," I had always said when my prison days were over; and "This is the very last," I protested when the Refuge had given me a good word, and there had come to my unprofitable life another chance. At forty-five, I had learned something of what was right—before then I had guessed at it, and followed wrong as easier work for me.

They were a young couple, those Mayfields—they had not been married three months when I entered their service. They had known trouble quickly after their wedding-day. There are some people born unto it, and the Mayfields were two of them. In three months they had dropped like a stone from good luck to bad—reckoning in the honeymoon as well. Arthur Mayfield had held a responsible post as "buyer" in a wholesale city house, and on the strength of his position, his future, he married for love. He had been four weeks on his wedding tour, when the news came that his firm had failed—"smashed up" for hundreds of thousands, carrying away other firms in the great crash, and sending a little army of old servants adrift on the world.

Arthur Mayfield went adrift with the rest, and reached not the shore again. He had saved a little money—a few hundreds—and this sum came in handy, and enabled him to keep up an appearance for a while, and to wait more patiently than clerks less lucky than he had had the power to do. He had hoped to step into a similar position to that which he had lost; but the opportunity came not, and an ugly rumor got abroad that he had known of many doubtful transactions of the firm, and helped in them after his fashion. This he denied always. I have heard him protest to his wife against the scandal, and curse those who had set it afloat; protest to himself even when pacing up and down his little drawing-room like a wild beast in his den. I believe he was a thoroughly honest young man at that time, although I was a bad judge of what was honest.

He and his wife were both religious folk, who went regularly to church and dealt in long graces before meals, after the fashion of their parents before them, I suppose. I had turned "good," but I did not like too much of this—it embarrassed me, and reminded me of the prison chaplain, droning away daily and wearying us to death. I was never religious—I never got religious, not even when the lady superintendent of the Refuge—I say God bless her for that—told me she would trust me again with all her heart, and advised others to trust me. The Mayfields took me away to their honest home, saying: "Come with us, Martha; we know what misfortune is, and we sympathize with it—especially with such hard misfortune as yours."

"A misfortune brought about by my own hands—my own sheer badness, madam," I confessed to the young wife when I was duly installed in her service.

"No matter now, if you are penitent—is it?"

"No."

"And no one to blame but yourself—no one dragged down by you or with you; that should surely be some consolation, Martha!"

"I dare say it is—I don't know," I answered.

"My poor stolid woman, but you do know in your heart," said Mrs. Mayfield, placing her two fair hands upon my shoulders, shaking me and looking laughingly into my face, "and you will be all the happier for your knowledge some day."

"I shall never be happy—I don't deserve to be. I don't want to, ma'am."

"There, that will do," she said, running away. "I will not argue with you any more; I will send Arthur to you instead."

"Oh, please, no!"

"She laugbed again; she know I was afraid of Arthur—that was her husband—and of his prayers, many of which were launched at me, I was certain. Not but that I liked the man a little—for his wife's sake more than his own, probably—for anything that she loved I was bound to like, loving her so much myself. She was the one woman who had thought any good of me, and I was grateful.

I dare say I should have respected this Arthur Mayfield more, had he been less in the way, and more out of the house. Being always at home, he interfered with home too much, and became a "coddle" by degrees; telling me what to do, and what to leave undone, more like the mistress than the master. In the old days—the bad old days—I should have run at at him with a knife; but though he tried my temper, I wouldn't let him see it, or his wife know it. I was always "comfortable," I said; and I had learned to see, as months and months went on, that they were not—and that trouble was creeping on toward them.

When they thought I was in bed, instead of listening on the stairs to learn what was the matter, they talked of their ill-fortune, their expenses, the money melting away in the bank, the bad times in the city; and it was always the woman who cheered up the man, and who would not look at the dark side of things, but prophesied the sunshine—which never came, however, such devil's luck some people have.

Arthur would brighten up at last, and believe in her.

"Yes, it's a long lane which has no turning, Jenny," he would say, taking her in his arms and kissing her, "and we have a few pounds yet in the money-box. And presently, to make our hearts rejoice—perhaps to turn our luck—the baby, Jennie!"

"I—I thought, Arthur, you might fancy the baby would be—a leetle—expensive for us just now. I hope you don't," she murmured.

"It will be a comfort—a blessing—God's blessing on our happy marriage."

"My own dear husband!" cried Jennie Mayfield, rapturously.

I had listened enough—I went up-stairs with a choking, gasping feeling at my heart and throat—there was a meaning in their words which stabbed me terribly. I thought that night that I would run away from them, that I ought to tell them everything, or go—and then that I could never say one solitary word, or they would hate and loathe me.

But I staid with them; and a month or two after this, their little baby-boy was born.

Then came more trouble—an awful trouble for a while, for the young wife's life was despaired of; and the doctor, and the physician who came twice in his pair-horse carriage and took away their money for an opinion that everybody had, said there was no hope and she must die. She recovered, though; she was saved as by a miracle; and it was like one, to see her down-stairs again for the first time—in her old place by the fireside—a woman risen from the dead.

This was four or five months after her confinement—four or five months of heavy expenses, hired nurses, doctors' bills, physicians' fees, and nourishing food; and there was no begrudging money—rather a lavish casting it away—in the hope to save the wife. The hope came, and Jenny Mayfield was spared.

The baby had been christened Paul. In the mother's delicate state of health, it had become necessary to wean it a few weeks after its birth, and the greater portion of the care of the child devolved upon me.

They were not afraid to trust me—they would not have known what to do without my love and forethought, they said—they hoped the time would come when they would be able to show substantially their gratitude to good, honest, faithful Martha—as they called me! They knew well enough, for there was no hiding it away, that I loved the little child—that it was a mad love, more like the mother's than the nurse's, and stronger, too; but they did not know that I had killed my baby years and years ago, when I was scarcely more than a child myself, and been put in prison for it, and suffered long and justly. I had thrown mine in the river, in despair and madness; and this was like the child again—blue eyes, fair hair; my sin come back to life, and to be loved now with all my poor, dark soul's great strength.

They called it "Martha's baby," jestingly, whilst the mother lay weak, and the father was praying on his knees; and strange it was, perhaps, that to my innermost conviction came the assurance that I was most loved by the baby, most needed—the only one, thank God, with power to soothe its restlessness, and change it into smiles.

How proud I was of this!—how I began to think that this was forgiveness for my past offense, my ticket-of-leave, by Heaven's will, at last. I did not know—I could not see—that this was Heaven's extra punishment. I was content to know that the baby loved me best of them all—I knew I loved it best, and that the mother's love, deep as it might be, was nothing to my own. This was the one fleeting glimpse of a happy, peaceful home-life which I had ever had, and it turned my brain to be a part of it.

The boy grew brave and strong. With the odds against him from the first, Paul flourished and waxed fat; at one year and eight months of age he was the handsomest, brightest, healthiest of children. Oh, how I loved him! How jealous I was in my heart even of his mother, and yet I loved the mother, too—and would have died for either of them willingly—for the boy too willingly, to save him an hour's pain, or a day's sickness, had the choice been offered me.

"This is wrong, Martha—this is idolatry; you must not think like this of Paul, or I shall send him away," said Mrs. Mayfield, growing alarmed, perhaps jealous, at some extravagance of affection which I had shown.

I was on my guard from the moment of that reproof; I was suspected of too much love for the child, and it would be necessary to disguise it, lest I should set the mother against me. I did not show my affection so much in the parents' presence now; there was plenty of opportunity to love him. The boy was always happy with me, always seeking old Martha out for his companion.

He was twenty months old, I have said. In all those months luck had not come to the Mayfields; the husband had not earned a single penny, and the wife had remained an invalid, eternally propped up by pillows in her chair, feigning to wear bright looks and happy smiles, and prophesying still of fairer times, to keep her husband from wholly giving up.

I knew the money was nearly all gone. Arthur Mayfield had pitched some of it away in a mad dash at the Stock Exchange, and had bought the wrong stock, I think they said, and lost by it; misfortune glowered upon them steadily. Tradesmen were more chary of trusting them; there was a heap of unpaid bills upon the mantelpiece, and I missed things out of the house that came not back again, and upon which it had become necessary to raise money for immediate requirements.

It was said at last that I must go; they were unable to pay my wages, and my mistress—my poor sick mistress, scarcely able to crawl from one room to another even yet—thought herself strong enough to do the household work.

I did not leave them because there was no money to be paid me; I begged to be allowed to remain in the one home I had known. I prayed hard not to be cast adrift. I brought them all the money I had had of them, and saved for them, and asked them to take it in earnest of my gratitude. I moved them to tears and to a consent that I should stay whilst it was possible.

It was surely ordained that I should stay a while, for that very evening little Paul met with a serious accident; he had nearly severed his wrist with the broken glass of a picture, and there was fresh grief for the parents and me, and much concern till the blood was stanched and the wound stitched up by a surgeon. He was not well again very quickly; it had been an ugly wound, within an ace of killing him, and there was a deep scar on his dimpled wrist, over which I grieved, because it was an ugly mark which he would carry to his grave.

I was as foolish over this scar as a doting mother might have been over an only daughter whose beauty she would have had without spot or blemish, and to whom a scratch was a serious defect.

I was content when the boy was well and strong again—at two years of age he was the picture of health and childish beauty. His mother had grown to be almost as proud of him as I was, and I began to fret a little because she made more fuss over him, and he turned, childlike, more to her and less to me. Still, I was his nurse and comforter. Once a day I was always his companion, taking him for a walk in the parks, which were close to our street in Chelsea, where we lived. He was not likely to lose all his love for old Martha with Martha to watch and tend him as she did.

The boy was invariably well-dressed; there was still money for him. I saw to that myself. When I gave up my earnings to the Mayfields, and bought their gratitude by the sacrifice, I kept something back for Paul, and there was always ready a smart ribbon for his neck, bright steel buckles for his shoes, or a feather for his hat; and the mother was too ill to wonder much about them, or where they came from.

I do not think my taste was very refined. I had the love of the lower orders for bright colors; but, if I decked him out too gaudily, it attracted the notice of the passers-by, and the boy's beauty won their admiration if his costume shocked their taste occasionally. I was content; I liked him noticed; I was very, very proud of all the attention he received.

One afternoon in Kensington Gardens he received an extra attention which I am never likely to forget. Two gentlemen came along together, both walking slowly, one with his hands behind him and trailing a cane along the gravel, as he listened to the conversation of the other. The man who was listening glanced towards us as we passed, caught the arm of his companion, and dropped his cane upon the path.

"Good God, Baumann! look at that child!" was the exclamation which startled me as well as his companion.

I glanced down, fearful that something had happened to my boy without my knowledge; but little Paul was tottering toward the cane, the head of which I saw was strangely jewelled, and sparkling with diamonds in the sun.

"Paul," I cried, "you must not——"

"Let the child pick it up," said the man who had dropped the cane. "I am very fond of children."

The first part of this speech was spoken harshly and authoritatively. The second, after a moment's pause, suavely, and by way of an excuse. They were both foreigners, by their strange accent; the one who had spoken last was a thin man, prematurely gray; the other was tall, robust, and swarthy, with an immensely long mustache, which touched his shoulders, and was hideous in my sight. This was he who was still glaring at the child so strangely that I became afraid.

Paul picked up the stick, and I, anxious to be gone, said, "Give it to the gentleman, Paul—there's a good boy; and now let us make haste—mamma will wonder what has become of us."

The younger and taller man stood watching us, and twisting the ends of his mustache with his gloved hand. I could see his eyes wandering from the child to his companion, and then askance from his companion to me. The thin, gray man's hand was trembling as he received the cane from the hand of the child, and he said, in a husky voice:

"What is your name—Paul?"

"Ea—Paul," was the reply, confident and unabashed.

"Paul what, my fine fellow? Who is the father of this child?" he added, turning suddenly to me, and with a singular evidence of importance in his inquiries; "where does he live—what——?"

"What does it matter?" interrupted the other, with a hearty laugh. "Let us get on. These English children are all alike—fat, healthy, handsome cherubs, who lose everything but their fat as they grow up, I think. Let us get on, please—they will be waiting for us. You forget."

"Ah! yes, I forget."

The two men walked on, and I observed that the taller man drew the hand of his companion through his arm as if to lead him away, or to give him support if it were needed. I was puzzled by the manner of these two gentlemen, until I was in the Fulham Road, not many streets from home. Here they were both painfully brought to my remembrance again, for suddenly, as if he had risen from the ground, the dark man with the long mustache was standing at my side.

"I beg your pardon for troubling you, my good woman," he said, "but do you remember my friend speaking to you and this child?"

I jumped at his voice so close to my ear, looked hard at him, and felt at once distrustful. How was that—and so soon? How was it that to my unimpressionable heart there came the whisper of four words, "Be on your guard"? Is there some hidden, unknown feeling to warn us at times of danger, of a false friend, or a sure enemy? Is there a Fate, or not? I am too ignorant to know, but this man was like a Fate to me.

I shrank away from him; I drew the child quickly to the other side, placing myself between Paul and him, for no reason at which my fears could guess.

"I scarcely remember," I answered, sullenly; "so many people notice the child, and speak to him."

"Ah! well! It was in Kensington Gardens, over there."

"Very likely."

The man twisted his mustache, and looked down at me attentively. My hard, grim face was turned away, my eyes were steady, and keeping the path before me well in view; but I was watching him, for all this.

"The gentleman who was with me is a celebrated artist, and would be glad to sketch that boy, to introduce him into an historical picture—the likeness to the character which he wishes to portray being very striking. Do you think the parents would object if——"

"I am sure they would object," I said, interrupting him.

"Money would be no consideration, and one or two sittings would be sufficient. One sketch in the child's own home might do, even."

"The parents would not like anything of the kind," and I increased my pace, but the speaker did the same. I had grown terribly afraid of his persistence; I knew nothing of art or artists, and did not understand what he was saying, or believe in him. I saw in all this only an excuse, and this was strange.

"You cannot possibly know," he urged; "and perhaps a few pounds to the father, if poor——"

"His father is very proud."

"There is nothing derogatory in——"

"Good-day."

"Will you allow me to inquire for myself? Will you give me the address?"

"No," I answered, bluntly.

"You are a very obstinate woman, I am sorry to see. My friend has been two years searching for a face like that to copy," he continued; "and I have been searching with him. It is hard to lose a chance. If you only understood art, my good woman, you would sympathize with our pursuit. It is so slight a favor; and coming from so great an artist as my friend, it is a compliment, I solemnly assure you."

"I do not understand. Good-day."

"If five pounds now to you——"

"Let me alone. I have nothing more to say to you."

I turned and faced him, rigid and fierce at last, and he quailed at my fixed stare, raised his hat, as to a lady born, turned on his heel and went away.

I did not take the child straight home. I was sure he would watch me; I was sure he had made up his mind to find out where I lived. I crossed and recrossed the roads. I lost myself in a maze of turnings near the Chelsea Hospital; I looked behind me constantly, in fear of watchers; I turned the corners of the streets in haste, and then waited for my spies; but I was not followed, or they who followed were too cunning for me.

I reached home unperceived, I thought, and my mistress scolded me for being away so long. My excuse was not a ready one, and was received in silence. I feared to tell the truth, lest I should render her more nervous than myself, or she should suspect that I was going mad.

Presently I began to think I was too full of fancies to be completely sane; for the Autumn passed on to Winter, and still the man was on my mind, and the dark, glittering eyes shone out in the darkness of my dreams as though I were to be haunted by them till my dying day. It is not unlikely that my mind was a little strained at this period—I was unsettled. The picture of the oncoming troubles of my master and mistress was not pleasant to contemplate. The master had grown dull and thoughtful, and wore a moody look that was difficult to chase away; and the mistress—my dear young mistress—seemed fading slowly from this world. They both looked at me curiously, and I felt that they would broach the subject presently again of my dismissal from their service. I was one too many—I knew that, and a serious item in their expense, even with my hands open to help them, and shut against any money for my willing work.

It came as I expected; it was like a death-warrant! In November I received notice to leave them. I was told I must go, with many tears from the weak wife; I was even urged to go at once, as better for all, and less painful to me. It was explained that it was impossible they could afford any longer to keep me, and it was not just to themselves to do so.

"I will go, then," I said, after one or two vain remonstrances, and feeling that all remonstrances were vain. They had made up their minds now, and I could not beg too long, although my heart was breaking.

"We shall never forget your kindness, Martha," said the wife.

"And we hope one day to be able to repay it," added the husband.

"To have you back again with us presently, when the good times come for us, as they come to most folk who have the patience to wait," said Mrs. Mayfield.

"I will pray for the good times, then," I answered. "I know I shall not be liked in any other situation."

"You will not be long out of service. We are able to give you an excellent character, Martha," said Mr. Mayfield, "and good servants are scarce commodities, the papers say."

I did not answer him. I did not understand why he was almost in high spirits at my going away, as if I had been a weight upon his mind, and my absence would remove it.

"I may call and see the child?" I asked, turning to my mistress. "I could not live and not see little Paul."

There was a strange hesitation here that struck me—that bewildered me. The husband's face shadowed and his brow contracted as though I had insulted him by the appeal, and Mrs. Mayfield drew a deep, long breath and stared at me.

"Certainly, Martha," she said, however, "as often as you please."

Mr. Mayfield said not a word; he took up a book and feigned to be absorbed in its perusal; and I went away a discontented and suspicious woman, and Heaven knows why. Perhaps I was going mad, and they had seen the symptoms, and had grown afraid of me. That was the only solution to it all which I could guess at, and I was like a mad woman when it came to saying good-by to little Paul.

I broke down utterly. I wept, and raved, and scared the child away from me by my extravagance of grief, instead of feeling his arms round my neck, and his kisses on my worn, wet cheeks. It was only two days after I had gone that the mother told me he was fretting for his Martha; and the boy's grief was a comfort to me, though I grieved with him. Before the week was out I had seen little Paul twice; early in the next week I was there once more. I had obtained no new situation—I had not tried. I had settled down in a street close to theirs; and there it was likely I should remain until my last penny was spent. I told them this, and offered to work for them when they liked, and go back to my own room to my meals; but they would not listen to any proposition of the kind. It was putting too cruel an obligation on them, Mrs. Mayfield said, and she was sure that she was strong enough to do without a servant.

Then came another "cut" for me; I was not to call too frequently. It unsettled the boy; he could think of nothing else but my visits and the little presents which I brought him. It would be much the better plan to keep away for a fortnight or three weeks, they thought.

"Very well," I said again; "if I can keep away, I will. But I did not think, mistress, you would ever say as much to me."

"It is for Paul's sake. Arthur thinks it is right—it is." And then Mrs. Mayfield burst into tears, and begged me to go away. She was not strong enough to argue with me. If the boy missed me, or was very unhappy, she would send for me to come to him.

I kept away for three weeks. I did not even haunt the house, or the street in which the house was—I was too much afraid of meeting them, or giving them offense. At the end of that time I went to see them. I remember it was snowing fast and close on Christmas-time.

Mr. Mayfield opened the door, started, hesitated, and then said:

"Ah, Martha, come in for a moment. I was thinking of you to-day."

I went into the little front parlor, where there was no Mrs. Mayfield, and where there seemed signs of desolation—of a new emptiness, which I did not understand.

"I have some bad news for you, Martha," he said; "our little Paul is very ill."

"Paul ill?" I exclaimed; "and you did not send for me—did not let me know? Oh, Mr. Mayfield, why have you treated me like this?"

"Hush, hush! you must not make the least noise in the house now," he said, sternly. "Perfect peace is my poor boy's only chance."

"I will go to him."

"You will kill him directly. The least excitement or shock of surprise would kill him; he is very weak."

"And his mother?"

"Sits up with him night and day. He will have no one but his mother, Martha."

"He would be glad if I——"

"Not now," said Mr. Mayfield, interrupting me. "He is too ill to be disturbed even by your kindness."

"But—he will recover?"

"We hope so."

"Oh! I am sure so; he is so strong a boy—so healthy. What has changed him, and in so short a time?"

"Fever."

"Poor Paul! my poor, dear little flower! I may come to-morrow and ask about him?"

"If you wish," said Mr. Mayfield, graciously; "and if he is better, you shall see him."

"I thank you very much," I murmured.

But he was no better the next day, and the day following the white blinds were all down before the windows. I saw them as I came up the street. I leaned against the opposite wall and shook as with an ague. I tottered across the road and knocked. Mr. Mayfield opened the door again, and looked whiter and sterner than I had seen him yet.

"He is gone; he is dead, then," I cried; "and you have never let me come to him!"

"Yes, we have lost our poor boy," he answered, moodily.

"I must see him; you must not say 'No' to me again," I said, almost defiantly. "He was dearer to me than to you, I swear. He loved me better than his mother; I swear that, too; and you have let him die without me!"

"Martha, you excite yourself unnecessarily; you distress me; you will alarm my wife; you——"

"May I see the child?" I asked, peremptorily.

"Yes, you may," was the reply. "Poor little fellow! There is no disturbing him now."

I felt the tears rushing to my eyes. I was choking, and could not answer him.

"Here is my wife," he said; and through my blinding tears I saw my mistress glide in like a ghost.

"Jenny," he said to her, "here is poor old Martha, the first to offer her sympathy with our affliction."

"I am glad to see you, Martha," said my mistress, shaking hands with me. "It is kind of you to call."

She was very cold, and her voice was very hard—not broken down with grief as mine was, I thought fretfully.

"She wishes to see our boy."

"Now?" asked Mrs. Mayfield.

"Does it matter when?" said her husband. "Surely, our faithful Martha has a claim to see him first of all."

"Yes, yes—I think so," assented the wife. Then we all three went up-stairs into the darkened room, where he lay in his little bed.

"How long has he been dead?" I whispered, as I entered, and sank down upon my knees to gaze upon him.

"Not two hours yet," whispered Mrs. Mayfield, back to me.

"Are you sure he is dead?" I inquired.

Mrs. Mayfield gave a suppressed cry, and her husband stooped and looked into my face.

"Don't mock us—don't, even for a moment, have a thought like that," said the husband. "God's will be done!"

"God's will is done," I said in reply, "and a cruel will it seems to me."

"Martha!" said Mrs. Mayfield, reproachfully, "you forget."

"I say it seems to me," I answered; "but, then, I am wicked and ignorant, and can't see what is best."

I leaned over and kissed the cold little face—I put my arms round his neck and sobbed.

"Do you think he has changed at all?" asked Mr. Mayfield.

"No," I answered; "I can believe he will wake soon and speak to me."

We were silent, all three of us, for a while; presently the father said:

"Will you come away now, Martha?"

"Not yet."

"But——"

"I will not go yet," I said, very firmly; "and you cannot drag me from him."

"Well, well—for a little while longer, then," said Mr. Mayfield "until——"

The door was opening—there was a fourth person in the house. I looked up instinctively to see who this could be, who had had the privilege to stay here whilst I was kept away; and the face that peered round the door was that of the man who had stopped me in the streets and asked about poor Paul. I knew his wicked eyes and the long trailing mustache at once, and yet I did not scream or rave. I cowered down and hid my head. When I looked up again, only Mrs. Mayfield was in the room.

"My poor Martha! is it not time we went down-stairs?" she asked, gently. "Can this grief do you any good? Will you not think of sparing me a little?"

"Who was that?" I said, without heed to her inquiries—"that man?"

"What man?"

"You did not see any one?"

"No," said Mrs. Mayfield; "but I was sitting with my back to the door—Arthur will know, perhaps."

"Yes, he will know," I repeated; "but you have a visitor in this house?"

"No," said my mistress; "this has not been a time for visitors, surely?"

"Surely not."

I buried my head in the bedclothes again, but this time it was not with grief.

I wanted to work out all that was twisted round my brain in a thick, raveled skein—I wanted to think hard, and not go mad with thinking. That man!—what was he doing here?—what had he to do with my boy's death?

I looked up again. Mrs. Mayfield was sitting in a chair by the window with her thin hands spread before her face, and those hands were trembling very much. I looked from her to the dead child lying in its awful stillness and its marble beauty, and knowing nothing of our woman's griefs; I gazed at it till a new, strange, wild feeling came across me, and my sorrow was changed slowly to suspicion and dread. I became as cold as the little body lying in the bed—I stole my hand within, and felt for the small, rigid arm—I turned down the sheets with a quick movement and looked at the right wrist—then at the left, although I knew that it was on the right that Paul had been cut so desperately a few months since—and there was no scar on the smooth flesh!

"Mistress," I exclaimed, springing to my feet, "this is not Paul—this is not our boy!"

"Martha!" exclaimed Mrs. Mayfield, rising also from the chair, and clutching at the back for support, "how—how dare you frighten me like this—and talk like this—to me?"

"This is not Paul—it is not my darling—it is not like him now. Oh, what have you done with him—my God! what have you done with him?"

"I tell you——"

"I will not have you lie to me—you to whom I have looked up so long. Don't speak—don't say another word just now; but listen," I cried. "That is a strange child put there, and exchanged for Paul—a dead child is brought in, and the living one is given up to the man down-stairs—the wretch who would have tempted me with his money—who could only come here safely when I was turned away. I will tell all about it—no matter what it means—unless you give me back the child I loved. You must find him—he must come back, I say!"

Mrs. Mayfield dropped into the chair, and cowered from me now. Her husband entered; he had been startled down-stairs by the loud tones of my angry voice.

"What is the meaning——" he began.

"What is the meaning of this, Arthur Mayfield?—for this is not your son," I said.

"I protest against——"

"I proclaim to God that this not your son. I will tell the doctor—I will call in your neighbors—I will go to the nearest magistrate, and say there has been foul play—I will disgrace and ruin you, if you will not tell me where my Paul is. And if he is safe——"

"Well, if he is safe?"

"And in health—not done away with—I will say nothing to any living soul."

"I will tell you—for mercy's sake, don't think of betraying those who have been always kind to you."

"Where is the boy?"

"I have always trusted you as a friend—I have tried to make you love me, Martha, and to save you," murmured Mrs. Mayfield.

"Where is the boy?" I demanded, sternly, still.

"I do not know."

"What!"

"Pray be silent, and listen. As God is my judge, I do not know. Be satisfied as I am satisfied," said the husband, "and grieve with us, too, as we grieve for this."

"Go on—go on!" I cried, impatiently.

"Be assured with us, good Martha," said Mr. Mayfield, "that little Paul is well. It should be happiness to you, instead of grief, that it is not our darling lying there. Try and think so with us—will you?"

"Yes—I am glad. But who is this? and why have you given up the living for the dead?"

"I cannot tell you."

"It is not true. This is another lie!"

"It is the awful fact, Martha," said Mr. Mayfield, suddenly; "we do not know, and we shall never know, the whole reason of it all. We can but guess closely at the truth. With that child's death—and whose child it is Heaven knows—there should have passed away a grand inheritance, and it is very important that the death should not be suspected. Between the child and our Paul there was a marvelous resemblance, and the heir was sinking fast. They have replaced him by Paul—that is all I know."

"And they will not tell you where he is—at any time?"

"No—that will be to betray a great secret."

"To sell your own flesh and blood—you two!" I muttered.

"We were very poor—in another month we should have been starving in the streets," said Mr. Mayfield.

"You deserved to starve—you will starve yet!"

"No, not now. There was a heavy recompense, Martha, and it has saved us. And it has bettered little Paul's position."

"When I was a young woman, crushed by shame, I killed my baby," I said, sternly; "but I think yours is the greater crime, and you will suffer for it."

"You regard this too gloomily," said the husband.

"And the man who bought Paul was he who looked in just now?"

"Yes."

"And you trusted Paul with him?"

"Yes; I am sure he will be treated with every care to his life's end. We have been saved by that man—he has been princely in his gifts—he has left one hundred pounds for your silence, too—here it is."

"It is blood money—I will not touch it!" I cried; "it is the price of my lost darling's life and love—I will not take a penny of it."

"And you will betray us?"

"No—I can't do that."

I went away from them without another word. I only saw those poor, weak, tempted wretches once again. I heard that they were rich, and five years afterward they splashed me with their carriage-wheels, as I stood barefooted on the curbstones waiting to cross the muddy roadway. This is the fine moral of the story: They had prospered, and I was begging and stealing for my daily bread! I sank from bad to worse—I went back to my two old companions, drink and the devil—I lost all the good that was in me very quickly; only the sight of a little child would make me crying drunk at times. I got to prison again and again—to a long sentence finally, which I shall chent the judge out of, not having many days to live, I fancy.

The last shock was my death blow—it was a strange one, but it has sobered me for all time. I have seen my little Paul again. God let me live long enough to see him. I am as sure it was he as I am lying here past hope of life. Yes, it was my boy! though the matrons may think old Martha raving.

It was in the prison infirmary that I saw him—he came in softly, hat in hand, out of respect even to sick crime, and there followed him some half a dozen gentlemen, hats in hand also, with the lady superintendent of the prison, the deputy, and the officers, all bland, and complaisant, and white with nervousness and awe. He was seventeen or eighteen years of age, and very handsome—as I knew he would be; but they were the same features, I was sure, unless I was mad.

"This is the prison infirmary, your Highness," I heard the lady superintendent say.

He looked around at our prison beds, and then at me.

"And who is this?"

"This is Martha Jacobi—a woman who has been some twenty times in prison."

"Ill?"

"Very ill, your Highness."

"Poor woman!"

He put his right hand to his chin whilst he looked at me. I thought the scar was there still. Yes—it was there!

"What a life hers must have been, baron," said the prince, turning to a tall man at his side, at whom I now glanced for the first time, having had eyes only for Paul till then. Yes, there was no mistake. There was the man with the dark eyes and the long mustache, which was white as snow now—the man who had bought Paul Mayfield and made a prince of him to save a dynasty!

"One can scarcely realize it, your Highness," said the other.

"Ah! well—Life is an enigma, Baron Baumann, and this depresses me. Let us get away."

He turned without looking at me again; and his suite fell into position behind him, and away they all swept out of the infirmary into the limewashed corridors beyond.

Yes, Life is an enigma! If the prince could have only guessed that I had been a mother to him once, and loved him sorely and desperately well—if it had been only possible for him to believe the wild story of my life and his, what a dream-land he would have passed from—and to what an awakening!

How Silver Ore is Sold at Leadville.

THE business of buying and selling ores in a camp like Leadville, when the output of the mines is so immense and the value of dollars so great, has been reduced to a science, and is by no means, as many have supposed, dependent upon the fair-dealing and honesty of the mill-men who are generally the purchasers. The large mining corporations and wealthy individual owners of productive properties have their own assayers, as well as their own scales at the mines. So far as practicable, similar ores from the different bay streaks are piled together for shipment, under the distinguishing titles of hard carbonates, iron, dark sand, gray sand, and many other varieties of ore. The assayer makes frequent assays for the purpose of keeping a general knowledge of these separate kinds of ore, yet such assays are not the basis upon which sales are made, owing to the fact that such samples may be either too high or too low for the bulk of such lots, and the correct sampling must be arrived at by the process customary at the sampling works of reserving so many pounds, at regular intervals, out of a given weight of ore as it is being crushed. This system gives approximately the true value of the bulk of ore to ascertain which is equally to the interest of the buyer and seller. Samples from these bulk samples are assayed by the mill men and by the owners, and if the ounces closely tally, the price to be paid is arrived at. If too great variations occur the assays are made over again until they do agree. The owner of ore, knowing the cost of milling and marketing ore, is as well able to determine what the mill-men can afford to pay as the mill-man himself, and thus there is full and complete satisfaction and confidence existing between the sellers and buyers of ore in this camp. The weight of each ton of ore is made to tally almost to a pound by allowing for the unavoidable light waste in hauling, and it is very seldom that disputes arise on this point.

American Mules Abroad.

THE London Tramway Company, which owns the lines on the south side of the Thames, has introduced mules into London for working their cars. These mules, like the North Metropolitan Tramway horses, came from Kentucky and Tennessee, and are a never-ending source of wonder and amusement to Londoners, many of whom have never seen such animals before. Indeed, they are comparatively seldom seen in England, and the few there are are little larger or more imposing-looking than their paternal relatives. Both General Grant and General Sherman have expressed surprise that the military authorities in Europe have been so slow to recognize the excellence of the mule transport service. Until the recent war in South Africa the British had never tried the mule for military purposes on anything approaching a practical and comprehensive scale. The hardy hybrid has conclusively demonstrated his value in South Africa, the 800 mules shipped there (from America) having proved impervious to the attacks of the dreaded Tsetse fly, which plays such havoc with both horses and oxen, and a good trade is likely to spring up between Kentucky stock-breeders and the Natal colonists.

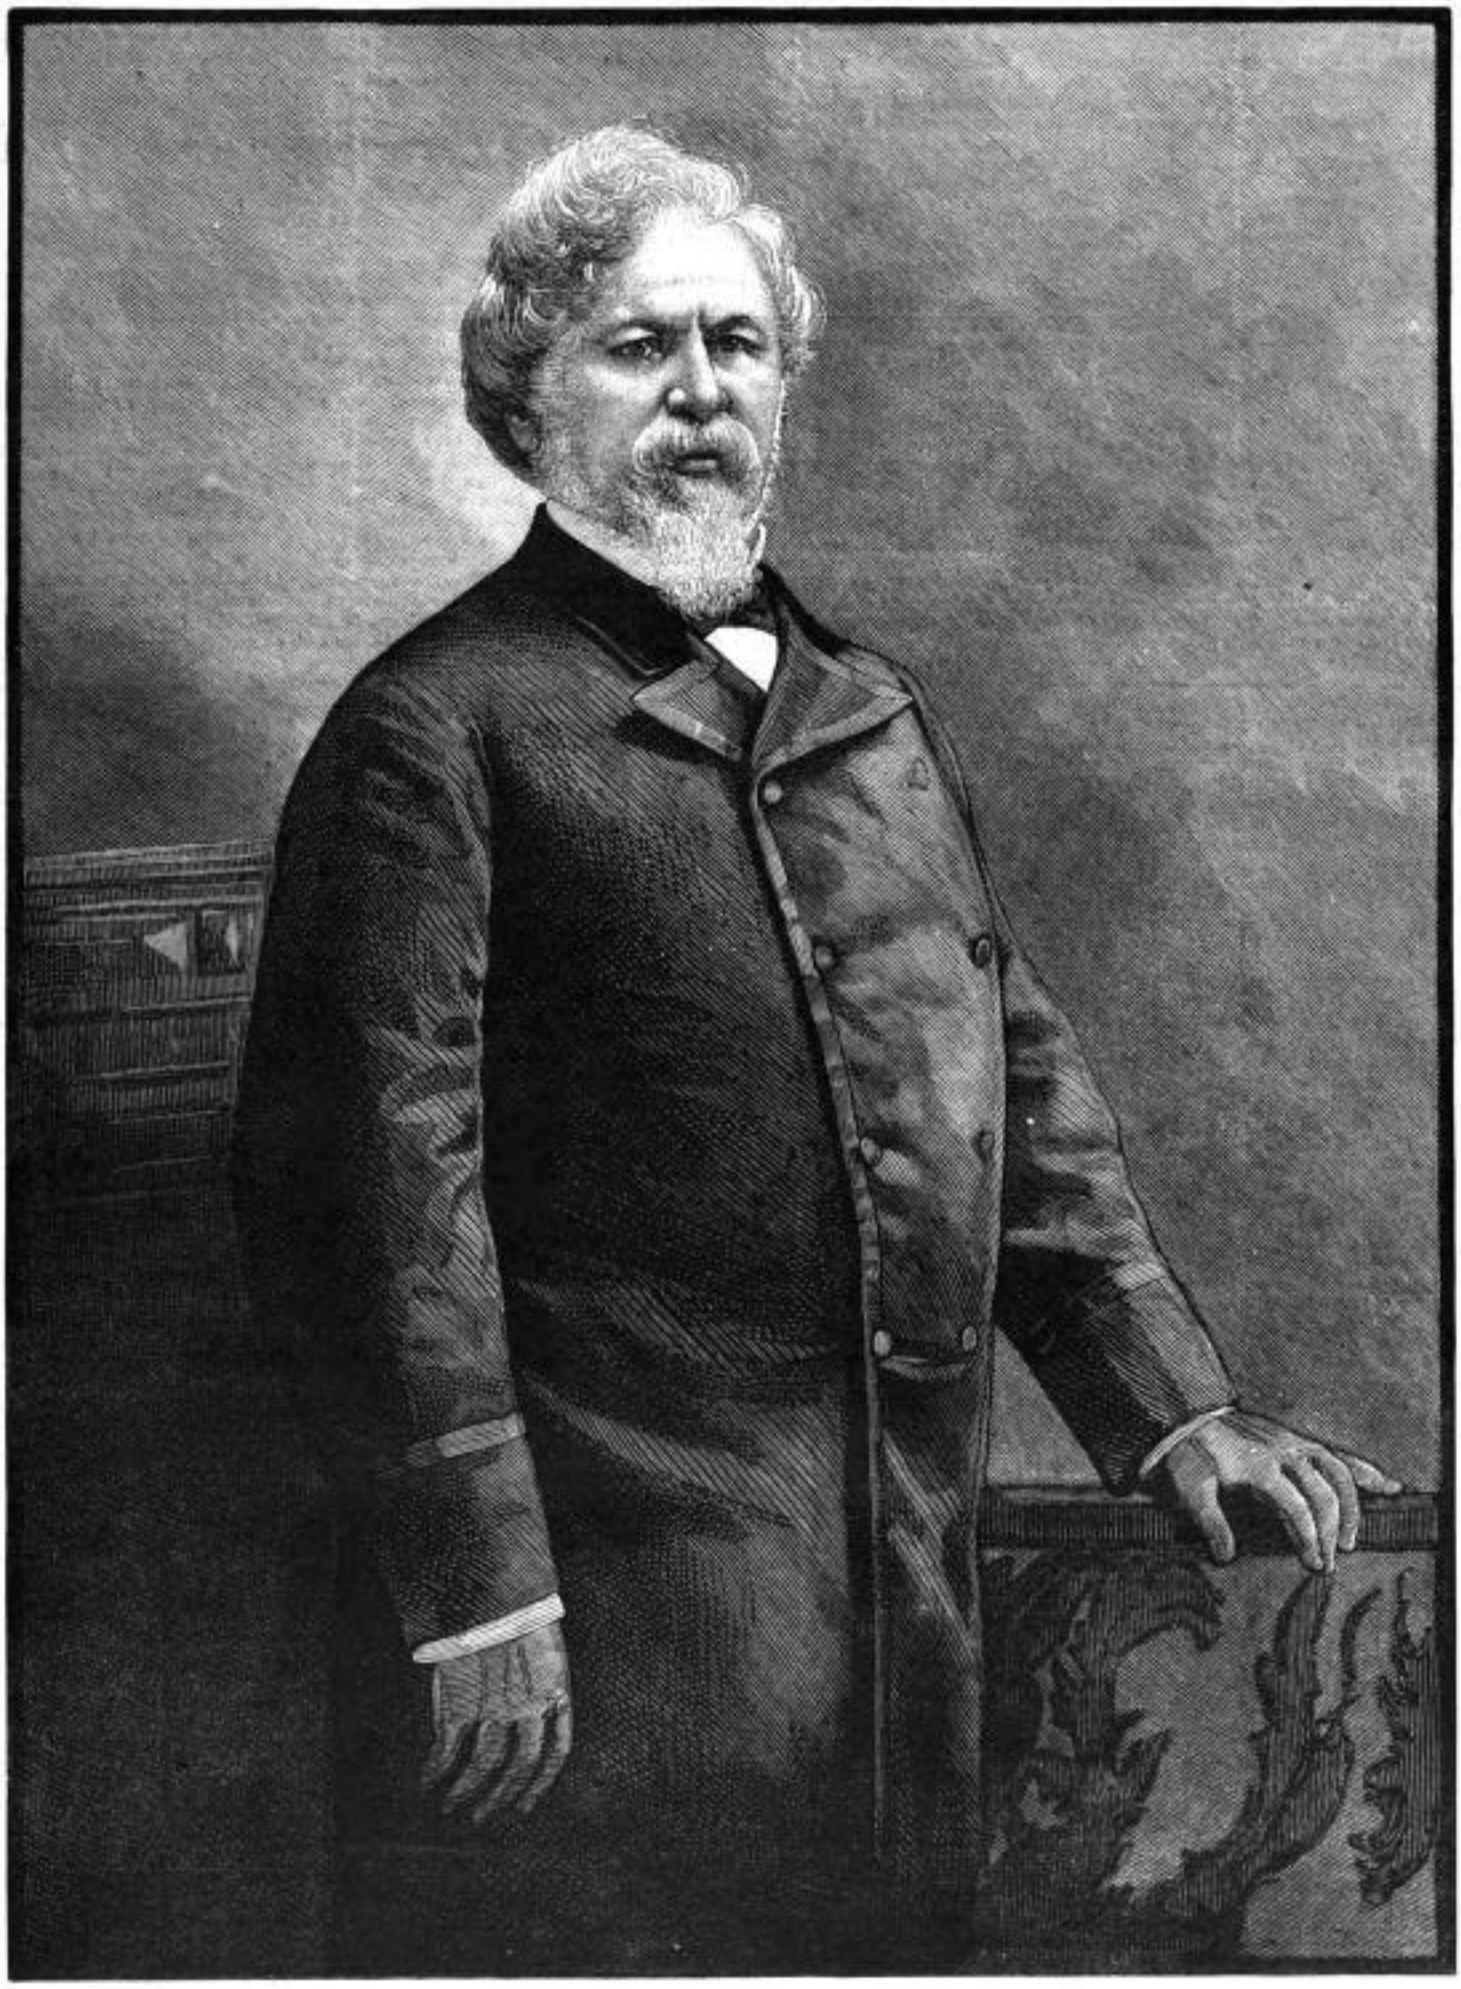
The Railway up Vesuvius.

THE most extraordinary railway in the world, perhaps, has now been completed. It is a line up the slopes of Mount Vesuvius, from the level of the Neapolitan Bay to the very edge of the crater. Not so many years ago such a project would have been ridiculed as the very last outcome of fanaticism—as who should suggest a terminus at Pompeii or a goods station among the marble ruins of Olympia? Yet it has been done, and Vesuvius has been scaled from foot to summit by the iron legion. The construction of the line, of course, has been peculiar; it is laid upon a solid pavement of masonry, believed to be perfectly secure from the overflows of lava on either side; there is no locomotive, but a powerful traction engine at either end, and the method of draught are by steel ropes working on grooved wheels; and should these break there is scarcely a possibility of the train receding downwards at a dangerous pace or to any considerable distance. For these details we are indebted to the Diritto, of Turin. That journal states its belief that, comparatively inexpensive as the construction of this miniature railway is, it may prove an exceedingly profitable speculation, considering the perpetually increasing numbers of tourists from the New World and all parts of the Old who flock to that scene and centre of historical marvels. If, however, for the very facts of its conception and construction alone, the Vesuvian Railway would be entitled to rank among the wonderful ideas and achievements of the nineteenth century, it is not to be compared with the gigantic Alpine works. They were called for: this, in many senses, was not; it has supplied a convenience, while they met great international necessities. But it is a characteristic of the age that can answer both demands, root up an oak or pick up a needle; and the small line that crawls up Vesuvius is, perhaps, not less an emblem of the epoch than the monster span which bridges Niagara.

Opposed to the Telegraph.

THE strongest opposition to a telegraph line from uncivilized races is always met with when it is first erected. Fear of the strange thing and jealousy of territorial encroachment naturally excite the savage mind to resent the innovation; and most construction parties in wild countries have to be protected by an escort of troops. The great trans-Australian overland line, recently completed, was carried for hundreds of miles through desert solitudes, unharmed by the blacks; but on the Macdonald range a band of hostile natives were encountered, and the electricians gained a bloodless victory over them by connecting the poles of a powerful battery to the wire, and administering shocks unawares to those of the natives who were prowling curiously around. The mysterious power, which seemed to them like a thunder-stroke, inspired them with a wholesome terror of the wire, and they give it a wide berth after that. Both in Australia and New Zealand several erecting parties have been attacked by the aborigines and massacred. Of late, however, in New Zealand, the Maoris have shown a different spirit, probably because of a better management on the part of the whites; and Maori squatters now help to build the line, which they look upon as a triumph of their scientific abilities.

The Money Value of a Man.



THE number of the population has been often reckoned, not its value as part of the actual wealth of the nation. A moment's consideration will show what an important part is played in the structure of the national wealth by the natural and acquired powers of body and mind. They are essentially articles of wealth, and have a distinct economic value. For instance, all wages may be considered to be paid for powers, either innate or acquired, in the human being. The lowest in point of value, because the most plentiful, is, of course, physical power, or mere muscular effort with spade, shovel, or hoe—the kind of labor least elevated above that of the horse or ox. The next is mental power, in other words those faculties of the mind which enable the possessor to manage complicated affairs, to exhibit discretion and judgment, to acquire knowledge and apply it to the needs or culture of society, whether as lawyer, physician, judge, author, or artist. Such powers are not only more rare than mere brute force, but require for their full development a special education and training; and, in consequence, demand and obtain more ample remuneration. The last is moral power, or character, without which, indeed, both physical and mental power lose much of their value. Without moral power, or character, there can be no guarantee that the duties which mind and body are fitted to discharge will be punctually and satisfactorily performed. In order that their labor may command its highest price, the plowman in the field, the barrister in the court, the physician in the sick-room, the judge on the bench, must alike inspire their employer, client, patient or suitor, with the idea that they possess not merely the physical and intellectual qualifications requisite for their respective tasks, but that the exercise of those qualifications will be invariably associated with a due sense of honor; in other words, that they may be trusted. And such a combination of moral with physical and intellectual qualities distinctly adds, be it remembered, to the economic value of the laborer.

NEW YORK, JANUARY 24, 1880.

The subject of our illustrated interview of this week—No. 13—is Senator Pendleton, Chairman of the United States Senate Census Committee on the forthcoming census. The Senator's views on his Bill, now before the Legislature, for conferring certain privileges upon the members of the Cabinet, are worthy of marked consideration.

FRANK LESLIE.

"FRANK LESLIE is dead!" Words uttered by hundreds of thousands ere this journal, which was at once his pleasure and his pride, shall have gone forth to the world. FRANK LESLIE bade fair to live a long life. Even in the span allotted to him he bravely took his share in the burden and heat of the day, doing yeoman's work, and doing it masterfully and well. But a few weeks since, and FRANK LESLIE, to all seeming in his usual ripe rude health, was the busiest in the busy hive, with life scarcely touching its Autumn for him; but the dread fiat had gone forth, and he was doomed. The seeds of a fibrous tumor in the neck developed themselves, and, although endowed with a superb physique, attended, too, by the most skilful physicians, the most anxious friends and the most devoted nurses, his case proved beyond the reach of human aid, and he calmly sank to rest at six o'clock upon the evening of Saturday last, at his residence, 511 Fifth Avenue.

Henry Carter, whose nom de crayon, "FRANK LESLIE," amongst English speaking peoples, was destined to become a veritable household word, was born at Ipswich, England, in the year 1821. His father, Joseph Carter, was an extensive glove manufacturer, and to his lucrative and long-established business the future pioneer of American illustrated literature was in course of time duly indentured. While a mere child, the boy evinced a decided passion for cutting and carving wood in grotesque and curious designs, and pictures, especially engravings, held him with a sort of fierce fascination. As the smallest accidental circumstances in early life frequently decide our whole future course, Henry Carter's career was determined by the movements of the employés in a silversmith's shop, as they engraved designs and letters upon various articles of silver and gold. He passed this shop on his way to school, and nothing connected with the operations of the silversmith's assistants escaped his observation. He marked the tools that were used and the manner of using them, nor did he rest until he had obtained a sufficient number of engraver's instruments to enable him to commence the work himself. The indomitable perseverance that characterized his later efforts stood by him now, and his engraving of a view of the Ipswich Town Hall earned for him the highest eulogium of his schoolmaster, who predicted a brilliant future for the youthful artist. At the age of seventeen, and with a view to his acquiring a more extended knowledge of the glove making business, he was sent to London, where he became a clerk in the glove department of the extensive drygoods establishment of his uncle; but every moment that could be snatched from the "dreary drudgery of the desk's dead wood" was surreptitiously devoted to sketching, drawing or engraving, and life seemed only at its best for him when engaged in following the path which he had already commenced to cut out for himself. His father, uncle and relatives so discouraged his artistic aspirations, that he was constrained to keep his work a secret from them, and in order the better to insure his incognito, adopted a name which is now familiar from Indus to the Pole—namely that of FRANK LESLIE. The dull routine of business became unendurable. He cast himself loose from it and its assured prospects, and although but twenty years of age, bravely started on the career that was destined to bring him name, and fame, and fortune. At this period he married. His marriage, an unfortunate one from the beginning continued to be unhappy, and terminated by separation in 1860. Three sons were born of this alliance—Harry, Alfred and Scipio, the last mentioned of whom died in 1879. Henry Carter immediately upon being launched into art life became connected with the Illustrated London News, where he was placed in charge of the engraving department, and it was during his relations with this eminent and enterprising journal that he obtained his masterful knowledge of every detail appertaining to the publication of an illustrated paper. It was here that he learned the operation known as overlaying—the system of regulating light and shade effects—in pictorial printing, a system which he was the first to introduce to this country, and which now forms so important an element in illustrated journalism.

Henry Carter at this early stage of his life was not only one of the first engravers and artists on wood of his time, but he was a far-seeing man of business, and, entertaining a lively conviction that in America there existed a wide field for the engraver's art, which could be profitably cultivated and worked, he had the courage of his convictions, and came to this country in the year 1848, at once declared his intention of remaining, and forthwith obtained an Act of Legislature to enable him to assume the name of FRANK LESLIE, as under this title his fame as an artist in wood and engraver had also preceded him. Mr. LESLIE'S American career commenced upon Gleason's Pictorial. Later on, when Mr. Barnum started his illustrated paper with the Beaches, Mr. LESLIE was treated with to superintend the engraving department; and so high was Mr. Barnum's opinion of the youthful engraver's ability, that he offered to add $20,000 to the $20,000 already invested in the paper if the sole charge was given into FRANK LESLIE'S hands. The offer was not accepted, and the failure of the paper is a matter of journalistic history. After the collapse of Barnum and Beach's illustrated paper, FRANK LESLIE, in 1854, commenced publishing on his own account, and the first periodical he issued was the Gazette of Fashion, now so widely and favorably known as Frank Leslie's Lady's Magazine. Shortly afterward he published the New York Journal, which he purchased when its circulation was at its lowest ebb, and infusing it with the vitality of his enterprise, he speedily raised its circulation to the point of profit. On December 14th, 1855, FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER, now in its twenty-fifth year, came to an eager and appreciative public, and the success which its enterprise so signally achieved has grown with its growth and strengthened with its strength. Its pages have illustrated the history of this great country for the last twenty-five years, every event of any public importance having been duly, and faithfully, and vividly chronicled. Its earlier subscribers will recall the graphic pictures of the Burdell murder and the inauguration of President Buchanan—the first Presidential election ever illustrated in this country; the exposure of the swill-milk horrors, for his action in regard to which Mr. Leslie received public recognition and a public testimonial; of the execution of John Brown; of the great Lynn strike; of the Heenan and Sayers contest; of the Japanese Commission; of the Atlantic Cable; the Civil War; of the Lincoln assassination; the Chicago and Boston fires, and of other engrossing subjects too numerous to mention.

In 1865, Mr. LESLIE started the Chimney Corner, the editing of which, together with that of the Lady's Magazine, he relegated to his wife—the object of his second marriage being a lady of the very highest intellectual attainments, and of the most æsthetic culture—and this illustrated fireside friend at once took up a position in literature which is neither claimed nor occupied by any other known periodical.

In rapid succession, Mr. LESLIE published the Boys' and Girls' Weekly, Pleasant Hours, the Lucy's Journal, also edited by Mrs. Leslie, the Popular Monthly, the Sunday Magazine, the Budget of Wit, and Cutterbox. In addition to the foregoing, he published the Illustrirte Zeitung, in German, a journal which is now the recognized organ of the German-speaking people on this continent. Mr. LESLIE published reprints of the novels that from time to time appeared in the columns of his various periodicals, books of travel, and other works, too numerous to set forth here. The superb Historical Register of the Centennial Exposition was regarded by its publisher with feelings of commendable pride, furnishing, as it did, a permanent, truthful, and beautiful chronicle of the Congress of Nations assembled in friendly competition in Philadelphia, in 1876, affording a complete history of exhibitive effort in the past, and an artistic and discriminating record of the great Centennial, the entire work being illustrated in the highest style of art, and forming a magnificent memorial of the colossal Exhibition.

For range of enterprise, no publisher can compare with Mr. LESLIE. While others have contented themselves with catering to one class only of the reading public, and narrowing their efforts to one periodical, FRANK LESLIE has provided mental pabulum for all classes of society, and with a directness of purpose and a success which have covered the entire field. His ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER is the only national newspaper ever published in America, not limiting itself to the mere reproduction of European engravings, but illustrating the current history of American events, so that it supplies a pictorial record of the times we live in. The Chimney Corner, on the other hand, deals with the literary events of the household, and supplies a liberal education for every member of the family, while the same admirable appliances to special wants of the community are to be found in FRANK LESLIE'S other periodicals.

It is in nowise an overstatement to say that no man has done so much for the general artistic education of the American people as FRANK LESLIE. He seized upon every improvement in engraving, to apply it to the public want, with the result, that now our illustrated literature is fully equal to that of the most advanced of the European nations. The rapidity with which he published elaborate engravings was also another triumph of skill. Large, double-paged engravings, which heretofore demanded two weeks at the hands of the most rapid and most skillful workmen, were, by FRANK LESLIE'S invention, put upon the wood and engraved in a single night. By his system, the block is divided into thirty-two pieces to the page, by which means thirty-two engravers can work upon the same picture at the same time. A single instance of the value of the invention will suffice. A double-page illustration of the execution of John Brown was given in the ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER. The artists arrived in New York with their sketches upon the evening subsequent to the execution. Shortly after midnight the engraving was on the press, and in the morning a vivid representation of the scene and its surroundings was in the hands of the public. Mr. LESLIE was the first publisher in America, or, perhaps, in the world, who maintained a full engraving establishment for his own publications alone. And yet so large and so constant is the demand created by the various illustrated publications upon the engraving corps, that outside labor is being almost continually employed.

FRANK LESLIE was whole souled and earnest. He was very intuitive, taking in every situation at a glance, and grasping a new idea with wondrous rapidity. He read character and motive intuitively. He had a strong reasoning mind, original, inventive, critical and analytical. He was possessed of a marvelous ability for organizing business, for calculating, estimating, and making up a general plan of action. He had a very great degree of perseverance and determination of mind after he had once settled upon any purpose or plan, but not so quick in deciding what to do as he was sure to carry out his purposes when formed. He was both familiar and affable, and exercised immense personal influence over his friends and those by whom he was surrounded. He was frank, open-hearted, candid, liberal in his feelings, and more truly natural in his life than are most men. In his friendship Mr. LESLIE was strong as steel. To him the word friend meant his alter ego, and if friendship be the shadow of the evening which strengthens the setting sun of life, then did FRANK LESLIE'S sun sink in a very blaze of light. There probably never lived an employer more respected and loved by those whom he employed than FRANK LESLIE. Gentle, courteous, yet firm withal, his personal magnetism drew his employés toward him as the magnet attracts steel, and until a reproof, be it ever so mild, came to be regarded as a veritable calamity. He dearly loved his art department, and often after a rough skirmish in the great battle, would he repair to the artists' room, and there, pencil in hand, help the beginner, suggest to the experienced, and criticise the work of the expert. The testimonial presented to him by the ART DEPARTMENT was one which he set considerable store by, and nothing ever caused him greater pleasure than the triumphs of the "boys," who, having quitted the parent nest, had made name and fame in the outside world of art. He was generous to a fault, and merely valued money for what it could produce. His charity was unostentatious, and many an employé has had his full salary for months while prostrated on the bed of sickness or disabled in the service through overwork or over anxiety. One employé he sent to Europe to recruit, paying all expenses and continuing his full salary. He provided for the widow and children of a second, and made the condition of families left destitute his especial care. When he repaired to Europe he brought back a souvenir of his trip to every one of his artists, while the tact and delicacy with which he would bestow a favor rendered it doubly acceptable to the recipient. When reverses came upon him, mainly owing to imprudent speculations in real estate at Saratoga and elsewhere, he met them with a high courage, a noble patience and a superb dignity.

Mr. LESLIE, in his time, had many honors conferred upon him. Among the earliest, the Medal of the American Institute for wood engraving—this in 1848, the year of his arrival in this country. He was appointed a Commissioner to the Paris Exhibition of 1867, in the Department of Fine Arts, and was presented with the prize gold medal by the Emperor Napoleon III. in person. Again, in 1876, he was selected as State Commissioner for the State of New York to the Centennial, and elected President of the Commission.

He was a member of the Manhattan Club, the Jockey Club, and was one of the earliest supporters of the Lotos. As a Mason he stood very high in the Order, and belonged to the aristocratic Holland Lodge. He had a strong love for animals, and to FRANK LESLIE'S "thorough" support Mr. Bergh owes much of the success of his efforts in aid of the suppression of cruelty to dumb brutes. Mr. LESLIE'S hospitality was unbounded, and the élite given at his picturesque and enchanting residence at Saratoga claim a world-wide celebrity. It was here that Mr. and Mrs. LESLIE entertained the Emperor and Empress of Brazil, and hither, from time to time, have the celebrities of this and other countries made pleasant pilgrimages. The house was designed by Mr. LESLIE; he was his own landscape-gardener, and his tender feeling for the beautiful never more clearly evinced itself than in the delicate manner in which he contrived to blend the loveliness of nature with the witcheries of art.

FRANK LESLIE has gone, but the work of his genius and enterprise lives after him, writing his epitaph on the pages of his adopted country. Well did he exemplify, in his calm awaiting of death, that—

"'Tis not the whole of life to live,
Nor all of death to die."

THE CENSUS.

IN view of the fact that the tenth decennial census of the country is soon to be taken, we proffer our readers a few thoughts and facts relative to the subject. We deem it necessary to say that, in every country and at almost all periods, the exigencies of military service or of revenue must have rendered occasionally necessary some sort of estimate of the numbers of the people. Among the Greeks and Romans, inquiries relative to population were often pressed to considerable extent. It was, however, reserved to the present age to develop the science of statistics, as we now understand it. Achenwall, a Prussian, who lived about 1750, has the credit of having given form and name to this highly important branch of knowledge, but the development of its principles, as we are told, became the charge of his pupil, Schlözer. Other writers, at varying times, elaborated the matter, and in 1829 the French Society of Universal Statistics sprang into being. The transactions of this society, arranged under several divisions, will give a better idea of the scope of the science of statistics than can be otherwise expressed. They include: 1st—Physical and Descriptive Statistics. This division embraces topography, hydrography, meteorology, population, man physically, hygeine and the sanitary state. 2d—Positive and Applied Statistics, taking in animal and vegetable productions, agriculture, industry, commerce, navigation, state of the sciences, general institutions, literature, language and the fine arts. 3d—Moral and Philosophical Statistics, including the forms of religious worship, legislative and judicial powers, public administration, finance, the marine, military and diplomacy.

At this time the enlightened of all civilized nations appreciate the importance of securing correct information relative to the age, sex, condition, occupation and numbers of a people; also as to their social and moral state, their education and industry. When this information can be had for periods dating far back into the past, and for many countries, it furnishes material for contrasts and comparisons of the most instructive character, and for deducing the soundest rules in the administration of government, as well as in promoting the general welfare of society. Statistics, we remark, constitute the ledger of a nation, in which, like the merchant in his books, the citizen can read, at a single view, all the results of a year or of a series of years, and deduce the profit or loss which has been made in population, morals, education, wealth or power.

In taking a census, the Government merges all individuality, and only uses in an aggregate form the information collected. It does not betray the age of Sallie Smith, spinster, but simply informs the public of the number of females wearing her particular number of years. It does not expose the business standing of John Brown, cotton manufacturer, but tabulates the number of such establishments, and aggregates all data relating thereto. From this it will be seen that the taking of a census does not in any form involve the personal exposure of any man or woman. The prejudiced or ignorant may deem it an impertinence to be questioned as to their age, place of nativity, occupation, whether married or single, whether there is a deaf, dumb or blind person in the family, whether they cultivate land and how much, what the nature and amount of their crops, and whether any of the household have been born or have died within the year. Such questions are actually necessary to reach general results, and when the answers of the people have been digested into tabular form and given publicity, the idea of impertinence proves to be groundless.

The earlier census reports of the United States, commencing with that of 1790, furnish but little information outside of matters relating to population. In 1810 a schedule of manufactures was added, but this was omitted in taking the census of 1820. The census of 1850 inaugurated a new era by extending the field of inquiry and information. Since then the system has been more and more perfected, and now we look to the coming census for a greater variety of reliable statistical data than ever before obtained.

Two leading questions naturally connect themselves with the coming census. They are: First, what have we gained in numerical strength? and, second, what have been the acquisitions of national wealth? An advance answer to either of these interrogatories must be purely speculative, and we do not care to embark upon the sea of probabilities. We may say, however, that but for the emigration element from foreign countries, affected as it is by varying circumstances, quite accurate results might be given with respect to population. Mr. Darby, the well-known geographer, calculated with much nicety the population of this country for a period of years extending from 1800 to 1850. Taking the population of 1790—shown by the census of that year to have been 3,929,827—as a basis, and adding three per cent for each succeeding year, he arrived at results which, when compared with the census years, showed as follows:

Years.	Estimated.	Census.
1800	5,309,468	5,305,925
1810	7,105,364	7,239,814
1820	9,595,162	9,638,131
1830	12,821,328	12,866,020
1840	17,217,506	17,069,453
1850	23,138,004	23,191,876

The foregoing exhibits close calculation, but the rule of Mr. Darby failed to operate so accurately after 1850. According to his method of computation, the population should have been 40,617,708 in 1870, whereas the actual return was only 38,558,371, a difference of 2,059,337. True, emigration from abroad fell off largely during the years of the war, and 554,260 persons, Unionists and Confederates, perished in battle or died from disease and wounds; but these combined causes do not account for the difference between the calculation and the matter-of-fact enumeration. The calculations of Darby, if extended to the present year, would show a population of 54,586,795. Mr. Walker, the present Superintendent of the Census, is credited with saying that the population of 1880 will not exceed 48,000,000. Should an actual enumeration prove th a to be correct, then the increase over 1870 will amount to less than twenty-four and one-half per cent. How this agrees with other decades will be made apparent by the annexed table of per centages from 1800 to 1870:

Year.	Increase per cent.	Year.	Increase per cent.
1800	35.10	1840	33.52
1810	36.38	1850	35.83
1820	33.06	1860	35.11
1830	32.51	1870	22.65

It will be seen that during the course of eight decades the per centage of increased population never fell so low as in that ending in 1870. It falls 9.86 per cent. below the figures of 1830, at which time the increase was 32.51 per cent., the lowest ever known prior to the census of 1870. We shall not discuss the correctness of Mr. Walker's calculation, but indulge the hope that the coming enumeration will show at least as good results as were obtained in 1830.

Touching the national wealth, it may be plainly said that we never have had correct information, and, perhaps, never shall have. In 1860 the aggregate of wealth was represented at $16,159,616,068, and in 1870 at $30,068,518,507, an increase of a fraction over 86 per cent. The same ratio of increase, extended to 1880, would give an aggregate, in round numbers, of $56,000,000,000. Referring to the return for 1870, the superintendent of the census said: "At the best, these figures represent the opinion of one man, or a body of men in each State, acting under advice in the collection of material and in the calculation of the several elements of wealth." And again: "The result reached must at best be characterized rather as an impression than an opinion." But, while we may fail in determining the extent of our national wealth, yet the taking of each decennial census enriches the fund of general information.

PRACTICAL CO-OPERATION.

THE capitalist and laborer are mutually dependant, yet there has always been more or less of antagonism between them. Each is fitted for his own work, and each in his proper place makes money, while each out of his own especial field can scarcely be expected to realize anything but failure. On the one hand, there should be no imposition of oppressive rules; on the other, there should be fidelity to engagement. Mutual confidence is necessary for mutual benefits. A combination formed by either party against the other in nearly every case produces the ultimate result of loss. With honest compensation for honest work, there is neither occasion nor policy for the violent interruptions of business relations that are dictated in the main by trades' unions.

In a new year following upon one that was distinguished by a remarkable impetus in every branch of industrial and mechanical labor, it is interesting to note the extent to which arbitrary rulings of trade organizations are giving way to more practicable forms of self-help. In the United States we have a constantly increasing class of persons on the lookout for opportunities for bettering their condition. Every week hundreds of people land at our ports from the countries of Europe, impelled by the desire of making money. Now, when there are men skilled in the trades who cannot live in the large cities for the want of work, new-comers will have little chance of securing profitable employment. Hence there is a large drifting of unemployed labor from point to point, which must continue until a settlement is found, or the restless ones descend the scale to the condition of the outcast.

In view of this present situation of a large portion of the laboring world, some valuable hints may be gained by considering that phase of co-operation which has resulted in the establishment of some notable industrial settlements.

It is now about ten years since a Swedish colony was located in Maine, upon a township six miles square, that was voted the settlers by the Legislature. After four years spent in clearing and preparing the ground, the colonists had one hundred and fifty large farms, well stocked and cultivated, as a result of their co-operative labor. The immigration has steadily increased, the original tract has been overgrown, and the thrifty Swedes, after accepting all the accommodations offered by the adjacent towns of Woodland, Lyndon, and Perham, have formed settlements in other parts of the State in numbers exceeding those at New Sweden.

About the same time another party of Swedes settled in Grundy County, Tenn., seventy families taking up farms of 100 acres each. To day Gruetli, as the place is called, is a most populous settlement, with excellent schools and churches. The success of this colony has been so marked as to lead a number of prominent gentlemen of this city to take steps preliminary to the settlement of a similar colony in the eastern part of the same State. A good-sized colony from Lowell, Mass., was established last Fall in Coffee County, and a number of large tracts in Scott, Fentress, Morgan, and other counties, have been purchased by a Boston agency for English settlements.

Six years ago the site of the present Indiana colony, seven miles from Los Angeles, Cal., was a sheep ranch of 4,000 acres, with valuable water privileges. Now there are two churches, two school-houses, and well-built residences worth from $1,200 to $12,000. But a few miles from this colony is another, of German settlement, named Anaheim. A desert plain was purchased, a canal seven miles long was dug from the Santa Anna for irrigating purposes; the land was divided into farms of twenty acres each and provided with feeders from the canal, and, after the ground had been thoroughly prepared for the agriculturists, the whole settlement was turned over to the colonists. In an almost similar manner San Barnardino, in the same State was founded. The settlements of the Mennonites in Kansas and Minnesota, of the Pennsylvania farmers near Salina, in the former State, known as the Donmeyer Colony, and of countless others that have sprung up along the great railroads of the South, West and Northwest, are all evidences of this improved form of co-operation. And it is a good sign that many more are projected on a large scale.

Now, what is the practical result of this movement? In the instances mentioned, the settlements have been successful. If their establishment and maintenance teach anything, it is that they encourage a desirable immigration, that they relieve large cities and crowded districts of the surplus skilled labor, that they render the workingman more independent and contented, and that they are the means of utilizing the admirable but hitherto unproductive acres of our plains and table-lands. They are therefore a benefit to the country in developing its waste places, and to the workingman in placing him beyond the severe competition of large cities and making him a landowner.

As a factor in the solution of the labor problem, these colonial settlements are deserving both of study and encouragement.

EVENTS ABROAD.

IN Ireland, the wife of the Lord Lieutenant is raising money for the relief of the famine stricken, and she has already picked up $75,000. This from the waiters on Providence who hope for invitations to the Court balls and festivities in return for their guinea. Her husband, the duke, is being received in solemn silence as he passes through the country. Queen Victoria's Government have ordered a complete change of front, and, with a view to the coming elections, have resolved to grant loans for the construction of drainage works in the distressed districts. If these measures be found inadequate to meet the exigency, the Government will apply to Parliament to sanction the appropriation of $2,500,000, out of the church surplus, for the prosecution of relief works to be carried on by the Board of Works, and to authorize the formation of baronial sessions to determine the nature of such works. Dan O'Connell was right when he declared there was nothing equal to agitation. The leader of the Home Rule Party, if there is such a party, Mr. Shaw, M. P., puts the question of the crisis in Ireland in this way: A million of people to live comfortably in Ireland, or a million of people to be driven to the poor house, or swept away to America. It is for the English Government to reply to this. Two thousand five hundred dollars have been forwarded from Brisbane, Queensland—a first instalment.

Are the natives of Providence, Rhode Island, Americans or Austrians? This is a strange question to be compelled to ask, but, nevertheless, it is being very solemnly propounded in the Roumanian Chamber of Deputies. A dispatch from Bucharest to the Times says: "The Roumanian Chamber of Deputies has asked the Government for all the papers relating to the recent award of a contract for 20,000 Martini-Henry rifles to an Austrian establishment which never made any of those weapons, whereas the Providence Tool Company, of Providence, R. I., offered to deliver them for one franc less per rifle." The Rhode Islanders are put upon their nationality, and woe to the Roumanians if they continue to question it. The smallest State in the Union sends forth big men.

With the alarming accounts of the health of the Emperor of Russia comes a direful dispatch from St. Petersburg in relation to diphtheria. This dreaded disease is committing such fearful ravages that the local Red Cross Society of Kharkoff have formed their medical and sanitary detachments to assist the Government to combat the epidemic.

The sad omens croaked by the ravens of the Court of Spain in regard to the royal marriage have already achieved a part fulfillment, and the poor little bride has been attacked with epileptic fits consequent upon the shock to her nervous system by the attempted assassination of her husband by Gonzalez. This alone will serve to tighten the garrote around the miserable would be regicide's throat.

The war waged by the English press upon the Government, in reference to the refusal to allow special newspaper correspondents to report proceedings in Afghanistan, has ended in a victory for the press, and a Calcutta dispatch announces that the Indian Government have decided to allow the rules respecting newspaper correspondents with the troops on active service to remain in abeyance, leaving to the discretion of commanders the question of imposing restrictions upon them if necessary. No correspondent will, however, be permitted to proceed to the front without a license.

The poor Prince Imperial will soon have a monument to his memory on a site within rifle-shot of the glittering Tuileries, within whose salons he one day hoped to be able to repay the hospitality of England. The amount subscribed has been 200,000 francs, and the position assigned to the memorial an elevated point between the Arc de Triomphe and the Hotel des Invalides. When will his ashes and those of his Imperial father be permitted to return to the banks of the Seine? Quien sabe!

There is a vast amount of distress at this moment in Paris, caused by the inclement season. All the hospitals are filled, and official reports state that there are 7,500 applications for admission, and that these cannot be met.

Baron Reinach is the purchaser of Queen Christina's hotel, Avenue Josephine, in Paris. He paid $115,000 for it.

The French Cable Company have spoken with deliberation and to the point. They say that as soon as the cable to make the connection between Brest and England is laid, their cable, which is in perfect working order, will be opened for traffic, certainly not later than the first week in February. Thus cablegraming will become a cheap luxury about St. Valentine's Day.

Our protective tariff is disturbing the minds of Lord Derby and Fernando Wood. The "haughty earl," at a trade banquet at Huddersfield, was pleased to say that we were Britain's most formidable rivals, but that we played our little game behind our protective tariff. His lordship added that even with the help of the protective tariff we were powerless to check the importation of English goods. How long is this impotency to last, though, proud Stanley?

Spain is treating France rather shabbily. France came to the rescue of the sufferers by the Murcian inundations in a manner that caused hundreds of thousands of pesos to chink in the Murcian treasury. The people of Madrid tendered a serenade to the French Ambassador in that city, but the Government would not permit it. The Madrilenas protested vehemently. The poorest quarters and narrowest streets of Madrid hung out banners from the balconies, while the public buildings and aristocratic hotels showed no signs whatever of the public gratitude to France. They are having a hot time in the Cortes and a meeting held by the members of the Left, who have refused to sit in the Cortes under Canovas del Castillo's Ministry, has intensified the Parliamentary crisis to a point hitherto unknown in the present reign. Little Campos is as firm as the Rock of Gibraltar, and Castillo has to choose between submission, resignation, or dissolution. The Spanish Society for the Abolition of Slavery has addressed a petition to Congress for the immediate and simultaneous liberation of the slaves in all the Spanish possessions.

The Albanians and Montenegrins have been playing at fighting, and the latter have lost the game, although commanded by the chief of the Albanian League. The "incident" took place near Gusinije. Austria has received a circular from Montenegro protesting against the non-fulfillment of the stipulation for the surrender of Gusinije, accusing the Porte of inciting the Albanians to resistance, claiming indemnity from Turkey for being forced to keep a large number of troops under arms and urging the Powers to take energetic action in behalf of Montenegro.

Does Italy want to pick a quarrel with Austria? If yes, she will get badly thrashed unless her 100-ton guns prove equal to the work cut out for them. The Vienna correspondent of the London Times, discussing the Imbriani affair, says: "Nobody suspects any real intention on the part of Italy to pick a quarrel with Austria, but the matter excites distrust, which, in the long run, must tell on the relations of the two states." The Italian Exchequer is nearly empty—and must be replenished—why not with Austrian gold?

PRESENTS FOR BOY PRISONERS.

ONE of those pleasant episodes which Miss Lida Gilbert, long known as the "Prisoner's Friend," is constantly arranging for the unfortunate ones confined in penal and reformatory institutions, occurred in the City Prison of New York on Tuesday afternoon, January 6th. Quite a large number of boys are at present serving out short sentences in the famous Tombs, and it was with the humane view of showing them that there was outside sympathy for them in their unfortunate plights, and, at the same time, of arranging to turn their young minds from thoughts of crime, that Miss Gilbert determined to give an entertainment that should be remembered by them. She was accompanied by Mrs. General Bertha F. Chaney, Judge George Mungen, of Rochester; Mrs. Dr. Smith, the Rev. Dr. Smith, Mr. John A. Lant, Mr. Elton Pendleton, and the Mr. Messrs. Beach and Wentworth and a few others. Warden Flinn and his deputy led the party to the boys' prison, and introduced them to Mrs. Lane, the Matron, and Miss Foster, Superintendent of the Boys' Department. After the lads had assembled, Miss Gilbert made a speech and told them a story, and then gave to each a handsome picture-book, a knife and pencil, a wooden pail, pounds of candies, and an orange and an apple. She then bid them good-by, and the party went to the chapel, where a short service was held, and then inspected the cells library for the use of the prisoners, which we secured through Miss Gilbert's efforts.

PRESENTS FOR BOY PRISONERS.

ONE of those pleasant episodes which Miss Linda Gilbert, long known as the "Prisoner's Friend," is constantly arranging for the unfortunate ones confined in penal and reformatory institutions, occurred in the City Prison of New York on Tuesday afternoon, January 6th. Quite a large number of boys are at present serving out short sentences in the famous Tombs, and it was with the humane view of showing them that there was outside sympathy for them in their unfortunate plights, and, at the same time, of attempting to turn their young minds from thoughts of crime, that Miss Gilbert determined to give an entertainment that should be remembered by them. She was accompanied by Mrs. General Bertha d'Utassy, Judge George Munger, of Rochester; Mrs. Dwinelle, the Rev. Dr. Smith, Mr. John A. Lant, Mr. Hiram Doolittle, and the Rev. Messrs. Heath and Woodruff and a few others. Warden Finn and his deputy led the party to the boys' prison, and introduced them to Mrs. Foster, the Matron, and Miss Fisher, Superintendent of the Boys' Department. After the lads had assembled, Miss Gilbert made a speech and told them a story, and then gave to each a handsome picture-book, a slate and pencil, a wooden pail, brimful of candies, and an orange and an apple. She then bid them good-by, and the party went to the chapel, where a short service was held, and then inspected the costly library for the use of the prisoners, which was secured through Miss Gilbert's efforts.

CHRISTMAS DAY ON THE WHITE RIVER.

ALTHOUGH surrounded by deep snow and far away from the brightly-lighted and gayly-decorated stores that gladden alike the heart of young and old, the holiday season at the camp of the Fifth United States Cavalry on White River, Col., was not by any means as forlorn an occasion as New York belles might imagine. Boots were hung up by officers and men, and presents exchanged, just as stockings were filled on Fifth Avenue. Then, too, there were social gatherings, for, under restricted circumstances, men can be really sociable among themselves. Calls were made, and feasts of flesh were given that would appal any but a frontiersman or a lumberman of the North. The pickets who passed the glorious eve of Christmas at their posts beside sparkling fires of brushwood were not forgotten when the good things were ready for the palate. And what dinners were spread and eaten on that grand holiday! Verily, man is hungry the world over. Then, after the boards were cleared, and the horses had enjoyed an extra allowance in honor of the day, instead of taking a siesta on the lounge or bed or puffed easy-chair, these hearty martial eaters mounted horse and took the very best kind of exercise. With bodies warmed with grateful food and great-coats buttoned to the chin, it is not unlikely that good digestion waited upon appetite, and health attended both in a more loyal manner than after many a banquet graced by the choicest dainties of "civilized" markets.

OKINAWA ISLANDS.

THESE Islands have recently become a regular province, or Ken, of the Japanese Empire, but are still a subject of serious controversy between Japan and China. Their ancient name was Liu Kiu, which has been corrupted by modern navigators into Loo-Choo, Lew Chew and Lieou-Kieow, and by the present natives into Doo-Choo; but the more musical name of Okinawa was given to them by the inhabitants themselves centuries ago, and the meaning of it is "the cord lying upon the sea." The entire group consists of thirty-seven islands, the largest of which is eighty-five miles long by from three to twenty-three in width, and has a circumference of 314 ri, or about 778 miles.

During the whole of the eighteenth century the Islands of Okinawa would seem to have remained in a state of perfect tranquillity. They continued to pay a double tribute to Japan and China, and, having faithfully done so, they felt that they had a right to bring in from abroad any new ideas that they might fancy. Hence they imported the paper mulberry from Japan, and began to manufacture paper: and from China they obtained the secret of making India ink; and also as an article of food when young, and for the beauty of its wood, they imported and cultivated the famous mose bamboo. They also adopted a code of criminal laws and of laws for reward, and not only established a national school, but many local schools in the various districts.

The peculiarities of the inhabitants of Okinawa may be summed up as follows: They are noted for their natural intelligence, though the majority have few opportunities for acquiring the knowledge contained in books; their language is closely allied to that of the Japanese; their occupations are chiefly agricultural, the leading productions being rice, wheat, sugar, millet, sweet potatoes, beans, peas, radishes, turnips, tobacco, cotton, indigo and flax; their manufactures are limited to cloths made from cotton and grass, to porcelain and lacquered goods, and such other things as are needed for a simple rural population; the men are generally stout, well-formed, and fond of wearing beards; the women are small, and kept in a low social position; all classes are industrious and neat in their persons and habitations; their style of dressing is Oriental and suited to the climate; their homes are comfortable and picturesque; the table and household customs are similar to those of the Japanese; in religion they are generally Buddhists, although some of their rites are peculiar to these islands.

They know not what it is to have an army, nor any such offspring of civilization as a political demagogue; their policy is to carry on their public affairs in a spirit of courtesy and kindness. When they have deemed it necessary to carry guns on their little vessels, they have borrowed them from Satsuma. They use the Japanese alphabet, and write after the manner of their neighbors and protectors, and in speaking of their language, they claim that six-tenths of the words are Japanese, three-tenths of local dialect, and one-tenth Chinese. When any public business is to be transacted, the people are called together in their several districts, and the men in authority accomplish the purposes of the Government by kindly admonitions.

AN ATLANTIC SKETCH.

By LADY HARDY.

NO, I shall not tell the name of the ship; those who were my fellow-passengers during those brief ten days will recognize it easily enough, themselves, too, no doubt; for I profess my portraits to be as correct as those painted by the sun; not sufficiently flattering, perhaps, to satisfy loving eyes, but good enough for strangers, who do not care what was the shape of this man's nose, or the color of that man's hair. To those who were not of our party, one vessel will be the same as another; they may choose and christen it after their own fashion, for, after all, what's in a name? That question was asked three hundred years ago, and answered by Tom Hood, good, genial Tom Hood, in our own day. He proves to our satisfaction that there is a great deal in a good name, but much more in a bad one.

It was on a bright morning in July that I started on my first Atlantic passage, in some trepidation of spirit and anxiety of mind. First I went on an exploring expedition from one end of the magnificent vessel to the other; it was one of the finest on the Allan Line, a floating palace, so fine, so steady and strong, it seemed impossible that even the wildest waves could make a toy of, or crush like an egg-shell, a thing so majestic, with its iron heart beating with a regular throb like the pulse of a strong man's life. Having satisfied myself as to my stateroom, and its proximity to stewardess and doctor, my next thought was to go up on deck and look round upon my fellow-passengers who were to form part of my home-life for the next ten days. There were plenty of them; as a rule they were those common specimens of humanity which nature turns out by thousands, and merely labels "man" or "woman." But there were some exceptions; one was an elderly, stern-featured man, bronzed and weather-beaten, with small, keen eyes, which looked as though they could detect a spot upon the face of the sun without the aid of glasses, and so searching that, like the east wind, they would reach the marrow at a single blow; with these piercing eyes he scanned the faces of every one who came on board. His companion—for he was not alone—was a young fellow, fair-haired, with laughing blue eyes, full of those animal spirits which work off with the early stages of manhood. Then there was a young bride and bridegroom returning to their home in Quebec, having been for their wedding tour in the old land. Before I had time to carry my inspection further, the cry of "All for the shore" came from a pair of stentorian lungs. There was a hurried hand-shaking, and "Good-by," "Good-by," echoed on all sides, spoken with varying shades of feeling; some with a choking sob, others with a tender regret, and some who were off for a brief holiday shouted a joyous "Good-by." In the midst of the bustle and confusion of parting and departing, a little rowboat hailed the vessel, and in another moment came alongside, and a young widow, with a child about a year old in her arms, followed by a boy carrying a cabin-trunk, came on board.

"I have been detained. I was afraid I should miss the ship," she exclaimed, glancing apologetically round.

The purser had already taken the contract tickets from the rest of the passengers, and held out his hand for hers. She searched her purse, her hand-bag, turned everything over and over, her agitation increasing as she found the search was vain. In deep distress, and with a look of profound dismay, she exclaimed:

"I have lost it! I had it safe an hour ago What shall I do? Oh, what shall I do?"

Here our bronzed old captain came to the fore; cast his kind gray eyes upon the young widow's face. She was beginning to cry, and he patted her in a fatherly way upon the shoulder and said, soothingly:

"There, there, my dear; don't distress yourself."

"You won't send me back?" she exclaimed, catching his hand as they say drowning men catch at straws.

"No, no," he answered; "it is all right. I'll take the risk."

He gave the signal. We all rushed to the side of the vessel, and, amidst a general waving of handkerchiefs, shouting of last words, and "Good by!"—"Good-by!" the little steam-tug which had brought the passengers on board went snorting and shrieking on its way back to the shore, and our great ship steamed majestically up the river, out towards the dreaded Irish Channel. Some among us had a hazy idea that we might be led to disembark at Moville and so bid adieu to the horrors of the sea for ever; but that was a cowardly notion, which I never encouraged for a moment.

That evening the captain's table was crowded. Everybody seemed to realize the fact that that vessel was to be "home" for the next ten days. Everybody seemed socially inclined, but, nevertheless, took mental stock of their neighbors before deciding which set he should especially cling to; for, of course, before many hours were over we should break into little parties and cliques of a friendly fashion. The beautiful young widow, Mrs. Sydney, had the place of honor on the captain's right hand, the bride upon his left; but, before this could be satisfactorily decided, the question arose: "What was to become of the baby?" At last a young Scotchman, Donald Mackay, volunteered to immolate himself on the altar of beauty, and, animated by a grateful glance from the widow's soft brown eyes, he disappeared up the companion way holding the baby upside down—which was excusable, perhaps, this being the first time he had officiated as dry-nurse.

The captain, in his capacity of host, did his best to make things go cheerily. He set the ball of conversation, and if it was not caught up or fairly bowled onward, it was no fault of his. Meanwhile, a game at speculation was being invisibly carried on; telegraphic communication was passed from eye to eye, conjectural phrases flew round, and the current of observation set in strongly towards the young widow's quarter. She, meanwhile, seemed wholly unconscious of the curiosity she was creating. She sat silent and reserved, with a tinge of melancholy, as became her state, equally unconscious of the admiring glances of the one sex, or the critical appraisement of the other. She was monosyllabic in her answers to special questions, and in reply to general observations merely glanced up and smiled—with such a smile! One longed to catch that upward glance and smile again. The young bride, Mrs. Alger, looked across the table with a supercilious air. She had caught her liege lord's glances wandering that way oftener and with warmer admiration than she quite approved. Once he ventured to nudge her elbow, levying an unlicensed tax upon her admiration. She refused to honor his demand, and obstinately turned her eyes in another direction.

After dinner all went their several ways, some to the smoking-room, some lounged over the bulwarks, others joined the cry of "Yo, heave ho!" and helped the sailors haul the ropes, for the wind was freshening; all sails were set to catch the breeze, and the vessel, like a beautiful white bird with outspread wings, floated along, cutting her way through the water with a steady rapidity that had an exhilarating effect upon everybody. We felt as though we ourselves were flying over the face of the water. The briny kisses "of the great, sweet mother" stirred the soul into open rejoicing, and bursts of laughter and cheerful voices echoed on all sides. Meanwhile, the pretty bride and her athletic bridegroom paced the deck in gloomy silence; she, because she was wrathfully disposed; he, because he had nothing to say—he rarely had much to say—conversation, as a rule, was not his strong point. Presently, however, he seemed to become vaguely aware that there was something unusual in this continued silence, and he broke it, adding insult to injury as he exclaimed:

"I say, Clara?"

"Well."

"Isn't she a stunning creature?"

"Who?"

"Why, the widow, of course. Clean and smart, not a bad point about her."

"You talk as though you were studying a horse."

"So she is—she's a mère, mare; not bad that, don't you see? Mère mother, mare horse." He laughed heartily at his own wit, and nudged his wife's elbow as a means of wakening her understanding to a full appreciation. She smiled faintly, and he followed up his advantage, adding: "Wonderfully reserved, though, and quiet isn't she? Never once opened her lips."

"She opened her mouth, though, pretty often, and put plenty into it; the way she ate was perfectly disgusting; putting the knife into her mouth, too. I thought that she was going to swallow it."

"Ah, that looks queer, very," he observed, sagaciously. "I should like to know her history, I'm sure she's got one." Here Mr. Jaggers, the tall, strange-looking man who had first attracted my attention, joined them in their promenade, and somehow, after a slight passing observation concerning the weather, the conversation drifted towards Mrs. Sydney. Mr. Jaggers protested he had not seen her face, "Besides, he did not pay much attention to women's faces—didn't believe in 'em."

"Jaggers don't believe in anything," rejoined his young companion, whom he called Donald, but who was registered as Stokes. "Now, I believe in everything, especially in women, from my own grandmother down to 'Ginx's Baby.' I mean to get up a flirtation with the widow if I can."

"I don't suppose you'll have much trouble for all she seems so reserved and shy," said Mrs. Alger, demurely.

"She doesn't talk much at present, certainly," rejoined Mr. Stokes; "but I daresay she'll put the steam on by-and-by."

"I think she's stupid," added the lady.

"She can afford to be stupid," said the obtuse but chivalrous Alger, "for she's deucedly handsome."

"A woman ought to talk well or look well, or she isn't fit to live," said Stokes; "she certainly does the one, and it is not every one who can do both—like yourself," he added, with a most insinuating smile, at which barefaced compliment the lady simpered and her liege lord's face radiated; he nudged her elbow, his usual fashion of calling her attention to any special thing.

"Oh, I say, Clara, come, after that——" He did not finish his speech—he rarely did; he stumbled into the middle and then cut himself adrift from his sentence altogether. At this moment they were approaching the bow of the vessel. The widow had seated herself upon a coil of ropes and was looking over the bulwarks watching the white foam-flakes rushing along and leaping up the sides of the vessel. As the group paused momentarily before her, she looked up and met the full gaze of Mr. Jaggers's searching eyes, hers drooped and turned away.

"My God!" he exclaimed, in a low smothered tone; though not so low but it reached the ears of his young friend Stokes.

"Why, what is it?—what is the matter?" he inquired.

"Nothing. I was struck by a likeness—that's all. I fancy I must have seen her before," replied Mr. Jaggers.

"And I should think she was the last person in the world you would be likely to see—quite off your beat. Look at her. She's a lady, no doubt about that; but you're always finding likenesses—a dangerous faculty that. Only yesterday you said I was like somebody who was hanged ten years ago.

The next day was stormy; there were no ladies on deck and few gentlemen. The sea had worked itself into a state of foaming fury; there was a high wind, all sails were set, and the vessel made rapid way, going at the rate of fifteen knots an hour, cutting her way bravely through the watery mountains which rose and roared on all sides of her. Indeed, everything rose except our spirits, and they fell below zero as we lay moaning in our cabins, envying those masculine adventurers who were able to venture on deck and enjoy the full grandeur of the storm—the tumult of the world of waters. The next day the weather moderated, the storm passed, leaving only a heavy swell behind it. We heard the heavy tramp of footsteps overhead and cheerful voices full of exuberant health and spirits exchanging "Good-mornings," and merry jests and jokes seemed passing round, judging by the bursts of laughter that reached us; then, one by one, we crept on deck as flies creep out of a crevice to enjoy the first gleam of sunshine.

Mrs. Sydney was already on deck, carrying what young Stokes stigmatized as that "shrieking abomination" in her arms. Many strong arms would have relieved her of it, but her manner was repellant, and seemed to resent rather than be grateful for any attention either from her own or the opposite sex. The gentlemen, especially the younger portion, felt aggrieved at seeing this young creature so heavily weighted, but had not courage to press their undesired services upon her.

"What big brutes we are," growled the admiring young Scotchman; "great hulking fellows, lounging about with our hands in our pockets, while she—by Jove! I can't stand it." He strode across the deck—made straight for the beautiful young widow.

"Allow me, please," he exclaimed, taking the stordy boy from her unresisting hands and marching away in triumph, holding it with the grace of an elephant, and making the most ridiculous zoological noises to amuse it. Mrs. Sydney simply yielded the child to him without a caress or tender word; indeed, it was observed that she showed no maternal tenderness to the child, only a kind of wooden devotion. Being temporarily relieved from her charge, she sat down, and Mr. Stokes strolled up and stood beside her.

"Your first voyage?" he said, inquiringly, making the first step towards the threatened flirtation which seemed to be a more difficult business than he at first supposed.

"Yes," she answered, briefly.

"Ah!" he exclaimed, rubbing his hands gleefully together. "I hope we shall have a jolly time yet, though last night wasn't very promising."

"Wasn't it?" she said, languidly, as though she was not interested at all in the matter.

"Well, scarcely," he answered, opening his eyes. "We don't often have such weather as that in July. Why, even poor old Jaggers was down, and it takes a good deal to bowl him over."

"Jaggers! Who is Jaggers?" she asked, lifting her beautiful eyes to his face, and for the first time waking up with some little interest.

"Well, Jaggers is a friend of mine," replied young Stokes; "that tall, grim looking, elderly party."

"I know that," she exclaimed, impatiently "I meant what is he?"

"Oh! what is he?" echoed Mr Stokes, seemingly taken aback. "Well, that is another question. He don't care for everybody to know exactly what he is."

"No!" she exclaimed, in sweet surprise "At first I thought he was the captain. He certainly looks like an officer."

"You're near it. You wouldn't like to sail in his ship, though; you'd be sure to get wrecked or landed between four stone walls."

"I don't understand," said Mrs. Sydney, glancing up at him with a puzzled, inquiring look. The young man looked out over the sea, as though he didn't care to be tempted into further confidence. "I should like to know," she added, "but, of course, don't tell me if it's a secret. He is so like somebody I've seen before."

"By Jove! that is exactly what he said of you."

"Really; well, we may turn out to be old friends, who knows? I'm more than ever interested in Mr. Jaggers."

"The last man in the world I should have thought likely to interest a lady—it would pay better to be interested in me now," he laughed, carelessly.

"Oh, there is interest and interest," said Mrs. Sydney, as she dropped her eyes and turned away. The young man was silent for a moment, then rejoined, with the confidence beauty frequently inspires in his inexperienced sex:

"I'm sure you're to be trusted, Mrs. Sydney, but it doesn't do to let these things get afloat. We don't want everybody to know everything."

"Of course not."

"Well," he added, confidently, "Jaggers is A 1 at Scotland Yard, a first-rate hand. Once give him the scent, he's like a bloodhound—sure to run his man down."

"Ah, a police detective," she repeated, under her breath. He nodded. "What a dreadful man!"

"Not at all," said Mr. Stokes; "he is the best fellow in the world, except in the way of business; there, he's as hard as nails."

The announcement that he was as "hard as nails" did not seem to increase his popularity in the young widow's eyes.

"It's a mean, sneaky way of getting a living," she rejoined, "and all the talking in the world cannot make it anything else.'

"I don't know about that," he answered; "one evil creates another, you know. So long as thieves run ahead there must be somebody to catch 'em. On the whole, I think the 'detective' is a grand institution, a necessary one, too; and so you'd think if you'd lost your jewelry, and he," jerking his head towards Jaggers, "had recovered it for you."

"I suppose I should," she answered, demurely; "in such cases we are apt to be selfish."

"Yes," rejoined the young fellow, "and, generally speaking, we are quite ready to shake hands with the sinner when we benefit by the sin."

"Perhaps," she answered, glancing up with a shy, winning smile into his face; "but I don't think I should choose the sinner for my traveling companion, especially on a pleasure excursion," she added, emphatically.

He laughed and rubbed his hands together, as though he rather enjoyed the idea.

"So you think we're on a pleasure excursion," he chuckled.

"At least it looks like it," she answered.

"Ah, but you shouldn't judge by appearances! It is quite the reverse. And you? Well, I suppose we have been speculating about one another. I vote that we strike a bargain—you tell me your story, and I'll tell you ours."

The lady looked down and played nervously with the folds of her dress as she answered.

"Mine is soon told. I—I am a widow, as you see, and I am going to join my friends in Canada. And you?" she added, inquiringly.

"Well, we're likely to have rather a rough time of it," he answered, hesitating a moment; then adding, briskly, "You've heard of the great jewel robbery, I suppose? All London ablaze with it. A wonderfully mysterious affair," he added, knitting his brows; "but I think we're on the right track. Jaggers is rather close, but I know a thing or two."

"But what have you to do with it?" she inquired, with some interest.

"Not much, really. I'm going partly for pleasure, partly for the purpose of identification. I think I can swear to the fellow we're after."

The widow regarded him with a look of furtive inquiry as she inquired, in a low voice, almost under her breath:

"Is he in Canada?"

He nodded confidently.

"Sailed two days ago. We telegraphed to the police at Quebec. They'll look after him and take good care of him. Jaggers will just want time to slip the bracelets on, and we'll be back in London in no time."

"Don't talk any more. It makes me sad to hear about such things."

She got up and walked to the other side of the deck. He whistled as he leaned against the bulwarks and watched the lithe figure pacing briskly to and fro.

"Whew!" he whistled, softly; then added, half aloud, "How sensitive these delicate women are! What a fool I was to talk to her!" He pulled his fair mustache perplexedly as he added "What would Jaggers say?"

It was getting dark—too late for ring-toss, and shovel-board was wiped from the deck. People strolled up and down, some singing snatches of old songs, some indulging in desultory chit-chat—the small change of society which always passes current when the pure gold of conversation lies like a drug in the market for want of circulation. The young newly-married couple were seated in the bow of the vessel, feasting daintily on their honeymoon, which threatened to give out before the end of the journey. The monotonous music of the sailors' "Yo heave ho!" mingled with the cheery voice of our captain as he passed hither and thither, exchanging pleasant words by the way. He was a bronzed old sea dog, the commodore of the line. We often wondered when our captain slept, or if he was a human machine, warranted to go ten days without winding up; for he had the faculty of popping up on all parts of the vessel at the most unexpected times and places. His sharp eyes were everywhere. Nothing escaped his observation, from a speck upon the deck to a bluebottle fluttering among the shrouds and sails of his vessel. The most perfect discipline prevailed everywhere.

As the evening closed in the skies grew overcast and a drizzling rain began to fall, it seemed to damp everybody's spirits; conversation languished, and the deck was speedily cleared. Some betook themselves to the saloon and improvised a musical entertainment for their own benefit, for the most lugubrious strains and mutilated fragments of popular melodies floated through the skylight and died a natural death in the evening air. Some adjourned to the smoking-room, and others in solitary state descended to their cozy cabins and there made themselves at home. If the sea had not been as smooth as a billiard-table there would not have been much of the "at home" about it, but Neptune was in a drowsy mood, and all went well.

How to Make Moss Baskets.

VERY beautiful baskets for holding flowers can be made of the longer and more feathery kinds of mosses. A light frame, of any shape you like, should be made with wire, and covered with common pasteboard or calico, and the moss, which should first be well picked over and cleansed from any bits of dirt or dead leaves which may be hanging about it, gathered into little tufts and sewed with a coarse needle and thread to the covering, so as to clothe it thickly with a close and compact coating, taking care that the points of the moss are all outward. A long handle, made in the same manner, should be attached to the basket, and a tin or other vessel, filled with either wet sand or water placed within to hold the flowers. By dipping the whole structure into water once in three or four days, its verdure and elasticity will be fully preserved, and a block of wood about an inch thick, and stained black or green, if placed under the basket, will prevent all risk of damage to the table from moisture.

Frozen Earth in Siberia.

PROFESSOR NORDENSKJOLD investigated the formation of the strata of frozen earth, several hundred feet thick, which occurs in Siberia as in polar America. Along the coast of Siberia there is a stratum of water resting on the bottom of the sea, which is several degrees below freezing-point, so that a flask of the comparatively fresh surface water, when sunk into this stratum, begins to freeze. Stuxberg observed that the trawl net often froze fast to the bottom. This was accounted for by the freezing of the fresh water which the net carried down with it from the surface. Nordenskjold thinks that the mud carried down by the rivers into the sea, as it sinks to the bottom, carries with it fresh water adhering to the minute particles, and that this fresh water, like that carried down by the net, freezes at the bottom, forming thus a frozen stratum, which increases year by year, until it reaches an enormous thickness. He is of opinion that a portion of the earthy layers of Siberia was formed in this way, although, he adds, he by no means considers this the only way in which such formations arose.

Pretty Lamp Shades.

AT a recent dinner party, the ladies amused themselves in the evening by making impromptu lamp shades, so novel, so easy, and so pretty, that I will describe them. A sheet of ordinary-colored tissue paper is taken, folded once, and held in the thumb and finger of the left hand, like a pocket-handkerchief. It is then drawn through the right hand, from top to bottom, over and over again, till it is a mere wisp. An inch is cut off the point at the top, to form the hole for the chimney of the lamp to pass through; the paper is then spread out, and falls in four graceful crimped points. The shade is complete: and when dexterously put over the globe (before the lamp is turned up very bright) throws a pretty, subdued light. Pink, pale green, yellow or violet are all favorite colors; and when two or more colors are put over each other, the effect is very pretty. It is thus easy to vary the lamp shades, and to have a selection of all colors in reserve. The soft, subdued light of the shades is pleasant, and at the same time becoming. Pretty shades can be made of gold paper, with delicate fern fronds or ivy leaves, first pressed and partially dried, and then gummed on and varnished, an edge of light lace added round at the last. Old discolored shades can be re-covered, and thus renovated with advantage.

Wedding of Russian Women.

THE Russian papers publish an edifying account of a marriage celebrated about a year ago between two female peasants. The woman who played the part of husband was one Agnithe Ivanoff, of Novgorod, a truly unprincipled person, who, in the first place, deceived the authorities by taking out a passport in the name, not of "Agathe," but of "Alexandra." Agathe then put on men's clothes and changed in her passport "Alexandra" to "Alexander." The self-styled Alexander Ivanoff made, soon after, the acquaintance of one Prascovia, a peasant girl from Olonets, proposed marriage to her, and was accepted. A few weeks ago, an official to whom Alexandra or Alexander Ivanoff had occasion to exhibit the altered passport, recognized the erasure and substitution of letters, and ordered the passport-bearer to be arrested. The woman has since been sentenced to a fine and short term of imprisonment for having tampered with her passport, but no action, it seems, can be taken against her in connection with the strange alliance which Alexandra or Alexander has contracted, the offense of marrying a person of the same sex being one unprovided for by the Russian law.

Cultivation of the Vine in Europe.

IT is estimated that the land in Europe devoted to the cultivation of the vine amounts, in round numbers, to about 6,808,000 hectares (one hectare is equal to nearly two and one-half acres), producing annually about 349,764,000 hectolitres (one hectolitre is equal to twenty-two gallons), as follows—France, 2,400,000 hectares, 63,000,000 hectolitres; Italy, 1,800,000 hectares, 30,000,000 hectolitres; Spain, 1,400,000 hectares, 27,000,000 hectolitres; Austria, 700,000 hectares, 19,500,000 hectolitres; Portugal, 300,000 hectares, 5,000,000 hectolitres; Germany, 170,000 hectares, 4,400,000 hectolitres; Greece, 50,000 hectares, 1,150,000 hectolitres; Switzerland 34,000 hectares, 1,100,000 hectolitres; Roumania, 34,000 hectares, 1,300,000 hectolitres; Russia, 20,000 hectares, 610,000 hectolitres.

Household Perils.

UNDER this head the Boston Journal of Chemistry names several dangerous substances which find their way into households. There are two or three volatile liquids used in families which are particularly dangerous, and must be employed, if at all, with special care. Benzine, ether and strong ammonia constitute this class of agents. The two first-named liquids are employed in cleansing gloves and other wearing apparel, and in removing oil-stains from carpets, curtains, etc. The liquids are highly volatile, and flash into vapor so soon as the cork of the vial containing them is removed. Their vapors are very combustible, and will inflame at long distances from ignited candles or gas flames, and consequently they should never be used in the evening, when the house is lighted. Explosions of a very dangerous nature will occur if the vapor of these liquids is permitted to escape into the room in considerable quantity. In view of the great hazard of handling these liquids, cautious housekeepers will not allow them to be brought into their dwellings, and this course is commendable. As regards ammonia, or water of ammonia, it is a very powerful agent, especially the stronger kinds sold by druggists. An accident in its use has recently come under our notice, in which a young lady lost her life from taking a few drops through mistake. Breathing the gas under certain circumstances causes serious harm to the lungs and membranes of the mouth and nose. It is an agent much used at the present time for cleansing purposes, and it is unobjectionable if proper care is used in its employment. The vials holding it should be kept apart from others containing medicines, etc., and rubber stoppers to the vials should be used. Oxalic acid is considerably employed in families for cleaning brass and copper utensils. This substance is highly poisonous, and must be kept and used with great caution. In crystalline structure it closely resembles sulphate of magnesia or Epsom salts, and, therefore, frequent mistakes are made and lives lost. Every agent which goes into families among inexperienced persons should be kept in a safe place, and labeled properly, and used with care.

A Martial Ornament.

HUNGARIANS are celebrated for their remarkably fine mustaches, and are in the habit of devoting much care to the cultivation of this martial ornament. The national custom originated with a number of cavalry regiments who distinguished themselves in the wars against the Turks, and whose colonels, finding that the fashion served to inspire the troopers with manly pride and dashing gallantry, made the training and cultivating of the mustaches a regulation affair. A beardless youth was excluded from cavalry service. Here is the method employed, and which is in daily use throughout the land among men who set their pride upon the display of a fine curly and provokingly sticking-out mustaches. After the morning ablution, and while the beard is still wet, a piece of string is drawn across the face, under the nose, and fastened over both ears. Both hands then twist the hair around the string, to which an extra pull is given, with a final fastening behind the ears. In this ingenious condition of early toilet, one may comfortably get through breakfast and a lot of early work indoors, and emerge at noon with a more or less fierce and martial countenance, the pride of the girls and the object of envious swells ignorant of the plan. During the French wars towards the end of the last and the beginning of this century, there was one Hungarian hussar regiment specially distinguished for the magnificence and dereeness of its mustaches. The regulation exacted a display of five inches of hair, in corkscrew form and shape, on each side of the upper lip, and, when nature's supply proved insufficient, the regulation length had to be made of bits of horsetail worked into pricking points at each end by means of a sticky mass of grease and wax, which became known in Paris during the Restoration under the elegant name of "Pommade Hongroise."

London Clubs.

WHITAKER'S ALMANAC for 1880 contains a list of upwards of seventy London clubs, with the date of their establishment, number of the members, amount of subscription, etc. Of these, five date from the last century, and are well known to readers of English history and literature. They are, White's (1736), the Cocoa Tree (1746), Boodle's (1762), Brooks's—the famous Whig Club—(1764) and Arthur's (1765). These are all situated in St. James Street, and the number of members is limited in each of them to 600, except the Cocoa Tree Club, which has a limit of 350. They are all very choice. Besides these, the Travelers' Club, established in 1819, with 730 members; the Turf Club, established in 1868, with 350; and the Marlborough Club, established in 1869, with 450 members, are very exclusive clubs—election to which is attended with much difficulty. The professional and political clubs are much larger than these, having from 1,000 to 1,500 members each. The principal literary clubs are the Athenæum, the United University, the Oxford and Cambridge, the New University, the Junior Athenæum, and the Garrick. The political clubs are the Carlton, Conservative, Junior Carlton and St. Stephen's clubs, belonging to the Conservative party, and, besides Brooks's, the Reform, Devonshire and City Liberal clubs, connected with the Liberal party. Two clubs, the Albemarle and the Russell, are for both ladies and gentlemen. The highest entrance fee is that charged at the Traveler's—forty guineas—and the highest annual assessment is fifteen guineas, charged at the Turf Club. The usual admission fee is from twenty to thirty guineas, and the usual assessment ten guineas.

A Frigid Dwelling.

A HOUSE of ice, similar to that which was built in the Empress Anne's reign, is about to be constructed in the Zoological Garden at Moscow. The managers of that establishment have found among its archives some valuable details as to the mode of building which was adopted on the former occasion, and they will be adhered to in the present instance. The first edifice was raised between the Admiralty and the Winter Palace at St. Petersburg, in 1740, and was formed throughout—walls, roof, windows, decorations alike—of ice. The blocks were cut in a square shape and their surfaces sprinkled with water, which, when the cubes were placed in juxtaposition, froze in the interstices and bound the whole into one compact and solid mass. At the entrance of the structure was a large gallery filled with statues. The pilasters on the exterior were fashioned to imitate green marbles. The antechamber possessed four windows and the other rooms five each, while on the sills stood vases filled with flowers made of ice, shrub-like plants, covered with birds of the same material, standing at the corners. Clock cases, chairs, tables, wardrobes, utensils, candelabra, bed, were all of ice.

Killing Fish with Dynamite.

IN several of the counties in Northern Georgia there is much excitement over a new and terrible method of killing fish, which is being practiced with great efficacy. When the Government Surveyors were improving the beds of the Etowah and Coosa Rivers they used dynamite in blasting rock. It was discovered that the explosions were very fatal to the fish all around them. The shock was so terrible that hundreds of dead or stunned fish would rise to the surface and be easily taken. The people around the country heard of this destruction of fish, and resolved to put it into practical use. They procured a number of dynamite cartridges, and began such a killing of fish as was never heard of before. The practice rapidly spread until now it is common in several counties in North Georgia. A place in the stream is baited well for several days, until fish congregate thickly there. Then the managers of the destructive plans go to work. The dynamite cartridge is placed deep under the water. It is exploded by means of a small galvanic battery or by some cheaper method. A terrible stir is made in the water, and for yards around fish are killed by the hundreds. Not far from Cartersville, the other day, 300 pounds of fish were thus killed in one stream. The news of this practice is rapidly spreading, and wherever it is heard of there is a desire to try it. The destruction of fish in the streams and ponds is consequently terrible. Much indignation is felt by those who deem this an extravagant waste of fish, but there seems to be no way to prevent it.

PICTORIAL SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN ILLUSTRATED PRESS.

Winter in Paris.

While the Winter has been very open and mild in the neighborhood of New York, it has been unusually severe in Europe. For the first time in eleven years there has been sleighing in Rome. In Paris the season has been quite phenomenal. Heavy falls of snow have blocked the thoroughfares and crushed in numerous buildings, while the cold has been so severe that the Seine was frozen over and braziers were set up in the prominent streets to enable pedestrians to warm themselves. Our illustrations give a good idea of the gay capital under the sway of the ice king.

The Royal Reception in Madrid.

Immediately after the royal wedding, the King and his young bride received, in the Throne-room of the Palace, the members of his council, the high dignitaries of State, the Diplomatic Corps and prominent officers of the army and navy. Each person passed before their Majesties with hat in hand, the King bowing and the Queen smiling. The nerves of the Queen have been almost shattered by the late attempt on the King's life, and much pity is felt for her, particularly as she has developed serious malady to which she has never before been subject.

The Czar's Last Escape.

The last attempt on the life of the Czar was made on December 1st, at a point on the railroad near Moscow, where it was intended to spring a powder-mine beneath the track as the imperial train passed over. A change was made in the running of the passenger and the baggage trains, so that the former, with the Czar and suite, passed over the mine in safety, while the baggage train which usually precedes the other, was nearly blown to pieces by the explosion. As on all previous occasions of a similar character, when His Majesty entered St. Petersburg and showed himself to the people, he received the most profound demonstrations of loyalty. The streets through which he was driven were crowded with the élite of the city, and wherever he appeared for several days he was cheered lustily.

Military Ballooning in South Africa.

The science of military ballooning is rapidly being brought to perfection by the British officers. The most marked improvements have been made in South Africa during the Zulu war, where the new system has been tested with much success. In the illustration the scene on the left shows the balloon at an elevation, with the line like signaling apparatus at rest, and that on the right represents the officers in the act of communicating with their comrades by the apparatus.

The "Devastation."

This formidable vessel, which has recently been added to the French navy, is the type of a class now much in favor with naval architects, being built with armored turrets and a central battery projecting beyond the sides of the vessel for lateral firing, and having a formidable ram. Her keel was laid on the stocks at Toulon in 1876, and she was launched on the 26th of August last. The vessel is propelled by means of two powerful twin screws worked by engines of between 3,000 and 4,000 horse power. The speed already attained on her trial trip was between fourteen and fifteen knots per hour. The Devastation is also fully rigged, so that under ordinary circumstances of navigation she can move independently of her steam power.

—OF the quantity of cotton-seed oil exported from New Orleans to foreign countries during the past year, it is said 1,800,000 gallons went to Italy and 600,000 gallons to France.

—IN consequence of the revolutionary agitation having extended to the troops, the Russian military authorities have ordered that henceforth no regiment shall be stationed in the district where it was recruited.

—ALL attempts to raise the German iron-clad Grosser Kurfürst being fruitless, the German Admiralty is considering the advisability of blowing up the vessel, with a view to recovering the material in fragments.

—OUR Consul-General in Canada reports that the trade of Canada with Great Britain fell off last year and the trade with America increased. The new tariff of the Dominion has already reversed this state of affairs.

—A CHORUS of boys, fifty in number, has been formed at the College of Music in Cincinnati for the purpose of performing secular works. It is believed that this is the only choir of the sort ever formed on so large a scale in this country.

—MR. A. P. SPRAGUE, of the International Code Committee, has transmitted to Secretary Evarts the recent resolution of the committee relating to collisions at sea. Mr. Evarts has submitted the matter to the President for his action.

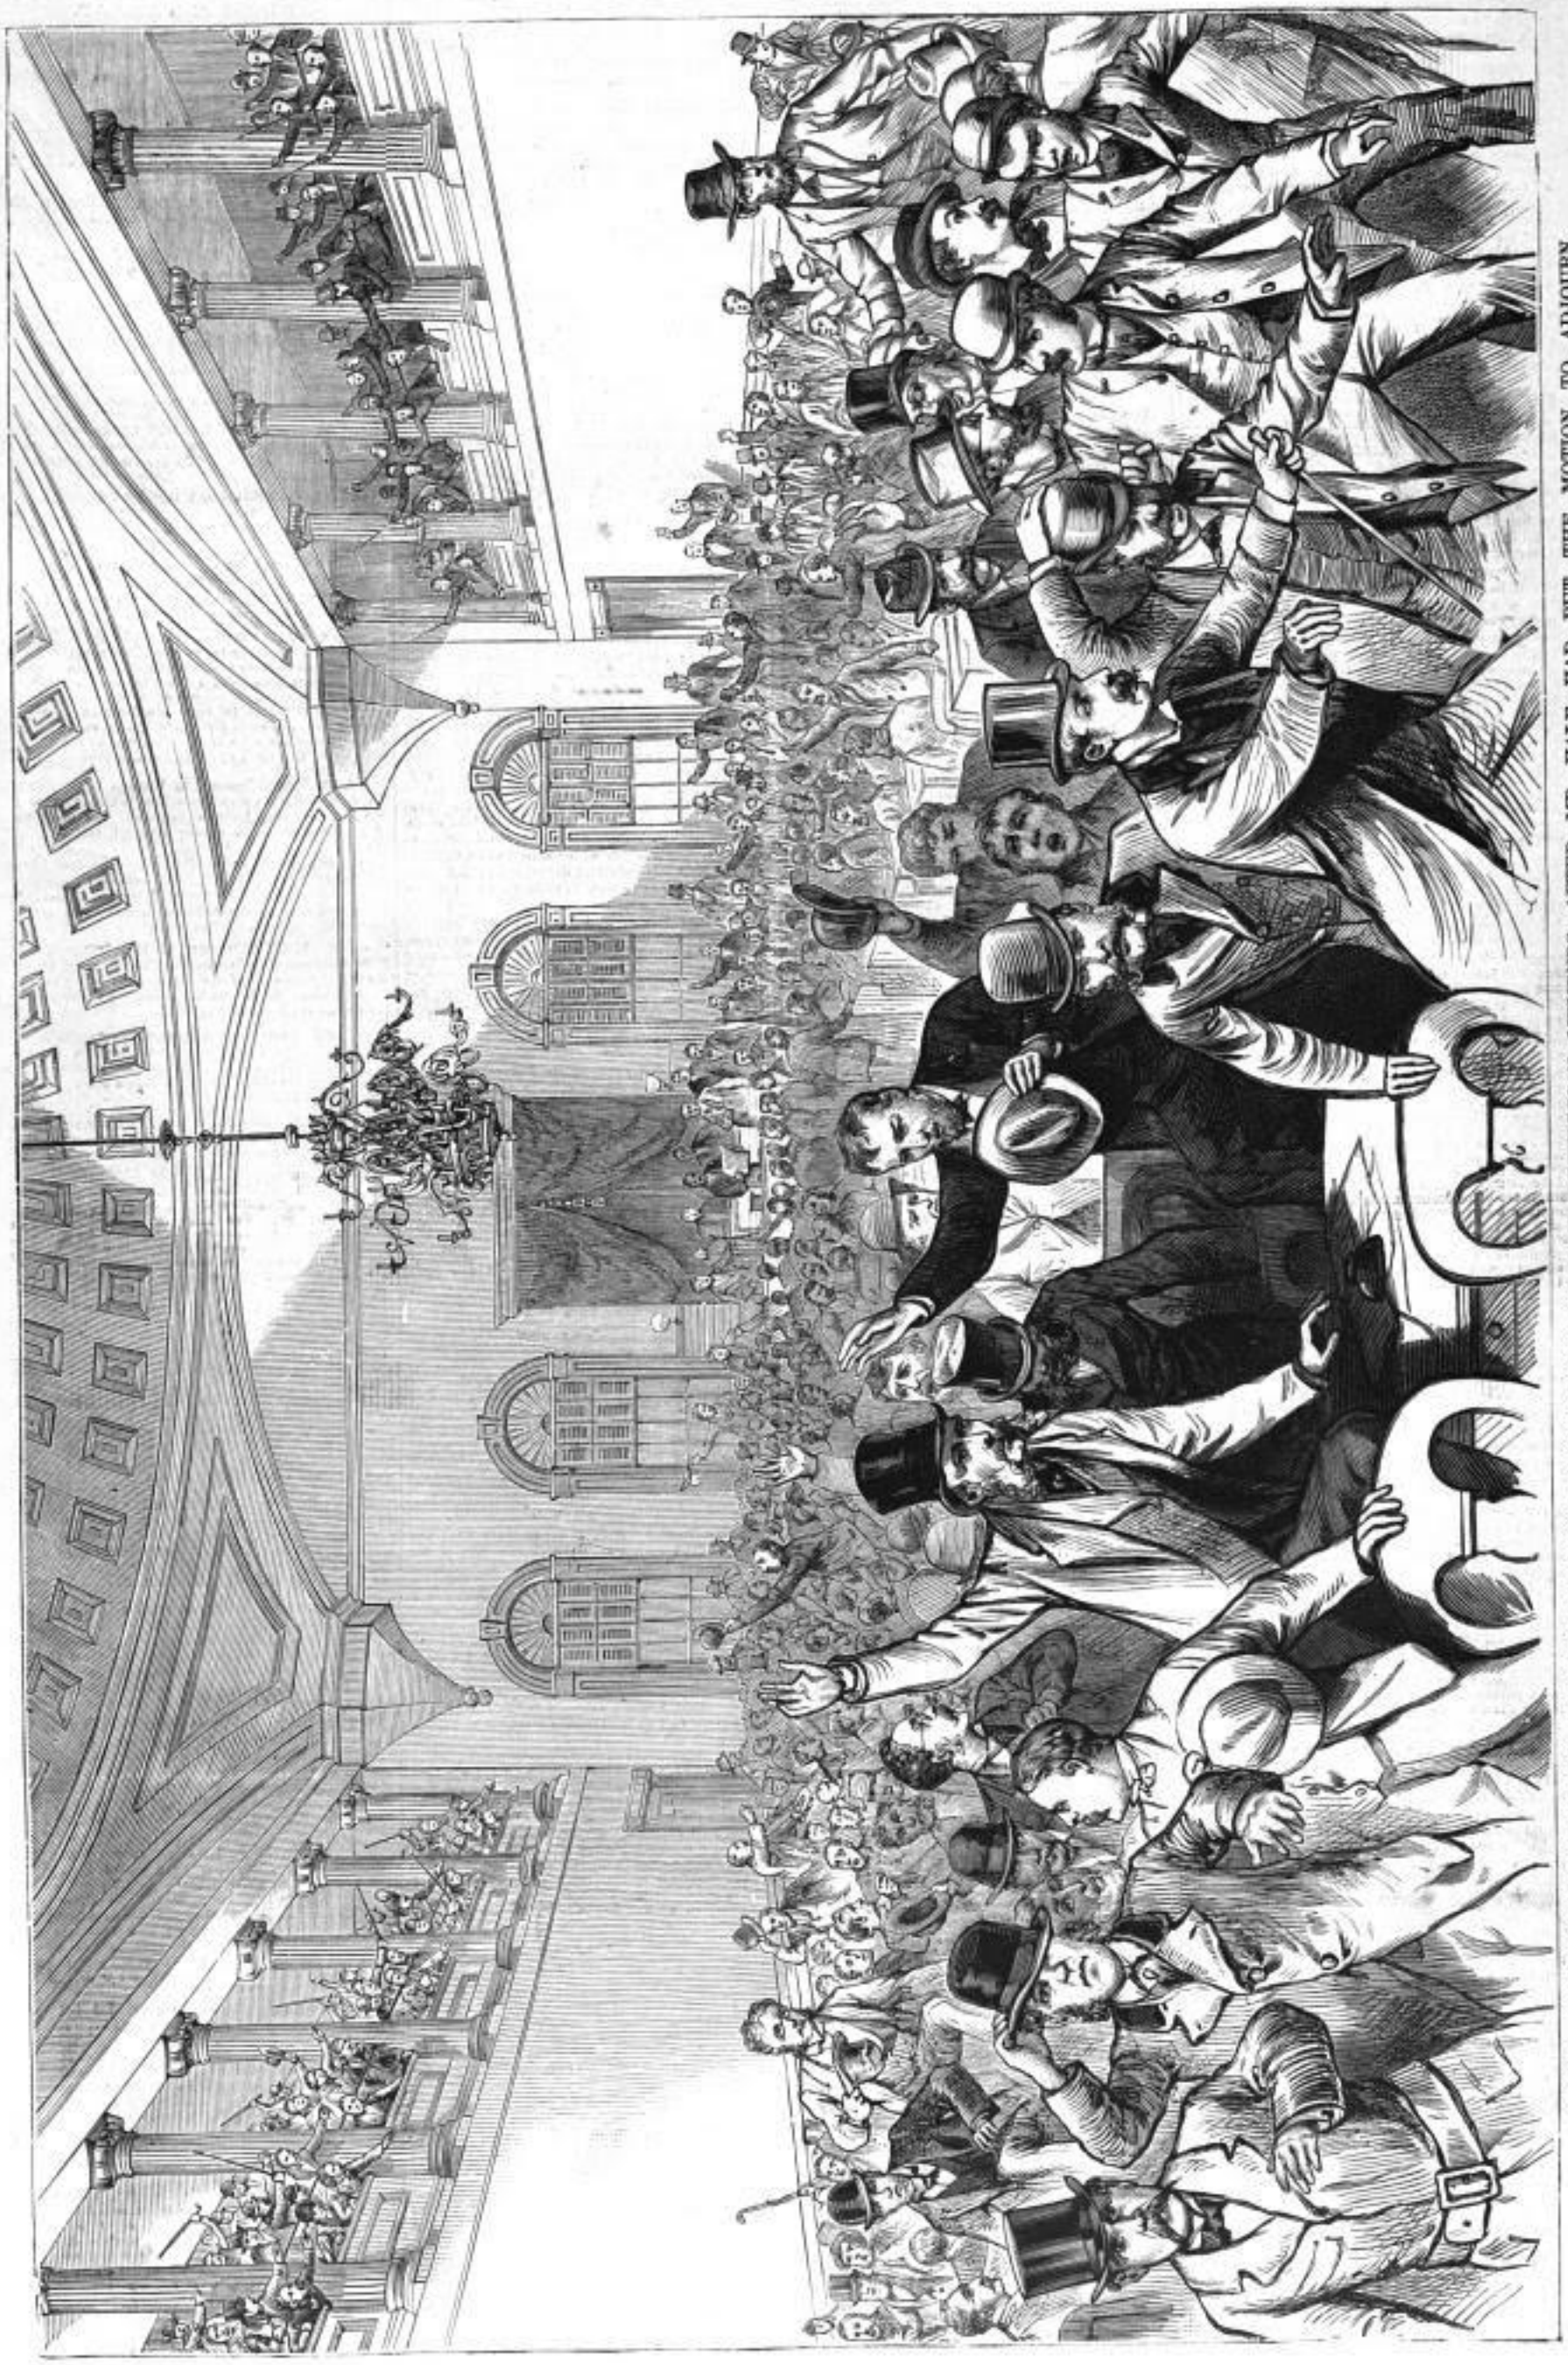
The Prince has also ordered, for the same purpose, 10,000 seedlings of the pinus cembra Manschurica, which is largely cultivated in Switzerland and the south of Austria.

—THE Russian Technical Society invite foreign exhibits, especially of such inventions as have not yet been introduced into Russia, for the exhibition of new machines, apparatus and tools of all classes except agricultural implements, to be open at St. Petersburg during the Winter, and until the 15th of next May.

—DURING the recent cold snap in Paris, the bodies of a young man and maiden were found frozen and buried in snow in the ditch of the fortifications. They were lovers; their parents had forbidden them to see each other; they were in the habit of meeting clandestinely in the ditch, and the extreme cold induced congestion of the brain.



—THE latest dispatches from the Vatican to Brussels are couched in a very firm tone. It is stated that the Papal Government, having done its utmost to avoid a conflict, can only now await the final decision of the Belgian Government. The Nuncio is instructed to quit his post at once should the proposal of the Left to abolish the Embassy to the Vatican be accepted by Ministers.

—IT is thought that a crisis in the history of Vesuvius is approaching; either there will be a great discharge, such as will terrify the neighborhood, or, as is more likely, there will be an overflowing of lava, covering the cone with a mantle of fire, and silently inflicting more destruction on property than a grand eruption. Vesuvius has been in an active state now for several years, and Professor Palmieri has from the first prophesied that the eruption would consist in the overflow of lava.

—A CONVENTION has been concluded between France and Switzerland respecting the military service of the sons of Frenchmen naturalized in Switzerland. They are to be considered Frenchmen until they come of age and choose their nationality. If they make no choice they remain French. Children, however, born after their father's naturalization are Swiss citizens. The Swiss military service of the former class is postponed till they are twenty-two years of age, but with the sanction of their parents or guardians they can join the French army at twenty if they intend to be Frenchmen.

—NORRIS CASTLE, Isle of Wight, which was lately put up to auction, has been purchased by the Duke of Edinburgh as a marine residence. It is a handsome mansion in the modern castellated style, standing on high ground between Osborne and East Cowes and commanding a fine view of the Solent and Southampton Water. It was built somewhat less than a century ago from the designs of J. Wyatt (afterwards Sir Jeffery Wyatville), the architect for Lord Henry Seymour, from whom it was rented for some years by the Duchess of Kent, and her Majesty spent a part of her childhood there.

HON. ALONZO GARCELON, GOVERNOR OF MAINE.

ORGANIZATION OF THE MAINE LEGISLATURE.

THE Legislature of Maine was organized on Wednesday, January 7th, without bloodshed, but not without scenes of great excitement. At an early hour of the morning the State House at Augusta was besieged by the largest crowd ever seen there, composed of members-elect, with and without the Governor's certificate, counted-out candidates, contestants, a number of ex-Governors, State officers, representatives of the press, and other interested parties.

At 10 o'clock the Senators-elect were called to order by the Hon. Samuel M. Lane, the Secretary of the last Senate. Prayer was offered by the Rev. Samuel Upjohn. The roll was called, and all the members responded to their names. Senator Locke, of Cumberland, at once gained the floor and read a protest from the Republican members against the Senate proceedings. The Secretary refused to entertain the motion, and a messenger was sent to the Governor and Council, informing them that the members-elect were present for the purpose of being qualified. The Governor and Council appeared and the oaths were administered. Senator Locke then renewed his motion, but the Secretary would not entertain it.

The Senate then elected John D. Lawson as President of the Senate, the Republicans refusing to serve on the committees or participate in the election of officers. They also entered a protest declaring that the choice was not made by legally-elected members of the Senate. A. G. Andrews was elected as Secretary, and Francis B. Green as Assistant Secretary. The other Fusion candidates nominated in caucus the previous night were also elected.

The principal interest of the event centred in the House, where, it is said, there were scenes never before witnessed in New England. The chamber was crowded throughout. About nine o'clock the Assistant Clerk, W. E. Gibbs, called the House to order. When the drawing of seats was announced all the members responded to their names except the Republicans and a few non-affiliating Fusionists. Later the Republicans took part in the drawing of seats. The critical moment was when the Assistant Clerk refused to put a motion to adjourn, and ex-Congressman Hale, standing upon a desk, put the motion himself. The motion was followed by deafening applause and the immediate withdrawal of the Republican members, who, in their rush for the doors, stumbled over desks, chairs, and each other. A message was then sent to the Governor and Council, stating that a quorum of members of the House were present and ready to be qualified. The Governor soon appeared and the members were qualified. He then announced that seventy-six members, being a quorum, had taken the necessary oaths and now formed the regularly and duly constituted House of Representatives. This announcement was received with wild applause outside. The Governor then said that he would lay before the House the opinion of the Supreme Court and the petition of gentlemen from certain cities claiming seats, and would ask that the documents be carefully considered.

On Friday Major-General Chamberlain assumed command of the public property and institutions, promising to hold them in trust for the people until Governor Garcelon's successor was legally elected and duly qualified. Representatives Swan, Harriman and Clark made statements to the effect that $1,000 each had been offered them by Wallace R. White if they would absent themselves from the House, deliver up their certificates, and resign their positions. The Senate vote on Thursday to investigate the charges of bribery was, on Friday, reconsidered and then laid on the table. President Lawson of the Senate has, from legal doubts of his authority to do so, declined to qualify the Republican Representatives-elect.

MEMBERS-ELECT, CONTESTANTS AND SPECTATORS CROWDING INTO THE STATE HOUSE EARLY IN THE MORNING.

THE LUCK OF JANUARY.

JANUARY would seem to be a month of evil omen for modern sovereigns, whose deaths and disasters form a very large proportion of its most noteworthy anniversaries. On the 1st, 1477, Charles the Bold, Duke of Burgundy, was killed by the Swiss; and the allied armies entered France in 1814, to begin the campaign that overthrew Napoleon. On the 5th, the death of Edward the Confessor ushered in the series of complications which ended in the Norman conquest of England. On the 9th, Napoleon III. died in exile. Louis XVI. was beheaded on the 21st, and the 23d brought the same fate to the ambitious Duke of Somerset, Regent and virtual King of England during the minority of Edward VI. The 30th was doubly fatal to the house of Stuart, having witnessed both the execution of Charles I. and the death of Prince Charles Edward, the hero of the final attempt to expel the Hanoverian dynasty in 1745. But apart from these tragedies, the Wolf-Month, as the Saxons called it, is rich in other and less gloomy associations. The present Emperor of Germany became King of Prussia on the 2d. Sophia was taken by the Russians on the 3d (1877), and the Turkish army captured at Schipka Pass on the 8th. The destruction of England's Cabul army in 1842 marks the 9th. The 14th witnessed the seizure of Danish ships in British ports (1801), which preluded the destruction of the whole Danish fleet by Nelson at Copenhagen two months later. Fort Fisher fell on the 16th. General Skobeleff's brilliant victory at Shenovo, which virtually ended the Russo-Turkish war, marks the 17th, which has also the greater renown of the birth of Benjamin Franklin. On the 18th, the German Empire was established by King William's assumption of the imperial crown at Versailles. The same day witnessed the birth of Louis XIV.'s famous Minister, Louvois. Lords Bacon and Byron were born on the 22d. On the 23d, the Duke of Edinburgh married the Czar's only daughter, Maria Alexandrovna. The 24th is the birthday of Frederick the Great. Paris was taken on the 28th (1870), and Ehrenbreitstein, for the first and last time, on the 29th (1799). The 30th witnessed the execution of Guy Fawkes, and the marriage of Napoleon III. to Eugenie de Montijo. To the same list may be added the first sailing of Warren Hastings for India as an unknown civilian (1750), the storming of the great Sikh fortress of Mooltan by the British (1849), and the reorganization of the Russian Army (1874).

DÉSOLÉ.

STRAIGHT through a drear, unending night,
Not lit by any faintest star,
He journeys onward, and his sight
Can gauge no limit near or far.

No hope, no passion, no regret
Can turn him to the right or left;
As one who knows the pattern set,
He weaves it blindly, warp and weft.

And yet, at times, his thought will dare,
To question if it were not well
To change this life, so blank and bare,
Even for the lurid lights of hell!

He knows not if the skies be vast,
He knows not if the seas be deep,
He hopes but one thing, that, at last,
"He giveth His beloved sleep."

Then to a grim and weary smile
He curls his mouth, as who should say
"Beloved in what Godlike style—
In what recondite, wondrous way!"

JOHN MORAN.

THE HIDDEN WITNESS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THAT HUSBAND OF MINE."

CHAPTER XXI.—DIDN'T WANT TO KNOW THE SCHOOLMA'AM.

"LETTERS!" cried Eve, as Dee, after toiling up the hill, threw her dusty sunbonnet on the piazza-steps and sat down panting.

"Yes, missee—two of 'em. Lord love me, I bleeves I's growin' old—or fat."

"It's too bad of me, Dee, to let you go so far; you know I might have gone myself. Why will you persist in making me so useless?"

"'Cause I knows my duty, missee," laughed the woman. "I doesn't done forgit that you's de lady of de house. But, what does you think? I met old Barby on the road, an' she says thar's a han'some Northern gal come to Miss Salome's, and she's going to be a teacher."

Eve's lip curled.

"Salome's taste is questionable," she said. "What is the girl's name?"

"Brown, Miss Eve; and Barby says she's jest the han'somest young white critter she ever see."

"Oh, Dee! this letter must have been detained—Ray must be on his way! Oh, Dee, he will be here this very night, perhaps!" The girl's face was radiant.

"Den them ar chickens got to go," said Dee, arranging the sun-bonnet on her woolly head, and, hurriedly rising, she left the place.

"Ray—Ray is coming," murmured the girl, her beautiful blue eyes shining with pleasure. She was as lovely as a May rose, this sweet, ingenious creature. The fair open forehead, from which waved the golden tresses; the soft, clear complexion, just touched by pale roses; the innocence in face and gesture made her seem like some wood nymph. The airy gracefulness of her figure, as she sat on the low ottoman, her work beside her; the delicious smile that parted her lovely lips, anticipatory of the great pleasure in store for her—she had not seen this grand Raphael for nearly a year—made her the fittest picture for heavenly contemplation that ever artist tried his brush upon.

Presently she ran in the house, and placed upon her amber tresses a coquettish little hat, bright with a June rose and a jaunty little feather, and flew down the steps and along the road in the direction of the Braddock plantation, seeming like some breezy apparition from another sphere, so quick were her feet, so lithe her motions, so delicately swayed the fine filmy muslin of her dress and mantle. She had, for the moment, utterly forgotten that Salome had a visitor—or perhaps she would scarcely bestow on a Northern "school marm" the title of visitor, though it might be Salome's friend. As had been her usual wont, she fluttered into the open door like some dainty bird. Salome had apparently just come in from the kitchen, for her bright morning-gown was flecked with tiny spots of flour. At the window, the sun, pouring its gold upon the rich brown of her tresses, her dainty neck, white as milk, poised like a bird's over some work she was busy with, sat Sylve. She had just raised a warning finger, as she caught sight of Eve, in protest to Salome, who had declared that she never should be able to keep up the deception. And so these two strange natures met—both denied the sweet, overshadowing care and protection of a mother's love—both willful, imperious and daring, each after her own fashion. But there was a difference. Miss Eve's path had always been flower-strewn. To her, slaves and equals had alike yielded in the impressionable years of childhood, and, no difficulty had been too formidable to vanquish for her sake. Her father and his friends had been hearty haters of the Yankees, and consequently the child's mind was tinged with the same unreasonable aversion. She had, therefore, grown up with her mind filled with prejudice against people who were forced to maintain themselves by actual labor. These were her weak points; but with these she had some splendid qualities.

Sylve, on the contrary, had been thwarted, and had learned to conceal not avow her dislikes. Her temper had only been scotched not conquered, and she could hate heartily. She was not Eve's equal in native nobility of character—more crafty, more quiet, more willing to bide her time—more revengeful. But where she loved, she loved devotedly and passionately, and only through love could her better nature be influenced.

Eve came into the room, whose windows were draped and darkened by thick vines outside, like a sunbeam. Salome went towards her and kissed her, and presented her friend. Miss Nellie Brown. Miss Brown taking her cue from Eve's inquiring glance, bowed coldly, and went on with her work.

"Well, what's the good word with you, darling, this morning?" asks Salome, pressing the soft, banded locks from forehead to ear. Half unconsciously Eve glanced at Sylve, and Sylve, glad of an excuse, said she had forgotten something, and left the coast clear.

"The good word? Why, Ray is coming—this time to stay a month," and the great blue eyes seemed to palpitate with pleasure.

"How glad I am," said Salome, heartily. "Everybody likes Raphael Wilde; he's a splendid fellow."

"I know; but what miserable entertainment we can give him at the house," murmured Eve—"only two poor old blacks and me."

"Ah, but the 'me' is all he cares for, I expect. I would not let my pride trouble me now, dear. He knows how you are left, and how well you have struggled against adverse influences. He will be happier in the ruined old place with you than he would in a castle with a world of splendid people who are nothing to him."

"I hope so," said Eve, brightly, the blushes deepening on her cheeks; "but then everything seems so meagre and almost mean up there. I want to make his visit very pleasant, and you must help me. I want you there to-morrow, and I am going to invite the Lulls and the Trumways. After that, can't we get up a picnic, or a visit to the eastern shore? You are always so kind."

"Certainly; we'll see what we can do," said Salome, blithely. "My friend Miss Brown plays and sings delightfully."

"Oh, I don't want her," Eve responded, somewhat curtly. "Where in the world did you pick her up? Anything but a Yankee and a schoolma'am, if you please."

"But, I assure you she is a very sweet girl. You saw for yourself how pretty and lady-like she is."

"I saw nothing of the kind," said the prejudiced Eve, determined to carry her point. "And you know I don't want to hurt you, Salome, but positively if that girl came to my house she would bring the ghost of my dead father with her, and there would be an end of my pleasure."

It was a great temptation to Salome to explain the real position of her visitor, but she had given her word, and her notions of honor were more than usually strict. She felt pained, however, at Eve's injustice.

"I am sure if you knew her, dear, you would like her," she answered; "but, of course, I won't force her upon you, only you must see that as she is my friend and my visitor, at whatever entertainment I give, she must be included."

"Oh, of course, you are at perfect liberty to do as you please, and you wouldn't dream that I could treat her with open incivility; but, to be candid, I don't like her; I didn't like her the moment she looked in my eyes. I felt as one would to see a snake in ambush. Perhaps its all very silly; no doubt she's a good deal better and more accomplished than I am, but one can't help one's feelings."

"One can conquer them," said Salome, quietly, "at least till one sees whether they are to be depended upon."

"I dare say you could," responded Eve, with a sigh and a doubt; "you were always wiser than the rest of us, but I can't. I shall have to deny myself the honor of Miss Brown's acquaintance."

"Indeed, you have nothing to fear on the score of her family; she is connected with very nice people," said Salome, a little irritated, and mentally angry with Sylve for reducing her to this perplexity.

"Oh, I don't doubt it," answered Eve, "those Yankees are always well connected, and you, having been educated at a Northern school, view them from a different standpoint, as is quite natural. When is Miss Brown to commence her school?"

"Immediately—on Monday. I have tried to dissuade her—but she persists," and then, aware of the strangeness of her thoughtless speech, Salome's face crimsoned.

"Tried to dissuade her; why, didn't she come for that purpose?" asked Eve, curiously, "She's wanted badly enough?"

"Certainly, she came for that purpose," Salome hastened to reply, "only—there—there really is no great need; but she says she is very fond of teaching, and I shall wonder if she doesn't tire of it at the outset," she added, hurriedly.

"Oh, dear, I can't like those people," murmured Eve, a tremulous horror in her voice, "and there's no use trying. They killed poor papa."

"But, Raphael, isn't he almost one of them?"

"No; indeed and indeed!" cried Eve, with a gesture of intense scorn; "every time Ray comes here, he says he loves his own birth place better. But it was his father's wish that he should be educated at the North, and what can he do?"

"Sure enough, and it strikes me there are a great many fathers in this Southern country who go and do likewise. The idea of sending one's children among people one hates."

"It does seem incongruous; but, Salome, dear, don't let us quarrel. I'm very happy this morning, and I wouldn't for all the world get in a cloud. Do you know how splendid it is out? The air is full of bloss my fragrance. Oh, I'm so glad! It's the pleasantest time of the year for visitors."

"Stay and take lunch," said Salome, as Eve took her hat in her hand.

"Not for worlds: think of the scant time between now and sundown. Besides, there is so much to see to, and likely the larder is run down—it generally is," she added, with a sigh. "At all events there are plenty of eggs and milk, and Dee cooks beautifully."

"Take some jellies home, dear, there are more than we can eat in a year, and Barby made some capital fruit cake yesterday."

"Thank you, I'll see," said Eve, laughing. "If we're quite run out, I'll send Dee down." Southern hospitality means something. The offer was accepted in all frankness, as well as made in thorough good faith. Eve held her tempting lips up for a kiss, and ran back home.

CHAPTER XXII.—THE HORSE AND HIS RIDER.

"SO, that's your Miss Eve," said Sylve, coming in with a superb toss of the head. "Do you know, I never disliked any one so soon and so thoroughly in my life? Did you see how she looked at me, as if I were some curiosity. She is just my ideal of a haughty Southern girl, or the ideal I had in my mind before I saw you," she corrected herself hastily.

"It's your own fault, dear," says Salome, not yet recovered from the unpleasant sensation caused by Eve's equally caustic speech. "You placed it beyond my power to put you where you ought to be, and I have told you how people will look upon your occupation."

"Then I vow and declare," cried Sylve, with burning cheeks, "they are quite as contemptible as I have been told they are—the whole Southern race!"

"Gently, gently," said Salome, taking a ruff of half-plaited muslin from the table beside her, and doubling it bit by bit over the edge of a quaint silver fruit-knife; "much of this aversion is due to education. We have been so accustomed to look upon work as the resort of inferior beings, inferior in body and intellect, that we cannot all at once change our life-long impressions. We must have a little time. If you had been introduced to Eve Lewin as my friend Miss Sylve de Latude, the aristocratic flavor of the name would have touched her delicate sensibilities, but Miss Brown! Oh, my dear, why did you choose a name so unsentimental, so utterly devoid of all poetic associations?"

"I can live very well without the favor of Miss Lewin," said Sylve, loftily, "and if she can't like me as Miss Brown, she needn't like me at all. In fact," she added, sinking upon her chair languidly, and beginning to work again, "I'd much rather she wouldn't like me. As I said, I've taken a dislike to her that no amount of civility on her side can overcome. You know me of old," raising her flashing eyes; "can you remember that ever I changed my opinion of any one?"

"It would sometimes have been better if you could, dear."

"Sometimes, perhaps, perhaps not. At any rate, that's my nature."

"Then you wouldn't feel uncomfortable if she had not included you in the invitation to Lewindale?"

"Why, hasn't she?" queried Sylve, looking up, a quick flush spreading over her face—a disappointment that she would not have shown for worlds rankling at her heart. "Oh, certainly I can live without it. I never dreamed of being invited anywhere, that I know; I am in hiding, as you are aware."

In spite of herself her voice betrays vexation which is quite palpable to Salome.

"I'm so sorry," she said, with real feeling. "Eve Lewin is such a sweet, unspoiled creature. I thought of her when I was looking about for friends and pupils for you, and now to find you both prejudiced," she ended with a sigh.

"I'm truly sorry for your disappointment, dear," Sylve said, after a pause, "but on the whole it's better as it is, so let's throw away dull care and be happy. Is Miss Lewin going to give a grand party?"

"Oh, dear, no," Salome answered, smiling; "that the poor child will never be able to do. Their fine old house has gone to wreck and ruin; there isn't a room in it fit for occupancy. The soldiers did treat it abominably, and hence the cause of some of Eve's ill-feeling. They cut up pictures and wantonly broke and defaced all the beautiful ornaments that cost the old colonel so much pains and money to procure. They found the place almost a paradise and left it a desert. You must take that into consideration a little, my dear."

"I suppose I ought to, but if I did it wouldn't alter my feelings towards her, though I might pity her," said Sylve, a little against her will, nevertheless. "But if everything is ruined, pray what does the child live on?"

"On the produce of the land, tilled by two faithful old servants. There is also a little money, of which she has the interest, left by her mother; enough, I suppose, to clothe her and buy a few luxuries if she wants them."

"And what is this party to be given for?"

"Oh, didn't I tell you? No, I forgot about Raphael Wilde. He is her lover, I suppose—that is, I have no doubt but by-and-by they will be married. His father had the good sense to invest in some Yankee stock and the result is a fortune; so you see little Eve is not destined to be a child of poverty all her days."

"So, she has a lover," said Sylve, lingering on the words, a strange spasm of envy contracting her heart a little. "Is he nice?"

"Nice?" laughed Salome, putting aside her finished ruffle; "wait till you see him."

"But I am not likely to do that," Sylve replies, looking out upon a wilderness of tall, ruddy flowers. "Can't you describe him?"

"Describe Ray Wilde! I should be able to, having known him since he was a boy in pinafores; but I don't know, men and boys are so different. I haven't seen him for a year, but the last time I met him—let me think, was it at church?—yes—he was a tall, handsome stripling; and I remember admiring his eyes so much—eyes we girls used to talk about—large, gray, unfathomable; all his features are handsome. Yes, Ray is certainly a very handsome man. The two together make as beautiful a couple as you might find in a day's drive, as somebody says."

Sylve listened, and her brow grew clouded. Why should this simple country girl, as in her heart she called her, poor and alone, be yet blessed as she had never been? Riches—everything would be given to her with love. And, still, why should she care—why vex herself about one till within an hour a comparative stranger? Was it because she was more beautiful? In her heart she detested blondes, and would not, for an instant, acknowledge that Eve's beauty was superior to her own. Was it that cold, measured look the Southern girl had given her, and which, at the very moment, had roused all the bitterness of her nature—or that inexplicable aversion that sometimes springs up full fledged and unconquerable between two natures who meet for the first time, which can give no reason for its existence and will make no apologies for its endurance? Who can tell?"

"How old is he?" asked Sylve, mechanically.

"Twenty-two, I should think," Salome answered.

"Oh, well, don't let's talk any more about it: it's too lovely outside to be spending one's time in hemming and frilling. Let's go out and pick some jasmines—the dear, little fairy things! Come, I haven't begun to look about. Throw your old palm-leaf on, and show me some of your outside beauties."

The two girls went into the garden, Sylve with a scarf thrown coquettishly over her pretty brown hair; Salome in a nondescript laborer's hat of enormously wide rim, and next to nothing in the crown. The yellow flowers they sought starred the ground and ran wantonly up the side of the old trees, braiding their roots with creeping gold, hanging like stars from the graceful boughs. These, with bunches of tall, queenly roses: some of a deep, luscious crimson, like monster strawberries; others of the palest sea shell pink; others again flaunting in yellow and white—growing in the wildest abandonment of riotous life, for there is no skilled gardener to tend and prune them now, with trees of the Florida cornel, their snowy involucre bursting into white glory, and, in their luxuriance, covering every limb and branch, scarcely disclosing the rich, green leaves lifting themselves above the more modest flowers, had a charm for Sylve's eyes with which the tamer plants of the North had never seemed invested.

"Do you know," she said, stopping short in the wilderness of sweets, "I wonder that I was not Southern born. Why, this very place seems like my birthright. I am sure that I was never here before, and yet the whole landscape is so familiar."

"Then you're not a bit homesick," murmurs Salome, stooping to pull up a few unsightly weeds that proved too much for her strength.

"Homesick!" Sylve gives a little gasp, and quick as thought the tears rush to her eyes, dimming the beautiful prospect, but she wills them back. "Oh, sometimes, I think I should like to see Madam Forester. You can't imagine what a lovely old lady she is—one can scarcely call her old either—there is so much of youthful spirit in her manner, and her eyes are always young. I—I wonder if she misses me?"

"Wonder if she misses you! What a question! Do you suppose if I took the three callow robins from their nest yonder, the mother bird would miss them? Why, I dare say, they are all flying about with telegrams, visiting all the stations far and near—likely as not you are in the papers by this time."

A round wonder in Sylve's eyes and a little cry of terror.

"That would be enough; Flix, the fastidious, would never look at me after that, not that I care," and yet how hard she tries to keep her voice steady, and how readily Salome detects its quavering.

"And I expect," Salome continues, fixing her eyes on a branch alive with little brown rolls sunning tiny scarlet vests, "I expect that Flix, as you call him, is scouring the country on horseback."

A smothered scream of terror: Sylve crouches and catches at the folds of Salome's dress, for there come horse hoofs, sure enough, right towards them seemingly.

"Oh, Salome, they have found me," gasps Sylve, and hides her head trembling from head to foot. Even Salome is startled, and crouches a little out of sympathy, for surely the horse and his rider are almost at a gallop. She puts an arm protectingly around Sylve's neck, and lifting the curious, broken, sun-browned old hat, tries almost ludicrously to shield the frightened girl, and the horse comes nearer and nearer. Curiously enough neither have thought of running, though the house is within easy distance.

"Oh, Salome," cries Sylve, in a smothered voice, "if he speaks to you I shall die."

(To be continued.)

A NEW METHOD OF MANUFACTURING IRON.

FOR years people more or less scientific and practical have theorized upon the burning of hydro-cartons, and the result has been a number of appliances which in time have been abandoned by all except the inventors, and in most cases even by them. Fortunes have been spent and lost in the attempt to utilize petroleum as a fuel, and heretofore the result has been a blank and nothing more.

Dr. Charles J. Eames, a well known chemist of this city, turned his attention to this matter a number of years ago, and, instead of being satisfied with a crude apparatus to burn oil, he spent years in investigation and experiment. He combined a thorough chemical education and experience with a ripe knowledge of mechanics, and where others failed he succeeded, and the "Eames apparatus for burning hydro-cartons" stands alone not only as a practical invention but as a discovery in science.

The "Eames process," so-called, is protected by a combination of patents covering the "generator" for vaporizing the hydro-carbons and the "burner," as well as different uses of the fuel peculiarly applied. The process is simple in its application, the apparatus is in no respect complicated, the "plant" is inexpensive, and the results are remarkable.

As is the case with all inventions which involve a revolution of old methods, it was at first viewed by practical men as chimerical; and the many previous crude inventions, which had been brought to notice, tried and found to be failures, did not help to inspire confidence.

It was from the outset apparent to Dr. Eames that the value of a process for burning hydro-carbons consisted in the production of a flame which, with its purity, should combine a certainty of control, regularity and intensity; and that such a process applied to the manufacture of iron, as well as general metallurgical operations, would be invaluable to the country. A vast resource of nature, flowing from the earth with prodigality, and, so far as human judgment could forecast, inexhaustible, had but a limited use; it was refined and burned in lamps, it was used to enrich illuminating gas, and was not invaluable as a lubricator. That was about the extent of the uses of petroleum.

Dr. Eames has demonstrated that it may be used in the manufacture of iron and steel and in all metallurgical operations, making a better product than coal, and even superior in its results to charcoal; that in the manufacture of glass it is superior to any other fuel; that in reducing ores it solves a problem, and in fact that wherever coal is used directly in manufacture it is its superior both in product and cost.

At Providence, Worcester, Jersey City, Titusville and elsewhere, the Eames process has been used, always with success. At Bridgewater, Mass., it made blooms; at Providence, horse-shoes; at Jersey City, boiler-plate; at Worcester, wire; at Pittsburg, open hearth and crucible steel; at Millville, N. J., glassware and window-glass. It has been demonstrated that it may be used to advantage in the running of locomotive engines; and as fuel under stationary boilers it is superior to coal in result and cost where there are a nest of boilers to operate. It burns without smoke or odor, which would be a boon to large manufacturing cities and increase the value of real estate.

The process came before the country at a time when everything was suffering from the effects of the panic of 1873, and found all manufacturing interests struggling to live. Its progress was staid by the manipulation of oil by the combination whereby crude petroleum was raised to a price it could not have reached naturally—a combination now impossible in consequence of the vast reserves of oil and the increase of production which must continue. The iron made at the Eames Iron Works, now in operation at Titusville, has been analyzed by Henry Wurtz, Ph. D., and William M. Habirshaw, F. C. S., with the following results:

"NEW YORK, November 7th, 1879.

"To JOHN A. BALESTIER, Secretary Eames Oil Fuel Process Company, 110 Broadway, New York:

"SIR—The sample of bar iron marked and numbered Eames Petroleum Iron, contains, equivalent to:

Carbon (total)	0.0403
Phosphorus, very faint traces in 10 grammes
Sulphur	"
Silicon, small crystals	0.0093
Metal Iron	99.918.

"Your obedient servants,

"HENRY WURTZ, Ph. D.
"W. M. HABIRSHAW, F.C.S."

Tests of tensile strength have been made under directions of Professor J. E. Denton, of the Stevens Institute of Technology at Hoboken, N. J., with results which were highly satisfactory, showing the iron to possess strength considerably above the usual limit.

By oil-producers it is hailed heartily, because a new use for petroleum, extensive as this must be, will help to make its production a business and not a speculation. By manufacturers of iron and steel it must be recognized as a new departure. All people to whom its uses personally recommend it will soon see its importance, as many of them have, and it is a matter of a short time when it will replace coal in many branches of industry.

TALKS ON TIMELY TOPICS.

ILLUSTRATED INTERVIEWS WITH EMINENT PUBLIC MEN.

—No. 13.—

INTERVIEW WITH SENATOR PENDLETON.

The Work of the Census to Commence 1st of June Next.

THE PRESIDENT TO NOMINATE 150 SUPERVISORS.

Twelve Thousand Enumerators to be Appointed.

PRIVILEGES OF CABINET OFFICERS.

SECRETARY SHERMAN BEHIND THE SCENES.

SENATOR PENDLETON, during the sittings of Congress, resides in Franklin Square, Washington. He received me in his library.

"So you want me to talk about the census?" he gayly exclaimed, "and in my capacity as Chairman of the Committee of the Senate? Very good. I suppose I must obey the mandate of FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER. Take that comfortable chair and we'll see what we can do. General Walker," continued the Senator, "who is general superintendent of the census, has given it very intelligent consideration. He seems to be eminently fitted for the position, and to be determined to exhaust his ability in making the census absolutely perfect."

"I assume that your arrangements for the taking of the census are based upon the newest and most improved methods?"

"The arrangements for taking the statistics of population are excellent. An attempt will be made to complete the enumeration in the briefest possible time, so as to approach as nearly as may be to the number of people on the face of the Union. The instructions and schedules will suggest and require a very exact and detailed statement touching the number of people, their habits and occupations, their condition as to soundness of body and mind, size of families, proportion of house-owners, and all the particulars belonging to the question of the advance and development of the human race in this country."

"But the statistics will not be confined to the number of the people?"

"Certainly not. More care will, I think, be given, than in any previous census, to statistics touching the mental and moral development of our people. To the number, extent and character of charities, public and private; to the prevalence, causes and courses of diseases; to the effect of climate, occupation and habits upon the mind and body; to the character, classes and extent of inventions and discoveries; to the advance in all the arts, and to the advance in all the elements of the splendid material civilization which characterizes our era; to the accumulation and increase of wealth—but the list grows as I enumerate. I expect the census will be a complete picture of the present condition of our people in all respects—of our 48,000,000 of people, that being the estimated number."

"When do you commence operations, Senator?"

"It is understood that the President will make the nomination of Supervisors to the Senate very soon. The Supervisors will receive instructions and the Superintendents divide the districts into enumerative districts, appoint Enumerators, give them full instructions, and be ready to commence the work of gathering the statistics of the population on the first day of June next. It is hoped that these statistics will be ready for tabulation in less than a month."

"You will require a large staff?"

"The force will be both large and experienced, and the work of tabulation will be pushed with great vigor."

"Will that work be done in Washington?"

"Yes, and under the direction of General Walker."

"How many Supervisors is it proposed to appoint?"

"There are to be 150, and each Supervisor will divide his district in such a manner that no Enumerator will have more than 4,000 people. That will give—divide 4,000 into 48,000,000, and you have the number of Enumerators."

"What pay will the Supervisors receive?"

"Five hundred dollars."

"And the Enumerators?"

"From $4 to $6 per diem."

"What is the amount of the appropriation for this service?"

"Three million dollars have been appropriated in the Bill, and, to our judgment, after having given the matter a deal of attention, that amount will have to be increased to $5,000,000, to insure the uttermost attainable perfection of the work."

"Have any steps been taken to secure information other than through the Enumerators?"

"Yes. You would be astonished at the progress already made in the way of preparation. Inquiries, very detailed in their character, have been sent to the leading industries of the country, professions, trades and occupations of all kinds. The greatest readiness has been exhibited to take the necessary steps to secure accurate answers. Firms, corporations and partnerships, associations of all kinds, physicians, merchants, lawyers, have exhibited wonderful alacrity in securing the most reliable information for the department. Committees of the two Houses of Congress prepared the law which was passed at the last session, and under which the operations were prepared. The Senate Committee is now considering very carefully all the provisions of the law and the amendments which have been suggested, with a view to perfecting it in case defects are discovered."

"Have you adopted the system of any other country?"

"We have had as far as possible to gain experience by the systems of other countries."

After some further conversation on the census, I turned to another subject, namely, that of certain proposed privileges to Cabinet officers.

"I have noticed, Senator, that since your return to the legislature you have revived the measure which you suggested many years ago, for allowing the Cabinet officers seats in the Senate and in the House of Representatives?"

"Yes; I have introduced a Bill into the Senate for that purpose."

"What are its provisions?"

"It provides that upon certain specified days in each week or month, the members of the Cabinet shall attend upon sessions of the Senate and House, at given hours, to answer questions which may be propounded to them. It provides that any member of either House may give notice of his intention to put a question, or to ask information of either of the Secretaries, touching any matter of public interest in the administration of their respective departments. Notice of the question should be entered upon a book to be kept for that purpose, and a copy of the question be transmitted to the Secretary, so that he shall have the copy three days before the answer shall be required unless in cases of great emergency. The Bill also provides that the members of the Cabinet shall have the right to occupy seats on the floors of the Houses and participate in debate upon all matters of legislation appertaining to the subjects confided to their departments, and, personally, I should be willing to go further, and permit them to take part in all debates; but for the present it is well enough not to attempt too much."

"Are you convinced that this will be an improvement upon the present system?"

"I am a thorough believer in the plan. I have given it great attention. I have considered it in all its constitutional relations, and as to its effect on the character of the two Houses and on the members of the Cabinet, and I believe it would largely improve the efficiency of both. Let me illustrate the desirability of the system I propose. The Senate was recently discussing the taking of a reserved fund, composed of greenbacks, for the purpose of paying the arrears of pensions, and it was objected that there was sufficient money in the Treasury to pay up the arrears as fast as they could be adjudicated, without touching the fund. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, not more than three months old, was found, saying that there was not money enough applicable to that purpose. Senators affirmed that the condition of the Treasury had changed, and that the money applicable to this purpose had been increased. I maintained that there was no official statement anywhere to that effect. The answer was, 'We have the information from the Secretary himself.' I inquired from the gentleman with whom I had the colloquy, when and where he had received the information? He replied, very frankly, that he had received it in private conversation that morning from Mr. Sherman himself in one of the lobby-rooms of the Senate. Now, I consider that it would be much more consistent with the proper relations of the Senate and the Secretary, if that information—upon which we were expected to decide a question of larger public policy—had been given in official form to all the members, rather than to a single one. It would have added to the information of the Senate; it would have fixed the responsibility of the Secretary. The system I propose," added Senator Pendleton, "would add largely to the information which Congress generally possesses, and principally of that character which intelligent legislation most requires. It would give to Secretaries a fair opportunity to use the practical knowledge which grows out of their familiarity with the public business in their departments. Legislature and executive would both be greatly improved. The friction would be found to stimulate both Cabinet and Congress to greater excellence in their respective works. It would be a relief as well as a benefit to the members of the Cabinet. It would relieve them from the miserable, harassing, heart breaking work of distributing the clerkships in the departments for partisan purposes to partisan workers, which now requires half their time, and allow them to come fresh to the consideration of the great questions of public policy. It would, in my judgment, be the greatest step towards a true Civil Service Reform, for it would open up the recesses and unveil the secrets of the appointment offices. While I make no reflection on the present conduct of these offices, it may be said with entire accuracy that, if all removals and all appointments are made with the certainty that at any moment they may be called in question, both will be made for good cause only, and this I understand to be the true theory of a sound Civil Service."

"What are your prospects of success, Senator?"

"I can scarcely say. I have been very much encouraged at the growth of this project in public favor since I introduced it in the House of Representatives in 1864. Several of the most prominent and influential newspapers of the country, many thoughtful and experienced public men not in Congress, I believe even some of the members of the present Cabinet, favor its adoption. Many members of Congress are giving it careful consideration, and will, I think, agree with me in the end. It is now in the hands of a select committee of the Senate composed of certainly many of the ablest members of the Senate, representing every party, every section, every school of political philosophy in the country, and I hope from that committee an exhaustive and favorable report. Of course, I can only say I hope it—I could not undertake to say more. The committee is composed of Messrs. Blaine, Platt, Conkling, Allison, Ingalls, Voorhees, Bayard, Butler, Farley, and myself."

The Annual Announcement of the Stevens Institute of Technology at Hoboken, N. J., for the year 1879, is much more than a simple catalogue or circular. It assumes the shape of a valuable treatise on the most recent aids to instruction which have been invented, and is illustrated with diagrams of chemical and physical apparatus, mostly new and highly suggestive to the teacher and pupil. Much of the apparatus described has been invented by the professors of the Institute. After looking over the course of instruction as laid down in the catalogue, and perusing the list of professors who have been appointed to carry it out, the conviction presents itself to our mind that few colleges offer a more comprehensive and practical scheme of education than is presented at the Stevens Institute; and when we read the names of the distinguished teachers—Henry Morton, Alfred M. Mayer, Robert H. Thurston, Albert R. Leeds and others—we need no further assurance that the programme will be faithfully carried out. The "Announcement" ought to have a wide circulation.

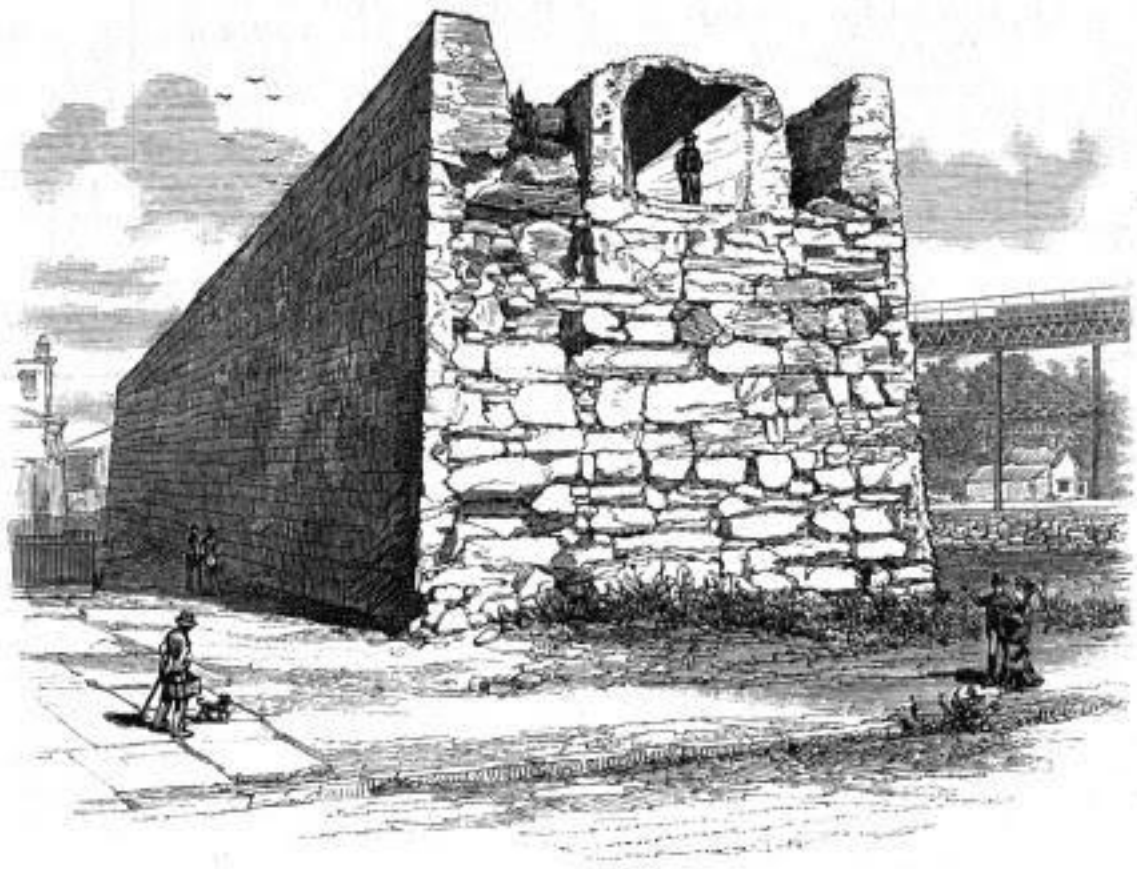
HON. GEO. H. SHARPE, SPEAKER OF THE NEW YORK ASSEMBLY.

SPEAKER GEO. H. SHARPE OF THE NEW YORK LEGISLATURE.



GEN. GEORGE H. SHARPE, the new Speaker of the New York Assembly, was born at Kingston, Ulster Co., N. Y., in 1828. He was educated at the Albany Academy, Rutgers College and the Yale College Law School. At the breaking out of the war of the rebellion he was engaged in the practice of law and was one of the first to respond to President Lincoln's call for volunteers. Entering the service as captain in 1861 he was rapidly promoted, and in the following year he received a colonelcy. Displaying an aptitude for the profession of arms that was soon recognized by his superiors in command, he was detailed by General Hooker on his staff. When General Hooker was superseded by General Meade in command of the Army of the Potomac, Colonel Sharpe was retained on General Meade's staff, and when General Grant assumed command of the armies of the United States he assigned one of the most important positions on his staff to Colonel Sharpe, where he performed most valuable service during the campaign of 1864-5, and in the final campaign which resulted in the surrender of General Lee's army at Appomattox Court House, in April, 1865. For gallant and meritorious services he was brevetted brigadier, and subsequently major-general, and was selected by the commander-in-chief to perform the important duty of paroling Lee's army. In 1867 General Sharpe was special agent of the State Department in Europe. He held the office of United States Marshal in New York City in 1870, and from 1871 to 1878 he was Surveyor of the Port. The electors of the First District of Ulster evidenced their appreciation of the worth of General Sharpe by electing him to represent them in the Assembly of 1879 by a plurality of 725 votes over the Democratic and the Greenback candidates, against a Democratic majority, in the previous year, of 975. So well pleased were General Sharpe's constituents with his record at the State capital that they re-elected him to the present Assembly. In the last Assembly he was Chairman of the Committee on Insurance. He was also a member of the Committee on Cities, where he rendered valuable service and was an able advocate of all measures in the interest of the taxpayers.

RUINS OF THE OLD CROTON AQUEDUCT.

IN the progress of New York City upwards beyond the romantic slopes and dells and rambles of the Central Park, streets are opened that have long existed only on paper. This cutting through leaves exposed huge masses of masonry that look to the inexperienced eye like ruins of some prehistoric race, some cyclopean men of other days. We show two of these, as seen at Ninety-ninth and One Hundred and First Streets, looking north. The ruins are, however, simply the old masonry conduit of the Croton Aqueduct. As originally built, the aqueduct from the High Bridge to the Receiving Reservoir ran through a part of the island where streets were as yet unknown and no grade settled. Instead of laying iron pipes, as was done where the streets were opened, masonry was erected, preserving the level for the flow of the water, and, as the surface required, either raised or sunk beneath the soil. Of this work there was more than four miles on the island, sometimes towering aloft, sometimes almost even with the ground. After crossing the bold rocky shore of Harlem River, the aqueduct ran to the end of the high ground north of Manhattan Valley, which was crossed by iron pipes; and then the mason work was resumed, and it crossed Asylum Ridge and Clendinning Valley to the receiving reservoir at Eighty-sixth Street between Sixth and Seventh Avenues. Since the building of the aqueduct began in 1837 the city has grown wonderfully, and as streets have been opened the croton water mains were laid through them, and the old massive work became useless. It was well done, of that there is no doubt. The man is standing in the passage through which the water formerly flowed.

THE DEPOSED PRESIDENTS OF PERU AND BOLIVIA.

LATE dispatches from South America announce the deposition of the Presidents of Peru and Bolivia, and the gain of important victories by the Chilians both on sea and land. General Mariano Prado, ex-President of Peru, succeeded one of almost similar name, General Pardo, since assassinated as he entered the legislative hall. He came to this country a fortnight ago on his way to Europe on a public mission, and while here learned of the formal deposition and the choice of a successor. General Hilarion Daza, ex-President of Bolivia, has filled the Presidential chair of Bolivia since May, 1876, and has the reputation of being a man of advanced ideas, eager to push forward the material prosperity of the State. He had developed its resources, and, when war was inevitable, he was ready with a small but well-organized army.

The President of the successful Republic of Chili is Don Anibal Pinto, who was elected in September, 1876, for the term ending in 1881. He is an energetic and patriotic administrator, having displayed singular powers of government in several critical periods. He is thus no unworthy successor of the many good Presidents who have done so much to make Chili the best governed and most prosperous of all the South American republics.

EDUCATING THE INDIANS.

THE new school for the education of Indian children at Carlisle, Pa., is situated at what was formerly known as the "Garrison," a beautiful spot a short distance northeast of the borough. In order to make the children as comfortable as possible, and to have everything convenient, it was found necessary to erect one or two new buildings and to make some changes in the old ones. The most important improvements are a new chapel—a one-story frame building 36x60 feet—a building for the purpose of giving mechanical instruction, the establishment of an industrial department for the making of clothing, the refitting and refurnishing of the old hospital, the converting of a building formerly used as a barrack into a dormitory for the boys, containing bath-room, laundry, reading-rooms, and an office; the converting of another building into a dormitory for the girls, the arrangement of recitation and store-rooms, and the erection of a new fence around the buildings; 158 pupils are in attendance—115 boys and 43 girls. Among the number are two daughters and four sons of Spotted Tail and several from the camps of Spotted Tail and Red Cloud. All the children have the large black eye, high cheek bone, beautiful pearly teeth and peculiar nose. Eleven tribes are represented—Sioux, Chippewa, Nez Perces, Cheyenne, Kiowa, Ponca, Arrapahoe, Comanche, Menomonie, Navajo and Santie. The school is under the management of Capt. Pratt and Lieut. Brown. The instruction of the children is under the supervision of Miss Semple, a lady of considerable experience in educational matters. She is assisted in her work by several other lady teachers. The children are graded according to their degree of proficiency. Some are already able to read and write. The blackboard is found to be the best means of instructing the smallest children. Copies are given on the board, and the children follow them as nearly as possible. In addition to this the girls are being instructed in managing and keeping their rooms in order, in sewing and in household duties. The boys are also required to keep their rooms neat and in good order. They are divided into three companies and one detachment, and drill at regular intervals. In going to and from their meals they are arranged in their respective companies, and march in regular order. All the children are required to be neat in their appearance at the table, and to conduct themselves properly. They have been taught to use the knife and fork, and any one to see them eat would not think they had recently been brought from the frontier. The children have shown great aptness in learning, and one would be surprised to see the progress they have made in the short four months they have been here. They are delighted with their new quarters, and do not wish to return to their native place. Ever since they have arrived they have been attending services in some of the churches. A party of six, who came from the school at Hampton Roads, have formed themselves into a class in the Second Presbyterian Sabbath-school and are regular in their attendance. It is the intention to send a number to each Sabbath-school in town, and thus better acquaint them with the habits of Christian people.

GLASS EYES.

THESE are generally manufactured in France and Germany; some are made in New York. They are generally rights and lefts, but some are termed universal, and can be used in either optic. Great difficulty is often experienced in fitting the artificial eye, as the lid with which the eye is held in place becomes so contracted after the removal of the natural eye that it requires several trials before the eye will remain in place. Where a glass eye is used over the eyeball it is much more easily fitted and can be moved with greater ease than in the former case. The artificial eye made in New York is generally made of blue porcelain, and is not so durable nor so fine an imitation as those made in Germany. This is especially noticeable in the sclerotica or white of the eye, which is so closely resembled in the German artificial eye that, when inserted, the difference between it and the natural eye is scarcely apparent; in that of the American make, this part presents more of a smoky hue. The German eye is made of pure glass, and does not irritate the eyelid as much as the American, the cause being that the one contains a certain amount of lead, while the other is perfectly free from it. colors mostly used are blue and gray-blue. They are made of a great number of different sizes differing from one another by about one twenty-fourth of an inch in diameter. With care an eye may be worn for years and yet preserve its natural appearance. Instances have been known where an eye has broken and the pieces embedded themselves in the socket, having to be removed by a surgeon, but these cases are very rare.

The New Hindoo Messiah.

THERE will be wailing throughout Christendom over the latest move of Keshub Chunder Sen, the Brahman who ten or more years ago organized the theistic society known as the Brahmo Somaj. This society, composed exclusively of educated men, agreed closely in belief with the Unitarians of the Western world, and regarded Jesus as a prophet: indeed, one of the noblest tributes to the character and influence of the Founder of Christianity, as well as the most subtle analysis of the mental organization of Jesus, is from the pen of Keshub Chunder Sen himself. Pronouncing Him a true Oriental, the writer insisted that none but Orientals could fully understand his teachings, and that no other spiritual code could so perfectly satisfy the necessities of the Asiatic mind. The Brahmo Somaj gained immensely in numbers and influence, and now comes the intelligence that its leader claims to be a prophet, or a reincarnation of the Divine Spirit. Whether this claim is honestly made, the claimant having been subject to one of those delusions that are quite common to the Oriental mind in a state of exaltation or ecstasy, or whether it is a cunning bit of priestcraft, does not yet appear; but the known character of the man would seem to indicate the former, and that his intense patriotism has led him, after much wavering, to try to leaven the old religion of India with the spirit of Christ, instead of attempting to force a new faith upon the people. As he had just sent out an immense army of missionaries, the next advices about this great religious movement will be anxiously awaited by those who have for years been studying carefully the sect that has suggested the only possible meeting point of Oriental religions and Christianity.

English Election Expenses.

WHAT is the actual state of things encountered by the majority of candidates in a contested election, and what is expected of them? Meetings must be held, agents employed, bills printed, placards posted, and voters conveyed to the poll, and for all these things candidates must pay. The adoption of the ballot has increased the number of polling-places, polling clerks, etc., required, and consequently the candidate, who must pay for them, finds his burden by no means reduced. A sharp rivalry between the candidates raises the cost of these items far beyond what would be required if provided for from a common fund. In some boroughs these expenses are in great part defrayed by the party organizations, but in general they form too serious a charge for any but wealthy men to bear. The expenses of a candidate contesting a county generally amount to several thousand pounds, and the laws against bribery and corruption are, so to speak, lifted off their feet by a wide-flowing stream of bounty. The following examples of expenditure at elections, quoted from the report to the House of Commons of election expenses in 1874, indicate the urgency of the need for reform: North Durham, four candidates, more than £20,000; Southeast Lancashire, four candidates, more than £13,000; South Durham, three candidates, more than £20,000; Middlesex, four candidates, more than £16,000; North Wiltshire, three candidates, more than £11,800; West Riding (North Division), four candidates, more than £20,000. Some of these are extreme instances of their class, but the average expense of each candidate for a county in a contested election exceeds £3,000, and even the return of a member without opposition may generally cost him several hundred pounds. The elections of the counties of England alone, excluding Wales, entailed a cost upon candidates of more than £350,000 in 1874. In large boroughs the charges may be estimated at something between £1,000 and £2,000, and in the smaller boroughs at £300 or £400 per candidate; but these figures do not give a correct idea of the total outlay which a contested election involves. Besides all this, the unhappy representative of a small borough must often pay a heavy yearly rent in aid of local charities and vanities, else it will cry out for some tenderer nurse to please its humors. To defray such charges exceeds the pecuniary capacity of all but a small proportion of the community, and the representation of counties may be truly described as confined to the landed interest.

The Well of the Leaf, Jerusalem.

THE story says that in the days of Omar, one of the faithful pilgrims came to this well to draw water. The bucket fell to the bottom, and he went down to get it. To his great surprise a door opened before him, and he found himself in beautiful fragrant gardens, in which he walked for some time with great satisfaction. Before leaving this delightful place he plucked a leaf from one of the many trees, stuck it behind his ear, and so ascended to the upper earth without difficulty; but there is no record of whether he brought his bucket up or not. Of course the story spread, till at last it reached the ears of Omar, but only as an impudent invention, for no door could be found by any investigating travelers. Omar, however, treated the rumor with respect, and said there was a prophecy that one of the faithful should enter Paradise alive. Everything depended on whether the leaf retained its verdure, and so could maintain its claim to have grown upon a tree in Paradise. This test was triumphantly passed, for the leaf was green as ever, and so the story has lived to this day, and so it is always told on the brink of the "Well of the Leaf." The Mohammedans seem fond of tests. If the true believer can pass between two columns, outside the Mosque El Aksa, standing very close together, he leaves all his sins behind him. Now, the thinnest of our party could only just manage to squeeze through, and fat Mussulmans must assuredly find it difficult. A still more difficult test is at another place, a little beyond the same mosque, where Solomon's throne once stood. Here hangs—visible only to the eyes of the faithful—and even they must wait for death to unseal their vision—the bridge, thin as a hair and sharp as a sword, between earth and Paradise. Beneath it yawns the abyss of Gehenna, and the faithless will miss their footing and tumble headlong into its depths, while the true believer crosses the bridge easily and swiftly. Passing still along the wall, we came to the garden gate. Within are most beautiful carvings, and some fine pillars, said to have been brought from Gaza by the Queen of Sheba, as a present to Solomon. It was quite the afternoon before we reached the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, which occupies the site of the church built by Constantine over our Lord's tomb. Just inside the door is a slab on which it is supposed the body of Christ was laid in order to be anointed, and it is worn quite into holes by the kisses of devout pilgrims. It is quite touching to see the faith these poor creatures place in every possible and impossible site. Many of the peasants of the south of Russia save up their money for half a lifetime, in order to make this journey, which they perform in the most economical way possible. They travel as deck passengers on board ship, in all weathers, and walk when they are on land. When, at last, Jerusalem is reached, they take up their abode in the Russian hospice, and there the wretched priests never let them go till they have stripped them of their uttermost farthing, so that they literally have to beg their way back, and often starve on the roadside.

This is convincing. Not only is it food and drink. It is also house and land, paint shop and literature, with drugs, condiments and chemicals thrown in at us. Verily, tobacco is potent, but a little diffusive.

THE skill and watchfulness which have been characteristic of the management of the ST. NICHOLAS HOTEL, in New York, have made it the most perfect example of its kind which one could select to illustrate competence in a profession. This great institution, in its table, rooms and general convenience, is known far and wide, and its reasonable charges cannot but increase its great patronage.

THE failure of the vintage in France means inevitably an advance in the price of all imported champagnes, and the leading brands are already marked up. The favorite "AMERICA" EXTRA DRY, of Messrs. A. WERNER & CO., 308 Broadway, made from the purest California wine, not only maintains its high standard of excellence, but without advance in price. Every season adds to the "points" and patrons which this well-known American wine is making for itself.

"HINTS TO BUTTER-MAKERS"

is the title of a valuable little pamphlet, sent free to any address for one stamp. Address, BUTTER IMPROVEMENT CO., Buffalo, N. Y. It tells you how to increase amount of butter from given amounts of cream 4 per cent., improve quality of butter 20 per cent., make "gilt-edge" or golden-colored butter the year round. Every farmer and dairyman should send stamp for it.

CUTICURA REMEDIES.

MANY afflicted with serious Skin, Scalp and Blood Humors go to their family physician, who either frankly tells them he cannot cure them, or else exhausts their patience, and they consult the "Authority on Scalp and Skin Diseases." $15 (price of consultation) is a pretty good sum in these times, and much is expected of the "authority," but we regret to say little is received. Soon the patient sees no improvement and becomes discouraged; accidentally learns of the Cuticura Remedies, uses them and is cured. This is astonishing, but true. Documents in our possession contain many such statements fully attested.

FEEBLE Ladies, Aged Persons, Weakly Children, Persons of Sedentary Habits, all need HOP BITTERS daily.

MORE than three million dollars paid in cash for accidental deaths and injuries by THE TRAVELERS.

AN ARTICLE OF MERIT.—"Brown's Bronchial Troches" are the most popular article in this country or Europe for Throat Diseases and Coughs, and this popularity is based upon real merit. Imitations are offered for sale, many of which are injurious. The genuine "Brown's Bronchial Troches" are sold only in boxes.

HALFORD TABLE SAUCE.—A genuine relish. Exactly suited to all tastes and all conditions of people.

ASTHMA.—It is useless to describe the tortures of Spasmodic Asthma. Those who have suffered from its distressing paroxysms know full well what it is. JONAS WHITCOMB'S REMEDY, prepared by Joseph Burnett & Co., has never failed to afford immediate relief.

FAR, far better for you than Beer, Ale or Porter, and free from the intoxicating effects, is HOP BITTERS.

EPPS'S COCOA.
GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected Cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast-tables with a delicately flavored beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.

CATARRH

Is a Terrible Disease. Its fearful effects—corruption running down the throat, weak eyes, deafness, loss of voice, loss of smell, disgusting odors, nasal deformities, and finally consumption. From first to last it is ever aggressive. Ordinary treatments are worse than useless. If neglected while a cure is possible, it may rapidly develop into quick consumption. The most thorough, successful and pleasant treatment is Dr. M. W. CASE'S
CARBOLATE OF TAR INHALANT
It does not require ten minutes to demonstrate the value of Carbolate of Tar, the most healing remedial agent known to science. Balsams and Cordials of the most healing and soothing properties are so combined with Pine Tree Tar, that the mere breathing converts them into a dense smoke or vapor. This is inhaled—taken right to the diseased parts. No heat, no hot water, simply inhaling or breathing it, and you feel its healing power at once. This treatment is endorsed by physicians everywhere, and highly commended by thousands, who have used it with perfect satisfaction. FULL TREATMENT sent. SATISFACTION ALWAYS GUARANTEED. Address,

THE CRACK IN THE SHUTTER.

BY JANE G. AUSTIN.

IT was a lonely house, to be sure, but a very comfortable and stately one, built by Doctor Lem's father in the days when oak was used for other purposes than library furniture, nails were of wrought iron, and men were honest; so when Doctor Lem came to man's estate and had his diploma, his wife, and the good-will of the old doctor's practice, he concluded to have an office in the village and continue to live at the old homestead. In course of time his uncle died, and the necessity for specifying Doctor Lem and Doctor Nathan, or the old doctor as some people said, was at an end and all the practice came to Lem; but habits are far more powerful than propriety with most persons, and so, although the sign over the office-door announced its inmate as Doctor L. P. Maurice, nobody ever spoke of him except as Doctor Lem, and a good many went so far as to call his wife Mrs. Lem, at which she laughed; indeed, she laughed at most things, and when the doctor brought her home to The Cedars, as they called the old house, she made such a sunshine in that shady place, and so filled the great dusky chambers with her rippling laughter, and glinted in and out and up and down the breathless corridors and to fill the place Sue had perforce vacated for a while, and be mother to Maudie and wife to Lem, and mistress to cross-grained black Betty who had reigned in the kitchen of The Cedars before Lem was born, and made it so hot for timid Nancy Bell, the parlor-maid, that she was glad of the privilege of going home to sleep every night. As for nurse, she held her own, and kept out of the kitchen as much as possible, living just now in Mrs. Lem's rooms and taking care of her and the baby.

So that was the household on this bitter, bitter cold and stormy Christmas Eve, but friends were expected the next day, and great preparations in the way of cooking and confections, rubbing up the old family plate, and dusting ancestral china were going on, for their guests were relatives of Lem's, and he evidently wished that they should see no difference between the hospitable splendors of his mother's day and the reign of his little laughing wife, at whom Aunt Maurice had leveled certain shafts on a former occasion, still rankling in the husband's breast. So he said at breakfast to Lucille, pale, silent and dreamy behind the coffee-urn:

"Now, please, Lu, do see that everything is as gorgeous as possible for the dinner to-morrow. Above all, let all the old tankards and teapots be paraded, and show Aunt Maurice that they are not melted down to buy bonnets very proud of that testimonial, and came nearer crying than laughing when she talked of it and of the dreadful days it represented.

"You've cleaned this silver beautifully, Mox," said Lucille, graciously, to Moccason, the odd man, whom Betty allowed to be called in as aid on these occasions, and whom she contemptuously characterized as "jes about de foolest nigger de Lord eber turned out."

"Yis, missy," responded Mox, showing all his ivory. "Sight o' work to clean all dat yer silber. I s'pose dat wuf 'bout a million dollars, ain't it?"

"No, indeed, Mox; not more than two or three thousand, I suppose. The testimonial cost five hundred, but that's on account of the jewels."

"Dem shiny stones! 'Pears ridiklus now, missy, dat dem things dun cost so much; jes chunks o' glass dey look like, don't dey?"

"Chunks of glass of that sort cost a good deal of money," said Lucille, good-naturedly. The doctor is going to give Mrs. Maurice a set of jewels to-morrow that cost three or four times as much as all that plate, and would go in his waistcoat-pocket."

"Golly, missy, I'd like to see dem jewels, anyhow. Couldn't you show 'em to me jes to lighten my ignance?"

There was a ring of incredulity under the respect and simplicity of the negro's manner, the old chimneys and in and out of the many keyholes and crannies of the rambling house. Within, all was warmth and light, peace and plenty, with Christmas joy in every heart except, perhaps, Lucille's, for, as the night drew in, she grew momently paler and more lily-like, and once, flitting away from the light, gay room, where her sister played with her children while the husband stood looking fondly and proudly down on the group, she glided into her own dark room and stood, her hands pressed upon her heart, moaning sharply, as if under some intolerable pain.

"Oh, the sorrow's crown of sorrow
Is remembering happier things."

But presently she came out and into the gay little circle again, her face smiling, her voice gentle and loving, her manner ready and cheerful as they always were, for, young as she was, Lucille had learned one sad teaching of the world, that many a friend will gladly share our joys, but scarcely the nearest and dearest care to walk for ever in the shadow of our griefs.

They went to tea, and Doctor Lem duly admired the array of plate with the golden testimonial in the midst, and, as he left the room, carelessly said:

"Leave it just as it is to-night, Lu, and not have all the bother of setting it out again in enormous staircases, that Doctor Lem said he felt as if a whole cage of singing-birds were let loose in his old house and all its northern and western windows had turned to south and sunrise.

THE CRACK IN THE SHUTTER.—"A PRETTY SIGHT, ON CHRISTMAS MORNING; BUT ALL THE HORRORS OF THE PIT COULD NOT HAVE MORE AFFRIGHTED THAT STALWART RUFFIAN, WHO, STARING AT IT, DROPPED ON BOTH KNEES, MUTTERING: 'LITTLE HETTY! SHE'S IN GLORY, AND I'M DAMNED!'"

Sue laughed when he said it, and stood on tiptoe to kiss him, for she was a little thing.

"Wait till you see Lucille; there's something really to talk about," said she; and Doctor Lem, kissing her again, said: "Suppose I should fall in love with her?"

"'And kissed my sister instead of me,'" quoted Sue, and ran away laughing more than ever.

By-and-by Lucille, the elder sister, and yet only just turned twenty, came home from the French convent where she had been educated, and as Sue was all the family left to her, naturally came to live with her; but Doctor Lem no more fell in love with her than he did with the white lilies in the garden, or the moonlight, or the sun, or the lovely frost-tracings on the window-pane. She wasn't his style, and perhaps all the better, or Sue might not have laughed any more.

Little Maud had come by that time—in fact, she was three years old on the Christmas Eve we speak of, and there was another little birdling up-stairs not yet three weeks old; so Lucille, who looked just about as capable of domestic affairs as the aforesaid lilies, and moonbeams and frost-wreaths, was called upon and gimcracks for Sue, as she almost hinted last time she was here. Let every salt-spoon be cleaned and used, if possible. I'll send up the plate-chest from the bank this morning, and here's the key."

"And the testimonial, Lem?" asked Lucille, rousing herself from that weary, weary dream that had haunted her last two Christmases, the sorrow's crown of sorrow in remembering happier things. "Shall we unpack and set out the testimonial?"

"Oh, by all means," laughed Lem. "Give it a distinguished place on the sideboard."

And so it happened that about five o'clock in the afternoon, Lucille, who, like a great many other lovely and delicate things, proved herself in the hour of need quite as useful and unsparing as the coarser and less charming agents of whom nobody expects anything else, stood complacently before the sideboard in the dining-room admiring the really gorgeous display of massive plate she had arranged there, partly from an æsthetic delight in its rich beauty and lustre, partly that her brother-in-law might at his return home see how faithfully she had complied with his desires.

In the centre stood the testimonial, a gorgeous golden cup, enriched with jewels, presented to Doctor Lem by the town, in gratitude for his devoted and untiring efforts during the late visitation of yellow fever, and the success he attained in arresting its progress. Sue was and Lucille was young enough to be annoyed at it. So she said, hastily:

"Yes, you may see them on the Christmas-tree in the little study. All the presents are to be put there to-night, and in the morning Mrs. Maurice will be brought down to look at it before anything is taken off. I will give you a peep when everything is ready. Betty will want to see it, too."

But Mox was shrewd enough to decline this invitation, feeling pretty sure that his master would by no means approve the condescension, and having a wholesome terror of his presence; however, having with proper humility declared his unworthiness to enter the penetralia of the house, he added, in a wheedling voice:

"But, missy, if you wants to be awful good to a poor nigger dat knows his own place and won't noway go into massa's study, if you'd jes leave open a leetly crack in de shutter ob de souf winder, I'd go roun' an' take a peek, an' see all dem pooty stones an' things widout bein' in nobody's road."

"Very well, Mox, I'll leave the shutter a little open, and about nine o'clock you go round and take your peep. Now go and see if Aunt Betty don't want you to do something for her, and then go home."

The night fell—dark, cold and stormy; an icy sleet falling noisily upon the frozen earth, and a shrewd, nipping wind whistling about the morning. We will look sharp to the windows before we go to bed."

"If you please, miss, there's a poor woman at the back door," said Nancy Bell, softly, as the doctor and Lucille were about to leave the room, "and she says she's starving and freezing and hasn't anywhere to sleep."

"Oh, the poor thing!" said Lucille, pitifully. "Bring her into the kitchen and give her some supper. And, Lem, can't she sleep here somewhere and stay over Christmas if she's decent? We wouldn't want to turn any one from our doors Christmas Eve if they were ever so bad—if they were only really sorry."

The last words didn't mean the poor woman, and Doctor Lem rather stared at them, but answered, hastily:

"Of course, Lulu, do as you like. If Aunt Betty will let you, that is." And, laughing roguishly, he ran up-stairs, and Lucille went out to the kitchen, where the beggar, a thin, gaunt creature, with great burning black eyes and a hectic flush upon her hollow cheeks, stood shivering beside the fire, while Aunt Betty, pleased at playing the patroness, poured out coffee and heaped a plate with fried chicken and sweet potatoes for her: and when Lucille gently suggested the possibility of a bed, she replied so complacently, "Lor, yis, honey, I'll see all 'bout dat," that Lucille returned to her own domain smiling and contented. One of her duties in these times was to put little Maud to bed and hear her prayers, but to-night the child was so wild with excitement, and so eager about Santa Claus and the reindeers and the gifts he was to bring, and the great problem of childhood, how he was to get down the chimney with his pack on his back, that the prayers were far from satisfactory, and "Auntie Lu" was obliged to exercise a sort of dove-like severity of tone and manner before she could in any degree compose the child enough to leave her.

"There, now go to sleep, Maudie, like a dear little girl," said she, kissing her good-night. "And in the morning you shall go to the study and see all about it."

"Oh, I hasn't no idea of going to s'eep, Auntie Lu," replied the little thing, bouncing about in her bed; "I's going to lie wide 'wake and hark for Santa Taus."

And Lucille, looking at her as she took away the light, wished that her cheeks were not so scarlet and her eyes so bright.

"And now for the Christmas-tree," said Doctor Lem, gayly, as Lucille returned to Sue's room. "It is time this young woman went to bed if she is to be taken down-stairs in the morning, and you and I will leave her."

So the tree was decorated and loaded, largely for Maudie, and with fewer but more valuable parcels or open gifts for her father, mother, aunt, and some of the morrow's guests. Lucille, smiling a little at her own complacency, opened the shutters of the south window, leaving a chink wide enough to show the whole room to even a casual passer, and taking the splendid set of diamonds and emeralds, heirlooms of the Maurice family and reset by Doctor Lem as a Christmas gift to his wife on the birth of her boy, from their cases, she hung them among the evergreen twigs where they sparkled like dewdrops in the wet grass of morning.

"Seems to me they are better in their boxes," said the doctor, dubiously, as he saw this arrangement. "Sue will like the fun of opening the papers."

"Just as you like, but they sparkle so and make the tree so pretty," said Lucille, gently swinging the necklace and watching the lightnings in the diamond pendant.

"Oh, well, leave them if you like," said the doctor, who never said No to Lucille if he could possibly help it, and she, as ready to please him, took the jewels off the tree and laid them in the boxes at the foot, smiling pleasantly the while, for she had caught sight of two beady black eyes and a dark face peeping through the crack in the shutter, and her innocent design to please Mox was satisfied.

"There, that is all. I am going to just light the candles to get the full effect once, and then put them out till morning." And Lucille, very much of a child, after all, in some ways, did as she suggested, lighted the tree, walked all around to get the full benefit of its glories, and then with the doctor's help extinguished the candles, closed and barred the shutters, and they went out, locking the door on the outside but leaving the key in the lock.

"And now, Lem, I'm going to bed," announced Lucille, wearily; "for it will be another hard day to-morrow. You will see to all the doors and windows."

"Yes. Good-night, little girl. Lucille, are you quite happy to-night?"

"Happy!" echoed the girl, blushing painfully under her brother's scrutinizing eye. "Why shouldn't I be? Christmas is the time to be merry, isn't it?"

"Merry isn't happy, you know," replied Doctor Lem, sententiously, as he walked towards the front door to lock it.

Three hours later, that is to say about one o'clock in the morning, a horse galloped up the driveway of The Cedars, and a man, rolling clumsily off the animal's back, knocked loudly at the front door.

After some moments a window opened and the doctor's voice sleepily demanded:

"Who's that?"

"Mrs. Bickerton is taken very bad in convulsions, and they want you to come over right away," replied a coarse voice muffled in a shawl tied over the mouth, for the storm continued and it was very cold.

"All right," replied Doctor Lem, rather dolefully. "I'll go as soon as I can get my horse harnessed."

"You can take this one. I've tied him to the post," replied the voice. "I'm going to stop in the village."

"Very well. Are you Mrs. Bickerton's man?"

"Yes." And the heavy steps of Mr. Bickerton's man were heard crunching the icy gravel as he clumped down the drive. Ten minutes later the doctor came down, pulling on his warm gloves and settling his chin into his muffler.

"What does possess women to choose the middle of the night to be sick in?" muttered he, pettishly, as he banged the front door after him, and cautiously descended the icy steps to the post where Bickerton's white-faced horse stood, pawing the ground and whinnying impatiently.

"So, Hector, so, old fellow," coaxed the doctor, who had sold Hector to his present owner; and Hector, recognizing a familiar voice, whinnied again and allowed the doctor to mount.

Scarcely had the sharp ring of his hoof-beats died away up on the frozen air than a dark figure emerged from the shrubbery close to the dining-room windows, and quietly stole round to the back of the house, where lay a scullery window into whose broken pane of glass Aunt Betty had that morning comfortably stuffed an old shawl, meaning to tell master to send for the glazier when Christmas "been done gone." The dark and silent figure, evidently pursuing a carefully digested plan of action, climbed upon a rain-water butt under this window, pushed out the shawl, inserted a hand and arm, removed the stick securing the window, softly raised the sash and stepped in, closing it after him, and even replacing the shawl in the broken pane.

His next act was to remove his shoes and sling them about his neck, and then taking a small dark lantern from his breast, he carefully threw its light around the place, noticing the position of doors, windows and furniture with a little nod at each one.

"That's the door into the kitchen," decided he, replacing the lantern in his breast-pocket, and proceeding with long, quick steps, to unlatch and pass through the door. The embers of the great fire Aunt Betty had heaped for Christmas Eve still glimmered upon the hearth, and by their red light the robber, for so he stands confessed, perceived that some one lay asleep upon an extempore bed in the chimney-corner. He stopped, looked, listened, bent forward, and as for the first time his face became visible, one could not but see even in that dim light how evil and brutal a face it was, and how practiced in crime. The sleeper lay buried in the coverings, and only a regular, heavy breathing showed that it was a person at all. The man straightened himself, scowling darkly and fumbling in his pocket at a short, heavy bar of iron hidden there.

"All the worse for you if you wake, my dear," said he to himself, concluding it to be one of the servants, and, passing on, always in that soft cat-like motion, he passed through another door, a side-passage, and into the dining-room, where, through the darkness of the stormy midnight, the great trophy of polished silver, with the golden and jeweled testimonial in the midst, flashed back the rays of the dark-lantern greedily thrown over it by this horrible inverse Santa Claus, who now proceeded to take a great sack from under his coat and softly transfer one article after another from the sideboard to its depths, beginning with the testimonial, whose garnet eyes flashed red anger and dismay at such humiliation. All at once he paused, laid down the bag, whispering to himself:

"Better get the sparklers and them things first, so's if I have to cut off sudden I'll make sure of them. Soon's the old man finds out the cheat, he'll pelt home like——"

The whisper died away, and, hiding his lantern, the burglar, with that instinctive sense of topography which is part of the natural outfit of the higher professors of his art, crossed the room noiselessly, opened the right door, traversed the long hall, and softly tried the study-door. Locked but with the key left in the lock, a saving of time and noise certainly, although Theft, like Love, laughs at locksmiths. Once inside, and the door closed behind him, the burglar breathed more freely, and, setting his lantern upon a table, its light thrown upon the tree, he pushed back his old fur cap and wiped the sweat of honest labor from his brow with the sleeve of his pea-jacket.

As he did so he started violently, stepped backward and stood, his head craned forward, his jaw fallen open, his eyes distended, staring at something half-seen in the shadow of an alcove draped with hangings of deep purple, against which the white figure within stood out in startling relief. It was the life-size statue of a woman with a child in her arms, an exquisite copy in marble of the Sistine Madonna which Doctor Lem had found during a hurried visit to New York just after his boy's birth, and, with all the extravagance of proud paternity, bought as a Christmas gift to the little heir himself. Lucille had arranged the purple alcove from whose shadows the marble gleamed so startlingly, and the young mother was to meet this among her other surprises on Christmas morn.

Our burglar had never heard of the Sistine Madonna; in fact, except in the way of blasphemy, he had never heard of her Blessed Son, but he had associations of his own with cold white mothers and children, so strong an association that, during the ten years he had just spent in the State Prison, rarely a night passed over in which he did not start from his sleep bathed in sweat, trembling with terror, and casting his eyes fearfully towards a certain corner of his cell where, when the fit was at the worst, he saw a tall, pale woman, her yellow hair streaming over her shoulders and a red torrent of blood mingling with it and dripping upon that lifeless, placid little form in her arms. So they looked just before she fell at his feet, and he was dragged away to jail, already raving in delirium tremens.

"My God! are they here, too?" muttered the burglar, glaring into the purple shadows, while a red mist before his eyes colored and blurred all before him. A slight noise close beside him made him start afresh and turn to meet a new horror, and yet such a charming sight! A little child, her golden curls matted and tumbled upon her neck; her great, blue, innocent eyes wide open, yet looking at nothing; her soft and dewy lips parted in a seraphic smile. One dimpled hand gathered the night-dress away from her feet, which shone out white and rosy upon the dark carpet, and the other was extended eagerly as if to receive something.

A pretty sight, a lovely sight, a holy sight on Christmas morning, but all the horrors of the pit could not have more affrighted that stalwart and swarthy ruffian, who staring at it, dropped on both knees muttering: "Little Hetty! She's in glory, and I'm damned!"

A door creaked but he did not hear it, a hesitating step crossed the hall and paused outside the door. Still the burglar saw nothing, heard nothing, but the little child who had turned so that her wistful hand was stretched towards him, and her sweet lips babbled half-aloud "Papa's 'ittle girl."

At the sound of her voice the door was softly pushed open, and a tall, pale woman with yellow hair streaming over her shoulders, a white blanket dragged around her like drapery, and wild frightened eyes, stepped into the room and stared at the child.

The burglar uttered a howl like that of a wild beast with the dogs upon him.

"Hester, too!" groaned he, crouching yet lower, and lifting an arm as if to shield himself from attack.

She had not seen him before in the partial light, but turning now she fixed her frightened eyes upon him, and cried out in incredulous terror:

"Bill! It can't be you!"

The human voice and commonplace words broke the spell. Bill Mace looked up, the horror in his eyes changing to brutish wrath.

"Who are you, anyway?" growled he, rising slowly to his feet and glaring first at the woman, then the child, not without an uneasy glance into the alcove.

"Oh, Bill, it can't be you! And what are you doing here? I was coming to meet you and I fell sick."

"Phew!" gasped the man, inhaling a full breath, for the sense of suffocation was lifting from his chest.

"I thought you was dead."

"I laid at death's door many a month, and then I wasn't right in my head and was in a hospital ever so long, and since that I've been working and trying to get a little place ready against you come out, Bill, and then when the day was nigh at hand I set out to walk——"

"What's the kid?" interrupted Bill, impatiently. "Did Hetty get over it, too?"

"Oh, no, no; Hetty is dead, dead, dead!" shrieked the bereaved mother, thus rudely reminded of her child's death and the cause of her death.

At sound of that shrill cry little Maud awoke from her walking dream, and staring about with terror-stricken eyes, set up a piteous cry for mamma and Auntie Lu, running wildly around the room not yet awake enough to see the door.

"Curse the brat, she'll raise the house!" growled Mace, making one stride and seizing the little creature by her floating hair, while the other great black hand pressed over her mouth and now stifled not only the outcry but the breath of life itself.

"Let go of her, murderer! Isn't one baby enough for you to have on your soul?" shrieked Hester, darting forward and trying to tear away those iron hands.

Now Mace had not intended to harm the child, only to suppress her dangerous clamor, and he felt quite as much aggrieved, perhaps more so, at this false accusation and cutting taunt as a purely innocent man might have done; so, still grasping poor little Maud's face and throat in his right hand, he inflicted a backhanded slap with the left upon his wife's mouth, bringing the blood from her nose and sending her reeling back against the door, which at the same moment was pushed open to admit Lucille, partly dressed, and carrying a candle in her hand.

"What is all this, Maud? Let go that child this instant, you villain!"

She spoke as if to a dog, and like a dog he obeyed, releasing his prey and falling snarling back for a step; but then, lacking a dog's honesty of purpose, the lust of gain returned upon him with a bound, and exclaiming, "I won't lose what I came for, if all the women out of Bedlam stand in the way!" he sprung towards the Christmas-tree, and, gathering up the jewel-cases, crammed them into the breast of his Jersey.

"Indeed you sha'n't take those things!" exclaimed Lucille, starting forward and laying a slender white hand upon his arm, fearless in her maiden purity as Una with the lion, or Margaret treading down the dragon who writhes but dares not sting that virgin foot.

Bill Mace stared in utter stupefaction at the slender lily-white creature thus defying and commanding him; then, shaking off her hand, said almost gently:

"Oh, you won't miss 'em, rich folks like you, and they'll make an honest man of me. If I get away clear this time, I'm going to swear off all these little games. That's the bargain I made with myself as I stood peeking in at that window."

"You!" exclaimed Lucille, remembering her own foolish good-nature towards Mox.

"Yes. I thought you saw me once, but guess you didn't. There, now; I can't stop talking till the old man gets home. You tell him I stole the horse a-purpose, because I heard them talking how the doctor had sold it to Bickerton, and Bickerton's wife was like to be sick, so I just stepped up and walked Bickerton's horse out of his stable and rode him down here, and sent the doctor off on a fool's errand. Now, then!"

He had secured everything of value on the tree while he was talking, and now turned towards the door, but Lucille's quick ear had caught the rattle of wheels, the beat of horse's hoofs upon the frozen ground, and she had already thrust Maud into the hall, sprung out after her, locked the door, and was flying like a deer through the long entry to the front door, which she threw wide open, shrieking:

"Help! help! Lem, is it you? Oh, quick! quick!"

"What is it—what's the matter, Lu?" exclaimed the doctor's voice; and, springing from the open wagon before it stopped, he rushed up the steps followed by another figure muffled like himself from the wintry weather.

"Quick! quick!" cried the girl, not stopping to look at either, but darting back to the study door. "Quick, or he'll have the window open!"

She threw open the door, and a horrible sight met the eyes of the two men pressing close behind.

Mace, shaking and tearing at the locked door, had heard the rattle of wheels and Lucille's frantic outcry for help; heard and understood his danger.

Leaving the door, he flew to the window, the very one through whose obligingly opened shutters he had seen the treasures of the Christmas-tree. Now, however, both these and the patent iron shutter within were closed, and the fastenings of the latter were somewhat complicated and strange to him. He was fumbling at them, however, when Hester, recovering from the maze of terror and astonishment in which she had stood during the last few moments, sprang upon him, crying:

"You sha'n't rob this house, Bill; you sha'n't carry off those things. You'll be caught and die in jail. Drop them and I'll help you off—I know how them shutters go—and I tell you I've got a home for you, and I'll work for you, and nobody can hurt you now you've served your time out; drop 'em, Bill, drop 'em, and I'll help you off, but I swear you sha'n't carry off those things!"

"Sha'n't, sha'n't I?" growled Bill, struggling with her, for she was thrusting a hand into his breast and clutching at the packages there. "We'll see!"

And exerting all his strength he tore her hands from their grasp and sent her reeling back against the wall, which prevented her fall to the ground. But like a cat she darted back upon him, clutching him round the neck with both arms and clinging like a leech to his whole body, clinging the closer as he tried to shake her off, as he beat her with his open palm, with his clinched fist, as he grew furious and dragged and tore at those clinging arms, again and again wrenched asunder, and again and again wreathing themselves together in a chain of living iron.

Poets sing, and artists paint, and historians warm to romancists as they tell of Margaret Douglass giving her lovely arm to be crushed and mangled in place of the missing bolt, that so her king might escape his murderers; but has not Hester Bray, poor, unlovely, unknown as she was, has not she an equal right to admiration, and the chaplet of heroism and martyr?

Martyr? Yes, for as the door flew open and rescue came, the man whom she would not suffer to damn himself afresh by robbery, did it in her despite by murder, for, clutching her by the throat with both his iron hands, he crushed the life out of her, and flung her down a broken, flaccid mass, a little moan, a little quiver of the bleeding fingers alone telling that life remained. Then aiming a blow at the doctor's face and plunging past him with the impetus, he made towards the door, and would have escaped but for the stalwart stranger standing there, who received him with a blow terrible as his own, and sent him staggering backwards to be prostrated by the next. He fought like a very demon, fist and foot, and teeth and claws, but his captors were resolute and strong, and presently had him lying there, bound hand and foot with the rope ready-witted Lucille ran to fetch before it was demanded.

"There!" panted Doctor Lem, surveying his captive, "now, you rascal, you're safe for State Prison at least, and, if this woman is dead, you shall swing for murder."

A ghastly change passed over the murderer's face at these last words, and he rolled his ferocious eyes towards the motionless body of his wife. Perhaps he remembered the haunting vision of ten years, and dreaded lest some new and more terrible torment were now to come upon him—lest hanging were to be only the precursor of eternity, for ever haunted by that accusing form.

"She is not quite dead, but it's a wonder," pronounced the doctor, examining the motionless body. "Lucille, have hot water made ready as fast as possible and a bed. Where's my medicine-case?—here!"

He forced a powerful stimulant between her lips, bathed temples and wrists with hartshorn, applied all the heroic treatment of which the new school of medicine is not afraid, and presently rose from his knees, pale and exhausted, saying:

"She lives, and may recover; I do not know."

"Let us get her to bed," said the stranger, who, through all had rendered such help as he might, but never, when it was possible, removed his eyes from Lucille, who, having glanced once at him, looked no more, but flitted about on the doctor's behests, soothed poor little Sue, frightened into hysterics by the only half-explained commotion, pacified Maud and reduced Aunt Betty from clamorous disorder to violent usefulness.

All was over at last. Hester, fluctuating between life and death, yet inclining steadily towards life, was placed in bed, with Nancy Bell to watch her. The burglar was securely locked in a cellar-kitchen, and Mox dispatched to the village for a constable and force to arrest and take him to jail. Aunt Betty was preparing coffee and what she called "a snack," to refresh the early risers, or, rather, the sleepless watchers.

Doctor Lem went up-stairs to explain everything and soothe the excited little wife, and Lucille volunteered to lay a table in the dining-room for the aforesaid snack. Pausing in front of the half-denuded sideboard to reproach herself for the carelessness that had left the glittering bait displayed, she heard some one enter the room, come close behind her, and stop.

Why didn't she turn round to see who it was? Who knows? Perhaps she was so absorbed in the beauty of the cream-pitcher she was contemplating, perhaps because the great salver behind it acted as a mirror, and in it she saw, without turning, that face—strong, manly, bearded and bronzed, but just now tremulous with doubt and emotion—that bent above her.

"Lucille, won't you speak to me?" said a low voice.

Then she turned, and, without raising her eyes, put out a slender, cold, little hand, murmuring the while:

"Ought I to speak to you, Robert?"

"Yes, for I am repentant. I told you the next morning after that horrible orgie, in which, mad with wine, I intruded upon you and my sister, and insulted you with caresses I never had dared to dream of sober, I told you that you never should see me again unless it was as a changed man. Three years, my Lily, I have tested the reality of the change that moment wrought, and, before God, I swear to you that it is real and to be trusted. Lucille, I love you; Lucille, come back to me—oh, my life, my love, my promised wife, come back to me! Come!"

His arms reached out towards her as those of a drowning man towards the spar thrown to save him; she turned slowly, slowly towards him, raised her dewy eyes, smiled tremulously, and sank, soft as a snowflake and as pure, into those open arms that closed tight around her, claiming her their own, then and for ever.

So they stood, while clear and bright through the Christmas morning rang the voices of the boys, sure to get a guerdon for their waits at that house if nowhere else:

"Christ is born in Bethlehem,
Peace on earth goodwill to men."

MY ADVENTURE
WITH QUEEN VICTORIA'S YOUNGEST DAUGHTER.

"DON'T miss a little dinner at the Star and Garter at Richmond."

"Go to Windsor."

"Visit the castle."

"Take a day off for Virginia Water."

"Dine at the Wheat Sheaf."

"No, dine at the White Hart in the town of Windsor; it's right under the castle."

I was standing in the bay-window of the Parthenon Club, New York, and had just announced to some of the men in the room that I was booked by the Germania for the following Saturday.

I wanted to do a little of the London season, run back to Saratoga, and wind up at Newport. This was my programme. Neat enough, in all conscience. Nearly every man in the club had done Europe, and it was confoundedly humiliating to me, never to be able to open my lips upon a subject that was familiar in their mouths as household words. I was twenty-five, good for $10,000 a year, not in the least afraid to face my tailor, and heart-whole.

How many men have gone across the pond heart-whole, to return with just a fragment left, this barely sufficient to send blood enough to the brain to preserve all memory of her.

"Stop at the Langham, George Whipple!" exclaimed one.

"Try the Grosvenor!" urged another.

"Long's for me."

"Thomas's is awfully swelly."

"Here's Posy Vanderkirk. He'll give you the straight tip."

"Posy," so called from the fact of his buttonhole being perennially adorned with a bright particular flower, advised me to stop at the Blenheim.

"It's in King Street, St. James's. It's bang in the best centre, near everything, from the Bouquetières of the Burlington Arcade to Sneyd's, where you'll get a mint-julep that would shame even General Marcy's. Besides which, it's a bachelor's hostlery, where the frou-frou of a petticoat is never heard, and as free from that dangerous sex as the island of St. Senanus."

* * * * * * *

Twelve days later, I enjoyed my first ride in a hansom as I dashed up to the entrance of a quiet, unpretentious-looking, old-fashioned—save for its plate-glass windows—red-brick house. The moment I entered the Blenheim I felt that Posy Vanderkirk had spoken wisely and well. Comfort was written in invisible letters on everything, from the port-wine-nosed waiters to the roast-beef-fed clerk, from the oaken wainscots to the silver tableware; from the Turkey rugs to the caressing easy-chairs. I dined à l'anglaise; hare soup, whitebait, and saddle of mutton, drinking Bass all through the piece. At a table close to mine—the tables were all small and exquisitely appointed—I noticed a tall, pinkish-faced, red-necked young fellow, with silken, hay-colored hair parted in the centre, a mustache of pretty much the same hue, that drooped heavily over his mouth in two long wisps—I can call them nothing else—bright-blue eyes, and a laughing face.

I heard him say to the well-bred waiter, who was the very personification of calm intelligence:

"By Jove! I shawnt wait any longer. Let's have dinner," as though he expected some person to dine with him.

What a miserable time these mustaches had! Such tugging and wiping and twisting; they dipped into everything, and seemingly required dressing after every morsel that passed into the mouth of their pink-faced proprietor!

I had just struck my stilton, and was watching with scrutinizing gaze the movements of my waiter as he delicately uncorked a pint of port, when he of the pink face, nodding gayly, suddenly exclaimed:

"I think I traveled up from Liverpool with you to-day, sir?"

I suppose he perceived my embarrassment, for he added, with a light laugh:

"I remained in the smoking-carriage, although my traps were in your compartment."

It suddenly flashed upon me that his hay-colored mustache had drooped into the carriage at Euston; but I was so nervous about my baggage—the English system of check being so barbarous—that I had no eyes for anybody.

"Do you mind my coming to your table? I'm on the same cheese and the same wine. An offaly. I'm in for the gout, in any case, as my people have had since the battle of Hastings from drinking some of the cursed red wine brought over by the conquerors; so I may as well earn a twinge or two," moving his chair as he spoke.

Having informed him that I had just arrived from t'other side, he exclaimed:

"You've not an American?"

"Why not?" I laughed.

"You're too well-dressed. Where's your long black hair, and your long black frock-coat, and your square-toed boots, and your any amount of shirt front, and your diamond studs?"

"Nous avons changé tout cela," I laughed.

"Je crois bien. We're in brutal ignorance about you fellows over there," he observed, after I had lighted him up a little on the subject of Gotham. "By Jove! I'll get you fifty men at my club who'd assert, ay, and lay the odds, that they'll shoot buffalo within ten miles of New York, and that the farmers around the immediate country are afraid of being scalped by the Indians. My brother believed in all that sort of thing, you know, until he went out West with Lord Dunraven, and, by Jove! he tells us that it is hard to get a crack at a buffalo out there, as a stag of ten tyne, here."

At this moment a waiter entered, bearing upon a silver salver a letter in a great square envelope.

"A servant waits for an answer, my lord," said the waiter, as he handed my chatty companion the note.

"Excuse me, sir," bowing to me as he tore open the envelope and flung it upon the table. I glanced at the superscription, "The Earl of Tossington."

* * * * *

"How the deuce did she know I was in town," he muttered, as he tugged fiercely at each wisp of mustache in turn. "Cawn't be done. I'm on duty at Windsor to-morrow."

"The writing materials are in that corner, my lord," observed the attentive waiter. His lordship sprang to his feet, plunged at the corner in question, and, in two minutes, had written and parted with his reply.

"Confound electricity," he laughed, as he rejoined me. "It picks a fellow out, and drops him like a Martini-Henry. Is there enough of hickory in your head to stand your share in another bottle of this port?"

"This wine only attacks the toes, so have at it," I laughed. Lord Tossington chatted brightly and gayly, after his own fashion. He laid out a programme for my guidance, commencing with the Tower of London, and ending at the Crystal Palace at Sydenham.

"I'm awfully sorry I cannot do something more for you, for, by Jove! you fellows at the other side stood by my brother like bricks of the most adhesive quality. If you wouldn't mind giving this card at St. James's Palace they'll show you the rickety, tumble-down old hole, and, if you care for pictures and all that sort of thing, Sir Joshua Reynolds and Gainsborough and that lot, I'll give you my card to Grosvenor House. They've got the celebrated blue boy, or green boy, or yellow boy, by Jove! I cannot say which, there. It's a colored boy, anyhow, and dabbed up by Gainsborough."

"You are really too kind, Lord Tossington," addressing him for the first time by his name, on glancing at his card.

"I'm in the beauties. If you care to see the barracks of the Household Troop, I'll be at Knightsbridge on Thursday. Fact is, I'm here almost incog—that's why I didn't go to the club—and won't be on show till to-morrow, when I go down to Windsor."

"I intend spending a long day at Windsor and Virginia Water."

"Why not come down to-morrow, Mr. Whipple? Come to the main guard and awak for me."

"I really do not like to trespass."

"By Jove! The way you fellows over the way stood by my brother makes it incumbent on me to stand to every American I meet, always provided he's not a cad, you know."

His lordship departed I know not whither, and I turned into St. James's Street to gaze at the clubs. After having had a good long stare at Brook's, Boodle's, and White's, I strolled along Piccadilly, tapped the Criterion for "Pink Dominoes," and wound up the night with a dozen copper-tinted natives. How I longed for a Blue Point half-shell at Scott's in the Haymarket!

"To-morrow for Windsor," I thought, as I jumped into bed. "What a lucky chance. Perhaps I'll get a look at the Queen?"

What a strange day that morrow was destined to prove! I had a whiting, its tail in its mouth, for breakfast, together with hot buttered muffins. My teeth water while I recall that meal. A hansom took me to Paddington Station, and I was soon speeding at the rate of fifty miles an hour through the loveliest portion of Merrie England. Among the royal palaces of Europe, Windsor Castle justly lays claim to the first place. Some, like the Escurial, may be larger; others, like Heidelburg, may even surpass it in beauty of site; others, again, like the old fortress of the Popes on the rocky bluff by the Rhône, may be more perfect in architecture, according to poor Bayard Taylor; but in none are size, beauty and grandeur so united as in the first and oldest of the royal residences. At Avignon, indeed, where, for so long, Popes, orthodox or schismatical, kept their courts, a cathedral and a fortress stand side by side; but Windsor is a palace, an abbey, a college, and a barrack, all in one.

As the train swept past the antique town of Eton, an elderly gentleman of aristocratic aspect seeing my guide-book en evidence, courteously undertook the task of "personally conducting," and after giving me a rapid description of the college, of which, from his tone, I could gather that he was an alumnus—

"Now," he exclaimed, "you see Windsor Castle! That is the Curfew Tower, and it is backed by the turrets of St. George's Chapel. The Curfew Tower dates from Henry II. The old vaulted dungeon yet remains beneath it, and you will remember, if you have read Harrison Ainsworth's 'Windsor Castle,' that many of its most thrilling scenes are laid in this tower. It was there the butcher Mark Finwolf was imprisoned, and from its battlements he was hanged. In the upper chamber the encounter took place between Henry VIII. and Herne the Hunter, where bluff King Hal fired at the demon with a 'dag' as the latter sank through the floor."

As we reached the station, my obliging companion asked me if I had an order from the lord chamberlain to visit the castle, and having replied in the negative, observed:

"You are unfortunate, sir. Her Majesty is at present at Windsor, as you will perceive by the floating of the royal standard from St. George's Tower;" adding, with a smile, "And as she is not in the best of humors, even the portions of the castle usually open to visitors are for the present closed."

"I have a friend at court," I laughed.

"You'll need one," and lifting his hat and bowing, he turned away.

Having inquired my way to the public entrance to the castle, I ascended the hill, casting a remembering glance at the Hostelry of the White Hart on my right, with a view to possible contingencies later on, and after five minutes' walking, struck Henry VIII.'s gateway.

Passing a giant in a bearskin shako and blood-red tunic—one of the Grenadier Guards—I found myself in a long, irregular, shelving courtyard, the lowest of three wards, or plateaux; to my right, on a terrace, the houses of the Military Knights of Windsor; at the upper end of the ward rose the huge mass of the Round Tower, in front stood the magnificent pile of St. George's Chapel, and on either side of it clusters of irregular groups of buildings—the houses of the dean and canons, quarters for the soldiers, and the like.

I soon found the main guard, and having asked for the Earl of Tossington, after some delay was informed his lordship was in "h'attendance on Her Majesty as h'eddycong."

"I am aware of that. Lord Tossington told me so. He wished me to send for him."

The sergeant, a most respectful giant, retired to an inner apartment, to reappear in a moment.

"The h'earl is lord-in-waiting, sir. Her Majesty is a-walking on the slopes with her Royal 'Ighness the Princess Mary of Cambridge. If you wish to see the h'earl, please to leave your card. His lordship will be off duty at two o'clock."

It was but twelve. A stroll round the town or into the Park would kill the two hours.

"Thanks, sergeant. Please to let Lord Tossington have my card and say that I shall return at two o'clock."

"Right, sir."

As I was turning away, the sergeant exclaimed:

"A friend of the h'earl's, sir?"

"Well—an acquaintance. The fact is, I am an American, and want to do the castle."

"If you was thinking of strolling in the Great Park, sir, I could take you round by the Terrace and past Her Majesty's private garden, and by the long walk into the Great Park."

"I wish you would."

"Right, sir. Be pleased to come with me."

The sergeant was as good as his word, and in a few minutes I was on the Terrace. Beneath me the grand elms, two hundred years old, casting their cooling shadows over the rich greensward; to the left, the Home Park stretched away towards the silvery Thames, with its fine old beeches and forest kings, skirting Her Majesty's private garden, laid out in the formal Italian style, sunk and adorned with many statues. My cicerone conducted me under the southern façade and on to the long walk.

As I was fumbling in my pocket for the queen's shilling, the sergeant stiffly saluted, and beat a dignified, if not a hasty, retreat.

I strolled beyond the limit of the Home Park, across the Datchet Road, and into the heart of the Great Park, at Snow Hill, pausing to cast a glance of contempt at the equestrian atrocity of the mutton-eating George III.

Nowhere is the Park more beautiful than here. The broken and undulating ground offers a constant succession of sylvan scenes; fern-clad dells and glades beneath the over-arching boughs, where the rabbits scamper rustling over the withered beech-leaves, and the stag raises his royal head to gaze in proud indifference on the intruder. Each step through this varying scenery brings to light some new beauty; now the great beeches close in the path, now they open to afford glimpses of the earth as if set in rustic framework.

Drinking in the loveliness of the scene, I wandered around until I found myself in a solitude as complete as in the forest of the Schwartzwald. I was surrounded by venerable oaks, their branches rugged, gnarled, shattered; their boles knotted, scarred, hollow, with great gaping rents; mere ruins now, but infinitely more picturesque than in the days of their supreme vigor.

"I shall not proceed any further," I reasoned, "as I must be back at the castle at two o'clock to meet my lord of Tossington. I'll set me down in yon lichen-covered oak root, and day dream."

I did not know, until subsequently, that the seat I had chosen was part and parcel of William the Conqueror's oak, which is reported to have lived one thousand years, and to have been a favorite tree with him whose name it bears.

I had not indulged in any very lengthened reverie, when the barking of a dog, "baying a deep-mouthed welcome," came to me. And presently the creaking of dead branches and falling leaves announced the approach of the animal itself. I dislike dogs, and dogs dislike me. There is no love lost between us. Instinct seems to tell the brutes I'll none of them, and the quietest and most silken pet spaniel will growl at me.

The dog that came bounding and sniffing into the place where I sat was a superb deerhound, with eyes of amber, and fangs black as night, and hair that bristled like a boar's.

He sprang towards me, and, ere I could realize my peril, was at my throat. I yelled a thundering "Down, sir!" and clutched wildly at the animal's leather collar. The strength of madness seemed to be in my arms as I wrestled with the ghastly demon of hydrophobia, gibbering and mowing at me.

The dog had pinned me against the tree. Had he thrown me to earth, I would have enjoyed but a short shrift and a dog's death.

The glittering white teeth, the black fangs, the flaming eyes, the bristling mane, the hot breath, are close to my face as I write, and even now I contemplate that awful moment with a shudder.

"Down Conrad! Down! Oh, my God, he will kill the man!" muttered a girlish voice. A woman's gloved hand came between me and the jaws of the frenzied brute, while a shower of blows from a light riding-whip descended across the dog's eyes.

"Go away!" I blurted. "Save yourself! He's mad! Fly!" But as I spoke the gloved hand had seized the dog's collar, and the huge brute lay palpitating, its long, pink, foam-flecked tongue lolling out of its mouth, at the girl's feet.

"You are hurt, sir!" she exclaimed, an agony in her face.

"Never mind me," I gasped, "save yourself!"

The girl grasped an oaken branch and commenced to beat the dog about the head. The animal, I am bound to say, taking its punishment with high-bred courage and dignity.

"Your throat is bitten, sir!" exclaimed the young lady. "You must see a surgeon at once. Dr. Jenner is at the castle. You must see him."

I put my hand to my throat, and, in removing my fingers, found that they were stained with blood. My heart gave a leap of terror, but I am proud to say I succeeded in assuming an air of defiant sang-froid.

"A mere scratch. Is the dog yours?"

"He is. I never knew him to attack anybody before. Please come this way, I beg—I insist!" pointing as she spoke in the direction from whence she had come.

There was a ring of command in her tone, the imperiousness of one accustomed to be obeyed.

I gazed intently upon her, and my heart almost stood still, for I saw that it was the Princess Beatrice, Queen Victoria's youngest daughter.

Should I recognize her? Was I bound to respect her incognito? Perceiving my embarrassment, and justly discerning its cause, she calmly said:

"I am the Princess Beatrice—this is the dog given to the Queen by the Emperor of Austria. If you wish to have him shot he shall be shot within ten minutes."

"Not for ten thousand dollars, your Royal Highness!" I cried. "This is but a scratch, and—and—I shall be ever grateful to the dog for having afforded me the honor of this interview."

"That is all very well," she smiled; "but the interview would scarcely repay you if——" She paused, shuddered, and quickly added, "You must see Dr. Jenner. He is at the castle now. Quick walking will bring us to him in twenty minutes. I know a short cut," and with the guilty Conrad stalking by her side, the Queen's youngest daughter plunged into the forest, I, George Whipple, following at her heels.

She wore a white dress all in plaits. Her gloves were white, her aumonière was of some kind of untanned leather, with oxidized gold frame and clasps and chain. Her hat was pure Gainsborough, turned up with blood-red satin, the feather, which swept down her shoulder, of the same color. Her shoes were thick-soled, low, and tied in front by coquettish bows of black ribbon. Her hosen were of scarlet.

"Do you live in Windsor?" she asked, after we had trudged on a little, and while I was still endeavoring to realize the situation.

"Oh, dear, no! I am an American."

She cast a rapid, inquiring glance at me.

"My brother, the Prince of Wales, is for ever talking of your country. You treated him right royally."

"We would do so again and again," I replied; "and if he were accompanied by your Royal Highness, we'd go perfectly crazy."

She seemed pleased at this.

"I hope to visit my sister in Canada one of these days."

"Then you'll return by way of New York?"

"I seriously hope so. I want to see Broadway. I have heard ever so many of our young men who go over to 'pot'—isn't that the word?—buffalo, rave over its brightness, its life, its go."

"It is wondrously vivid."

"That's not a bad way of describing it. I want to see Niagara, too. My brother-in-law's sisters and the Campbell girls are going over. I do wish I were going with them."

She walked very rapidly, and once or twice I found myself a laggard.

"Do I walk too quickly for you? The fact is, I am accustomed to such long pedestrian excursions in Scotland when we are at Balmoral, and do such a lot of mountain work, that I distance all my brothers, except, perhaps, the Duke of Connaught. As for Bertie—I mean the Prince of Wales—I leave him nowhere; but he's getting awfully stout."

I saw that this high-born lady was doing her uttermost to set me at my ease—endeavoring in every possible way to atone for the misconduct of her dog, and be it said I never felt more at home with any girl in my life. There was an entre nous, a delicious familiarity in her manner, that while it fairly intoxicated me, savored more of the capriciense than of the princess. It was the mood of a fair woman resolved upon making you pleased—not fascinated with her.

"Have you been long in England?" she asked.

"I arrived yesterday," and in a few words I related my adventure at the Blenheim with the Earl of Tossington.

"He's in waiting to-day. What a pleasure it will be to me to let you see the castle. You shall do the whole of it, from the Curfew Tower to my boudoir—the latter a privilege not usually accorded to what newspapers term distinguished foreigners."

We struck a small doorway, oak-ribbed and bolted with iron. Between the heavy bars we could perceive the gleam of a redcoat. The princess rapped loudly with the branch of oak which she still held in her hand. The sentinel peered cautiously through the bars, and in a second flung open the door, standing and saluting, while he sang out some unintelligible order.

In an instant a young officer plunged from the guardhouse, his huge bearskin shako trembling over his eyes as he hastily buckled on his sword, and at his heels half a dozen of the guard pipe-clayed to within an inch of their lives.

The princess made a gentle inclination of her head as we passed this row of living statues, the officer's sword almost tipping my nose as he flashed it to the salute.

Across a quadrangle, through a tunneled passage lined with flaming and perfume-laden flowers, and we struck the private garden, a glow of ribbon border and bloom.

In a deep embrasured window, framed in claret-colored velvet curtains, sat a stout, elderly lady in black, wearing a Marie Stuart cap of white. She was engaged in reading, and it needed no cicerone to tell me that I gazed at the Queen of England.

There she sat, quietly enjoying her book, the sun, in the meanwhile, endeavoring, in its unvarying course, to find a resting-place in her vast and mighty Empire.

"That's the—that's mamma," said the princess, in the most natural manner possible.

The Queen suddenly raised her eyes from her book and gazed calmly upon us. Her Majesty, it is scarcely necessary to say, failed to recognize me, and her eyes followed me with a searching scrutiny, especially when I uncovered, in passing beneath the window. I could see that she was endeavoring to place me, and as I turned into a gilded doorway—the royal arms of England glittering on every side—I perceived Her Majesty craning her neck in a final effort to ascertain who I was.

"Go to Sir William Jenner's apartments, and tell him to come to the 'Rubens Room' at once"—this to a giant in scarlet-and-gold and powder and silk stockings.

"If your Royal Highness will permit me, I shall follow this servant to Doctor Jenner's quarters," I interposed.

"Perhaps that would be as well. Stay, Bolton—ask Mr. Campbell, of Islay, to accompany this gentleman to Sir William Jenner's."

"May it please your Royal Highness, Mr. Campbell has left the castle."

"Who is groom-in-waiting?"

"The Honorable Mr. Lindsay."

"Ask him, then."

The man bowed and disappeared as noiselessly as the ghost of the Corsican brother.

At this moment a handsome, aristocratic-looking and very plainly-dressed lady, save for her rings, which were of enormous value, glided from behind ruby velvet portières.

This lady gazed steadily through me, as she said to the princess:

"Her Majesty wishes to see your Royal Highness."

The princess turned to me.

"When Dr. Jenner has seen you, you will please ask Mr. Lindsay to conduct you to the private apartments—to the Blue Drawing-room;" and with a sweeping courtesy, the Princess Beatrice vanished behind the silent portières, closely followed by the lady, whom I afterward learned was the Marchioness of Ely and lady-in-waiting.

Mr. Lindsay appeared with considerable promptitude, and as we traveled in knee-deep velvet carpets, passing pictures and statuary and flowers, and bric-à-brac and stained glass, and gilding and royal arms, and gorgeousness and glitter of every description, I briefly narrated my adventure with the dog.

"Awfully nawsty of the brute, I'm sure," was the sole comment of the groom-in-waiting.

We found Sir William Jenner in his library—and what a bijou library! with a deep recessed window lined with books, and gazing upon the Home Park—engaged in reading Aristophanes in the Greek.

His eager courtesy and gracious kindness are two bright resting-places in my memory.

After a rapid and careful examination of my throat, he gleefully exclaimed:

"I am happy to say, sir, that you are neither frightened nor hurt. The blood on your throat came from the dog's tongue; he probably scratched his tongue against one of his teeth. It was a narrow shave, though—much too close. Do you know anything of this dog, Mr. Groom-in-waiting?"

"It's an awfully lamb-y sort of brute, you know, Sir William; it's the brute that Austria gave us—that thundering big deerhound that our youngest daughter is so spoonsy on; the dog that sent the Duchess of Sutherland into fits. It was in her bed at Osborne, by Jove! and she hollored like little Red Riding-Hood."

"I know the animal—a superb specimen of its lordly breed. "Did you irritate the dog in any way, sir?" asked Sir William, turning to me.

"Not in the slightest degree."

"And you say that it was quite docile with the princess?"

"Like a lamb. She laid on to him with a riding-whip, and then with the branch of an oak-tree, till every second I expected to see him spring at her throat. She's a very courageous young lady."

"She's one of the royal family of England, sir!" observed the Honorable Mr. Lindsay, in a tone of mingled satisfaction and hauteur.

After a very delightful ten minutes with Doctor Jenner, I mentioned to the groom-in-waiting the commands of the princess.

"I shouldn't wonder but the Queen will want to see you. This is just the sort of thing that suits her. A rescue of any kind is just up to the royal mark."

"But I didn't rescue anybody."

"That doesn't signify; the princess will say you did. If you were a woman, ten to one but you'd get an Indian shawl—we have a lot of Indian shawls on hand. Begad! I'll take the odds you'll get a diamond ring. That will suit you to a T. You fellows at the other side are so awfully spoony on diamonds, you know."

The subdued light, the gorgeous hangings, the noble pictures, the superb statuary, the glowing flowers, the sensuous perfumes, the glittering uniforms, seemed to affect me as though I had quaffed nectar, and until every sense felt a throb of intoxication. Now we encountered a Life Guardman in silver cuirass and boots to his hips; now a personage in blue-and-gold; now a gentleman in what is technically termed frock-dress, in other words, evening-dress, with knee-breeches and silk stockings; now a bullion hearted hussar; now a major-general, such as Messrs. Sullivan and Gilbert have given us in the "Pirates of Penzance"; now a swell in the dark-green of the rifle brigade. Servants in scarlet and gold and powder, everywhere, silent, as noiseless as ghosts.

"Here we are!" exclaimed Mr. Lindsay as we entered a palatial apartment, all gilding and flowers, and faience and bric-à-brac, giving upon the private gardens. "If the old lady should desire to see you, you must bow very low on entering the presence, bow again when you get near to her. You must not speak until spoken to, and let your replies be perfectly natural, for we hate affectation. You must back out of the presence, bowing as often as you like."

As the groom-in-waiting thus kindly instructed me, a door, the panels of which bore the handiwork of Watteau, suddenly opened, and two gentlemen in plain walking attire backed out.

"Look at those fellows," half-whispered the genial Mr. Lindsay. "One of them, the bearded one, is Lord Salisbury, the other is Beaconsfield."

Lord Beaconsfield, on whom I riveted my whole attention, was very stooped, very yellow, and looked very old. He passed quite close to me without looking to the right or left, hobbled rather, for he had to take Lord Salisbury's arm ere he reached the door. The Secretary for Foreign Affairs bowed haughtily to Mr. Lindsay.

"They've been having a wigging, and——"

The Princess Beatrice appeared in the doorway.

"What does Dr. Jenner say?" she anxiously inquired, as she advanced rapidly toward where we stood.

"That I am neither frightened nor hurt, your Royal Highness," I replied, repeating Sir William's words.

"I will answer for one; the doctor for the other; and now, Mr. Whipple, my mother wishes to see you." This so naturally, and as if she was the daughter of a merchant or farmer, alluding to the desire of a farmer's or merchant's wife.

"One moment, please, until I announce you."

I freely confess that my heart beat violently, and that I felt excited and nervous. In vain I called my republican sentiments together: they seemed dazed and scattered, they refused point-blank to come to the rescue.

"Don't be frightened," observed Mr. Lindsay, "Her Majesty won't eat you. Ah! here comes Elphinstone, he's lord-in-waiting: follow him, and bow as low as ever you like."

I heard my name announced as I entered an apartment of which I observed nothing, save that it possessed a bower-window, a full-length portrait of Prince Albert in uniform, a bust of the prince in marble, against which leaned an enormous bouquet, and a stout, elderly, red-faced, sullen-looking lady, attired in black, and wearing a Marie Stuart widow's cap of white crape.

Beside the Queen, who was seated, stood her youngest daughter.

"This is Mr. Whipple," said the princess.

The Queen gazed at me in a concentrated and not unkindly way, and in a voice startlingly musical said:

"My daughter has spoken to me of your coolness, courage, and chivalry. I regret equally with the princess that you should have been subjected to such rough and dangerous handling. The dog is one of the quietest animals we possess. He is an especial favorite with my grandchildren, who roll over him for whole hours together, just there," pointing to a knee-deep rug of some silken material spread opposite a gilt and tiled fireplace. "If it affords you the slightest satisfaction to have the animal destroyed, you have but to say so."

"Not for the world, your Majesty," I blurted. "I love dogs."

"I offered to have him shot!" exclaimed the princess.

"It is a stupid fancy," said the Queen, "and I am glad to find that this gentleman is above such superstition. You say, sir, that you are fond of dogs?"

"Intensely, your Majesty."

"What kind of dog do you like best?"

"I think I am fondest of Scotch terriers, your Majesty," I replied, my thoughts reverting to a bright little ratter at home, at Tarrytown.

"You shall have a Dandie Dinmont and a skye from my kennel at Balmoral. Lord Elphinstone," turning to the lord-in-waiting, who bowed like a mandarin, "make a note of this."

"And I'll give him a collie!" said Beatrice.

"A Scottish sheep-dog!" exclaimed the Queen. "I believe you have no collies in America?"

"I have seen but one, and that was at a dog show in New York, your Majesty."

"Lord Elphinstone, you will see to this. A Dandie Dinmont, a skye, one of glenfishie breed, and a collie. Trained. In further recognition of your generous and chivalrous conduct, for when you believed your own safety in jeopardy you urged my daughter to seek hers by flight, I present you with"—here the Queen approached a table and took up a small morocco case—"this ring, upon which we permit you to have inscribed the words, 'From the Queen,' with the date," handing me the case, in which a large diamond sparkled from its bed of gold and curtains of dark-blue satin.

I tried to speak, but my voice would not come. I know that I stammered something as I took the royal gift, that I grew very pale, and that a cold perspiration bedewed me from head to foot. I laugh at myself now, for this, but if the block awaited me in the Curfew Tower, I do believe I could not have pumped up a single rounded conventional sentence.

"A groom-in-waiting will take you through the castle, and also through Buckingham and St. James's Palaces. You will dine with the guard. The Lord Chamberlain will commend you to our late State Concert at Buckingham Palace. I have a thorough admiration of the American character, and I am glad to have met so worthy a representative of the race."

Her Majesty made a gracious inclination of her head, and my audience was over.

The princess courtesied deeply.

"You will call your collie Conrade, Mr. Whipple," she gayly observed, as she graciously extended her hand. I touched the tip of her fingers, bowed to the earth, and backed out.

"I thought you'd drop on a ring," laughed Mr. Lindsay, as he lounged up to me. "A jolly good stone, too, worth a cool two-fifty. Stay, the princess wants to speak to you."

The Princess Beatrice had followed me.

"One word, Mr. Whipple," and she led the way into a windowed recess.

We stood facing one another.

She looked full into my eyes.

I gazed down into the lowermost depths of hers.

She blushed till her very ears assumed the tint of the red, red rose.

"Mr. Whipple," she said, as she lowered her lashes, "I——"

* * * * * *

What the Princess Beatrice said may never be written, for I awoke.

Yes, I had been fast asleep beneath William the Conqueror's oak, and the setting sun was now gilding the tree-tops as with liquid fire.

Stiff, sore, cramped, I struggled to my feet. What of the Queen, the princess, the ring?

"Shadows, my lord."

* * * * *

The Earl of Tossington upon the following day sent me his card to the Blenheim, indorsed by the Lord Chamberlain. Armed with this "open sesame," I visited Windsor Castle, but I did not see Her Majesty, nor did mine eyes encounter Queen Victoria's youngest daughter. In fact, I have never seen either one or the other of these illustrious ladies.

AN ATLANTIC SKETCH.

BY LADY HARDY.

Late in the evening Donald Mackay, who had been uplifting his manly voice in some lovelorn bit of sentimentality, came on the deck for a last look round before retiring for the night. As he passed up the companion-way, he glanced into the little deck salon, which is generally sacred to the ladies. He almost started; he could scarcely believe his eyes; there sat Mr. Jaggers and the fair widow, Mrs. Sydney, amicably engaged in a game of chess, and evidently enjoying it, too. His grim, harsh features were lighted up with the ghost of a smile, as she said, playfully reproachful, with half-knit contemplative brows:

"Oh, how ungallant! You've castled my Queen; but I'll be even with you yet."

"That woman's a witch! Poor old Jaggers! A victim to female charms at his age, too!" chuckled the young fellow, as he stole away unobserved by either of them, and walked up and down the deck smoking and ruminating.

It was late when Donald Mackay retired to rest. He tossed uneasily upon his pillow; he could not sleep; he had an uncomfortable feeling; he fancied he had been defrauded of his confidence—shorn of his secret as effectually as Samson was shorn of his locks. Not only had he betrayed himself, but his friend also, into the hands of this modern Delilah; then he consoled himself, reflecting:

"After all, it did not matter much. What harm could a woman do, except talking? He smiled grimly as he remembered how often a woman's tongue had talked away a man's reputation, liberty, and even life itself. "Pooh!" he muttered, trying to reconcile himself to himself. "When we have done our errand, and are on our way back to England, she may talk as much as she likes; till then I think I can manage her."

It was now broad moonlight; he was hot and feverish; he thought he would get up and fetch a drink of iced water to cool his nerves. As he crossed amidships on the main-deck, he saw a light at the end of the corridor from the half-open door of Mr. Jaggers's cabin.

"Poor old beggar!" he muttered. "He's something like me—can't sleep. I'll rout him out to keep me company." He quickened his pace, then stopped suddenly. Some one came out and shut the door—it was not Jaggers, it was a woman! She was dressed in a dark peignoir. She came slowly along the corridor towards him; as she crossed the strip of moonlight, he recognized the face of Mrs. Sydney.

"Merciful God!" he exclaimed, under his breath, as he stepped noiselessly aside and watched, breathlessly, as she came near and passed within a few feet of where he stood. Her eyes were wide open as she stared straight ahead, seeing nothing, for, though her eyes were open, their sense was shut. She was walking in her sleep. He recognized that fact in a moment. He followed to see that she came to no harm. Having seen her safely to her cabin, he breathed freely and went to bed thoroughly tired out, and slept soundly till morning.

As he sat down to breakfast he looked round for Mrs. Sydney, but she was not there. He said nothing to any one of what he had seen during the night; there was no purpose to be served in mentioning it to any one, so he kept discreetly silent. He hurried through his breakfast and went on deck, but there were no signs of Mrs. Sydney. He lounged by the companion-way, glancing furtively down the stairs, resolved to be the first to greet her, but she failed to make her appearance. As the day wore on a rumor was in circulation that Mrs. Sydney was not well—she was not able to leave her cabin. The lady passengers charged themselves with the care of the child, while the stewardess looked after the patient, so far as she would allow her to do so; but Mrs. Sydney was irritable and impatient. She refused to see the doctor, there was nothing the matter, she said; she only wanted to be quiet—to be let alone; so she lay for the best part of the day with her face to the wall. Mr. Jaggers, with a haggard, watchful face, haunted the corridors; he said nothing, but his eyes followed the stewardess as she went into the cabin, and questioned her with mute inquiry as she came out of it.

That evening we sighted Farther Point, and sent up a rocket to summon a pilot from the shore. Three rockets—red, white, and blue—went up in answer. "Coming." In another moment a white light like a gigantic glow-worm came creeping along the face of the water, nearer and nearer, till the plish plashing of oars brought a cockle-shell of a boat alongside, and the pilot, with the agility of a cat, climbed up the huge black side of the vessel and leaped over the bulwarks on to the deck. We got up steam and were soon under way again. As we paced the deck, chatting or singing snatches of old songs, all more or less excited as we approached the end of our journey, we were startled by the appearance of a huge black mass, which seemed to grow mysteriously out of the darkness, with many-colored lights swinging in the empty air. It was the steam-tug which had come off from Rimouski for mails and such passengers as desired to go on shore and proceed direct to Lower Canada. There was a hurrying and bustling to-and-fro, the mail-bags were flung out from the lower deck, and about fifty steerage passengers and some few others went on shore.

The next morning a general consternation sat on the official faces. One after another they proceeded to the captain's room and held a mysterious conference together. People looked questioningly in each other's eyes and wondered. Presently a rumor circulated from one end of the vessel to the other: "Mrs. Sydney was missing!" On going to her stateroom in the morning, the stewardess found it empty. For a time all was confusion. Hurried inquiries were whispered from one to another. The most extravagant rumors and wonderment got about, but the general excitement gradually calmed down, and a strict investigation took place. Where had she been last seen, and by whom? Donald Mackay reluctantly stepped forward and told what he had seen on the night before. It was a horrible idea, but at least a tangible one. She might have walked overboard in her sleep! At least that was the conclusion generally arrived at.

This terrible catastrophe cast a gloom over everybody's spirits and allayed much of the excitement and pleasure they would otherwise have felt on nearing the land.

All day we steamed through the beautiful St. Lawrence River with a panoramic view of picturesque and glowing scenery outspread on either side. In the evening Quebec, in her regal beauty, with the fading sunlight flashing from her thousand windows and glittering on her shining roofs, was in sight. Then began the bustling preparation for leaving the vessel. Mr. Jaggers and Donald Mackay eagerly scanned the faces on the landing stage. A police officer came on board, followed by one or two subordinates. An order was given that no one was to leave the vessel till they had examined all the passengers. Jaggers took the chief official aside, and they conversed together in a low tone.

"You've got our man," said Jaggers. "He should have arrived two days ago. We wired a description and requested that he should be detained."

"Never came," replied the brother detective, adding, with a curious smile, "He's here on the vessel with you."

"That's not so. There's a mistake somewhere," said Jaggers, grimly. "Do you think I'd have a rat under my nose and not smell him? I know every man on board."

"And every woman, too?" said the officer, with a significance that made Jaggers shiver. "Here, read that," he added, placing in his nervous hand a telegram received a few days before which ran thus: "James Howard did not sail as advised. You will find him in steamship Sardinian, disguised as a widow, accompanied by a young child. Arrest him."

Jaggers staggered as though he had been shot. His professional pride fell dead within him. He dashed down the stairs, and in a few minutes reappeared in ill-concealed agitation. His pocketbook, with photographs, identification papers, etc., had been stolen. Was this the widow's errand to his room the night before? Was the sleep-walking business a sham? Had she or he walked overboard or not? Their doubts and wonders were soon set at rest. The dress the soi-disant widow used to wear was found concealed beneath her berth. The disappearance which had been involved in so much perplexity was now clearly understood. James Howard, a beardless young fellow, the youngest of a burglarious gang who had given much trouble to the London police, had escaped, in the guise of a widow, with all the plunder. He had evidently thrown off the fascinating golden "coquette" which had lent so effectual a disguise and so demure a charm to the widow's suit, and, donning his own attire, had mixed unobserved with the steerage passengers and gone off at Rimouski. Jaggers, in sore humiliation of spirit, hid his head for a while, covered with professional shame. His prey had flaunted and flirted before his very eyes, and, though he had "castled the queen," he had never been so effectually "checkmated."

Thenceforth the sight of a widow acted upon him as the red rag is supposed to act on a mad bull. His chief object in life was to run them down. So, with a sensational scene, our pleasant voyage in the good ship Sardinian ended.

A Belgian Festival.

THE Belgian Government has granted a sum of 100,000 francs for the great fête which will be given at Antwerp this fall. The Town Council gives a like sum. The King and Queen have promised to attend, arriving by the Scheldt, and a number of ships will go to meet their majesties at Boom. The programme will exceed the splendid Rubens fête and will comprise a Venetian festival on the river, the inauguration of new docks, the unveiling of the statue of Quentin Matsys, of the colossal monument commemorating the freeing of the Scheldt and the mural paintings at the Bourse, cantatas, races, rifle shooting, illuminations, etc.

Cheese-making in Canada.

CHEESE-MAKING under the factory system has become the practice in Canada. Farmers within a certain radius send their milk to central establishments, where the manufacture is carried on wholesale. Only a few years ago they discovered that there was a great advantage in the way of economizing labor and manufacturing expenses to be gained by clubbing together. No longer back than 1874 the quantity thus turned out began to exceed twenty million pounds in the year, since which time the amount has been almost doubled. Factories are now in operation in nearly every section of the province of Ontario or Upper Canada.

THE "TERRAPIN POLICY" IN FINANCE.

THE Supreme Court of the United States has rendered an adverse decision in the matter of the application to give preference and precedence on the calendar to the legal-tender test case, technically known as the case of Juillard vs. Greenman, in which the constitutionality of the re-issue of the United States notes, after their reception in the Treasury for redemption, is placed formally at issue, on the ground that nothing less than a full bench should sit in judgment on the decision of constitutional questions, and such a full bench cannot be had in the present protracted disability of Mr. Justice Hunt. We have before expressed the opinion that the question at issue, being one of legislative discretion and of financial policy rather than one of more or less doubtful constitutionality, is a question which should be disposed of by the legislative, rather than the judicial, branch of the Government. It was only in reluctant obedience to what seemed indispensable considerations of public necessity that the administrative branch of the Government devised, and the legislative branch of the Government adopted, the policy of legal-tender paper money in the year 1862. It was only after much hesitation and after painful, because unseemly, vicissitudes of opinion, that the judicial branch of the Government gave its sanction to so much of this policy as recognized the right of the Government to issue such notes under the pressure of military necessity, and even this dubious decision was not reached without transparent implications against the legality of such issues in the absence of a necessity overriding the normal law of peace and order under the Constitution.

That such a lean and starveling question as this should be remitted to the umpirage of the highest judicial tribunal in the land, when every consideration of plighted legislative honor and of public duty calls for its solution by the "assembled wisdom" of our legislators in Washington, is not an encouraging sign to the patriot who wishes to retain his confidence in the intelligence and courage of the nation's chosen representatives. It is known that the Republican leaders have been most forward in pressing for such a judicial determination, because of the hope they cherish that the decision would be adverse to the constitutionality of the law directing the re-issue of legal-tender notes, and, under the covering of shields afforded by the court, they had hoped to advance and take the position of the Greenbackers and paper-money Democrats as by a coup de main.

Meanwhile it is only a Gideon's band of hard-money Democrats and of hard-money Republicans, under the lead of Senator Bayard, who seem to have the courage of their opinions. And yet it is certain that the mastery of the future is in the hands of these intrepid and enlightened legislators. Professor Von Holst, in his brilliant book on the "Constitutional and Political History of the United States," adventures the remark that the seven thousand votes cast for Birney in the "Log-Cabin Campaign" of 1840 were "weightier" in the scales of philosophical history than all the ballots cast for Harrison and Van Buren put together. The observation smacks rather of rhetorical antithesis than of historical sobriety; but it cannot be doubted that there is a grain of truth in this critical appreciation of the relative weight of the votes cast in that exciting and hysterical canvass. The future of that date was with the "Liberty Party," for the Liberty Party of 1840 were the forerunners of the Republican Party, who, in the fullness of time, destroyed slavery and took possession of the Government, while the Whig Party died of inanition, and the Democratic Party was called in 1860 to suffer under a stroke of paralysis, from which it has not yet sufficiently recovered to find the hard-money ideas that were imbedded in its brain before the war.

The New York Times truly remarked, a few days ago, that "the future" of the Republican Party depends more upon the financial policy it is now required to formulate and enforce than "upon the cunning of managers and the ambition of individuals" in seeking to get the weather-gage of the Democrats on the currency issue. The Democratic managers who engineered the proceedings of the late extra-session of Congress could teach their political rivals a profitable lesson on the practical utility of "manufactured issues," however ingeniously devised, for the purpose of carrying an election. Such schemes of "mice and men" fall an easy prey before the plowshare of destiny.

The weights of the future as well as of the past must be constantly placed by the true statesman in the balances of public discussion. It is for this reason that statesmanship rises to the dignity of a liberal profession in the highest of all arts—the art of government. It is a sign of political dry-rot in the fabric of the state when our legislators have neither strength nor courage enough to grapple with the most exigent issues of the time, but seek to shuffle them out of sight.

Under representative institutions the people are called to give formal expression to their will and wishes only on election days. After the election it is the representative chosen by the people who is charged with the execution of the people's will, and it is too much the habit of our countrymen to suppose that they have discharged the full measure of their political duty when they have deposited their votes in the ballot-box. In fact, the constant pressure of an enlightened public opinion should be brought to bear on our legislators at Washington, lest the public apathy should seem to lend countenance to the timidity and cowardice of our rulers. Spasms of political activity on election days, followed by months of political lethargy after the election is over, are sad indications of that decline in public virtue which is the sure precursor of the ruin of states.

Mr. Jefferson exposed himself to merited ridicule by that system of "gunboats" with which he sought to evade the necessity of creating a navy commensurate with our rank and dignity as a nation. This weak expedient was signalized in the political persiflage of that day as the "terrapin policy" of his administration. In like manner we have our political leaders in both parties who are anxious to evade to-day the necessity of making a clear-cut record on the question of the currency. They would fain postpone the further discussion of the topic until the next Presidential election is over; and now that it is certain that the resolution of Mr. Bayard will be reported to the Senate for debate on a majority report against it and a minority report in favor of it, there is a rumor that the obstructives of both parties will combine to lay it on the table, in order to smother discussion. This would be to import the "terrapin policy" into matters of finance.

IRELAND AND MR. PARNELL.

THAT the people of Ireland are in sore distress cannot be doubted; that they are in need of immediate and liberal aid cannot be disputed; that the hearts and hands of our own citizens should be generously opened in their behalf every philanthropist must admit. There should be such an outpouring of material aid from the United States as would make the hearts of Irish sufferers thrice glad by its very abundance. The Irish, as a race, are as warm-hearted and generous as they are patient under suffering and brave in the hour of danger. It stands to the credit of such of them as have made their homes in the United States, that within the past twenty years they have remitted to Ireland $65,000,000 to assist impoverished relatives, or to enable them to emigrate to these friendly shores. They have ever been stanch friends of this country, and thousands of them have given their richest treasure of life and blood in attestation of their love and devotion to the American Union. For these, and other reasons, Ireland should be generously remembered in this the hour of her calamity.

But, while bespeaking the largest degree of liberality in favor of Ireland, we cannot close our eyes to the fact that the cause of charity will not be promoted by Mr. Parnell's plans, as developed through his public harangues to the American public. It is greatly to be regretted that that gentleman, in the conduct of his mission, has deemed it necessary to blend politics with philanthropy, and to exalt demagogism at the expense of suffering humanity. Americans would belie their whole character did they fail to sympathize with the people of the "ever-green isle" in their distress, their hunger, and resistance to injustice, whether practiced by Government or over-exacting landlords. But Mr. Parnell has erred in injecting into his scheme for Irish relief certain political matters for which he seeks indorsement on this side of the Atlantic. Thousands of our most intelligent citizens will keep aloof from Mr. Parnell because of the double-headed character of his mission. These people, unlike the party demagogues who play the part of satellites to the Irish agitator, have no axes to grind. They would like to serve a distressed people for humanity's sake, but they will do nothing which has the semblance of taking sides as to the policy which should be exercised by the British Government in dealing with Ireland as part and parcel of the United Kingdom. They do not care to denounce the Government of a country most closely allied to the United States, nor are they prepared to believe that the measures proposed by Mr. Parnell and his coadjutors are the wisest and best for the present or future welfare of Ireland. They do not, in fact, either by word or deed, desire to express any opinion on the subject, and rather than have any charitable action of theirs misinterpreted, will refrain from making any sort of contribution through Mr. Parnell, or the political association which he represents.

In his public utterances Mr. Parnell has plainly given us to understand that no peace can come to Ireland until those who are now tenants own the land they till; that the present struggle is one between the landlord and tenant as to which shall be forced from the country; that it will require $250,000,000 to buy out the landlord interest; and, finally, that if this purchase cannot be made, the present owners, as he hinted at Philadelphia, will be dispossessed through revolutionary processes. The organizers of Fenian raids and "Skirmishing Funds" may applaud the highwayman's method of obtaining property, but Mr. Parnell will find that the sober-minded, deep-thinking people of this country, after an expensive experience of their own, will not give countenance to schemes calculated to embroil a country in civil war.

We give place to none in expressions of goodwill towards the tenantry of Ireland. We would gladly see each and all of them the owners of a certain amount of acreage in fee-simple, but there is only one honest way to obtain title, and that by purchase. The scheme advocated by Mr. Parnell can never make them owners of the soil. Any hope of a contrary character will prove as delusive as did the liberating scheme of O'Connell, or the Irish governmental scheme which flourished for a brief season in Union Square. It is not to be expected that the landowners of Ireland, any more than those of the United States, will part with their property otherwise than by just compensation. To suppose that there is either philanthropy or generosity enough in the world to raise and contribute $250,000,000 to enable the Irish tenantry to get hold of the fee-simple of the lands they occupy requires a stretch of fancy of which we are not capable. It is an idea which none but an impracticable dreamer could indulge. So far, then, as Mr. Parnell's mission embraces this visionary scheme, it is a dead failure from its very inception. The Irish land question, as we view it, cannot be adjusted either by purchase or violence. On the one hand, there is no possible way open to the tenantry to acquire the enormous sum at which the lands are valued; and, on the other hand, there is no hope to make a forcible seizure secure against the Government of an Empire numbering some two hundred and fifty millions of people. If our own South, with its twelve millions of people, could not successfully resist the Government of the United States, there can be but little hope for a successful revolution by the five or six millions constituting Ireland's population. No, the Irish land problem is not to be solved on sentiment or by the sword, but only on the strict principles of political economy

That the present agitation is doing no good to Ireland, either at home or abroad, is plain to be seen. Mr. King Harman, an Irish landlord, full of sympathy for his people, recently said through the medium of the London Times: "I could show you easily that the present mad, and, in general, selfish and self-seeking agitation of those who are stumping the country has tended to aggravate the difficulty by frightening or estranging those who would or should have stood by the suffering poor. These things may be logic and fact, but the greater and worse fact remains that our people are on the verge of starvation." This declaration comes from a man now employing four hundred men in relief works, and engaged in preparation to give work to several hundreds more. Furthermore, Mr. Harman earnestly calls upon the British Government to give the people employment in the making of roads, and improvement of small harbors on the west coast, and bluntly says that the suffering people of Ireland would rather work and earn even small wages than be the recipients of unworked-for charity. When we compare the course of this landlord with that of Mr. Parnell, also a landlord, the comparison is not flattering to the latter.

It has not been our purpose to speak unkindly of Mr. Parnell, but we could wish, for Ireland's sake, that he had not brought his politics to this country. It would, at least, have been to the advantage of the people he professes to represent—the people who, as Mr. Harman says, for the past three years have suffered by loss of crops and by depreciation in stock, and are now on the verge of starvation. There are channels through which the benevolent may make their gifts effective in banishing hunger from Irish households, and all who do not admire the methods or approve the political plans of Mr. Parnell may make use of them. We have only to add by way of conclusion the single word—Give.

EVENTS ABROAD.

THE Empress Eugénie will embark at Southampton in the Union Company's steamer Danube, on March 20th, for the purpose of visiting and placing wreaths, etc., on the spot where the Prince Imperial was killed. The cabin occupied by the Prince will be placed at the disposal of the Empress, together with its original fittings. The horses and carriages used by the Prince will also be placed at her service. The Empress will visit the places where the Prince resided in Natal, and subsequently, with her suite, will travel by the route taken by the Prince in ox-wagons specially fitted for their accommodation. Her Imperial Highness will not debark at Cape Town, but will go direct to Natal, where she will be received privately.

An abstract of the gross revenue of the kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland for the past year, as compared with 1878, has been issued. The gross receipts are greater this year by the sum of £2,182,978. The property and income-tax shows an increase of £3,454,000; the stamps come next, with an increase of £367,000; and the other items of increment are the Post-Office, £139,000; interest on advances, £80,000; and the telegraph service, £45,000. On the other hand, there was a decrease of £1,095,000 in the excise, £415,000 in the customs, £11,000 in land-tax and house duty, a similar sum in Crown lands, and nearly £370,000 under the head of miscellaneous.

The Pall Mall Gazette concurs with the chief organs of public opinion in thinking the British revenue returns most unsatisfactory. It anticipates that the receipts for the entire year will fall £550,000 short of Sir Stafford Northcote's estimate. It thinks that the gross deficits of three years will amount to £7,500,000, or, with the Indian loan, to £9,500,000. The Gazette is of opinion that Sir Stafford Northcote is preparing a surprise for the public, and that by dint of cutting down expenses in every direction he will be able to present a far more favorable Budget than most people look for.

In emulation of the remarkable success of the Portuguese African Expedition, conducted by Major de Serpa Pinto, the Royal Geographical Society of Spain are sending out an expedition under the auspices of Commander Abargues de Sosten. This gentleman, who is now in Alexandria, on the arrival of his personnel, with the necessary scientific instruments, etc., intends, if the Egyptians and the Abyssinians have buried the hatchet, in a few weeks to start for Massowah and proceed at once to Adowah. Under favorable circumstances the Commander Abargues de Sosten expects to be absent twelve months, and if not interfered with by hostile tribes or accidents, a very interesting and instructive mission will be carried out.

for which the Greek Minister of Finance is indebted, we doubt not, to the genius of the English Chancellor of the Exchequer. It is a significant and notable fact that the falling off in the revenue of Greece is ascribable solely to the non-settlement of the Turco-Greek frontier question. The Hellenic Government have been compelled, in consequence of the warlike demonstrations of the Porte, to keep under arms a large force along their frontier. The Greeks openly complain, and naturally, that they have been put to this expense by the dilatory action of the Turkish Government, conduct in which it has been encouraged by the policy of the Powers.

Bishop Rieards, of Port Elizabeth, South Africa, is now actively engaged in pushing forward a scheme of his own for the civilization of 200,000 Caffres inhabiting his diocese. The project is medieval but practical. The Bishop intends to found two Trappist abbeys, one in the colony between Grahamstown and Port Elizabeth, the other upon the frontier amongst the Tambookie Caffres. An estate of 700,000 acres has been purchased for the site, and a tract of land on the frontier has been granted by the Colonial Government. The Tambookie Caffres are already disposed to agriculture, and the existence of model farms in their midst will be a healthy encouragement. The project will naturally be aided by the Cape merchants in London, and elsewhere, seeing that their own interests are so largely mixed up with the pacification of the frontier. In these days, when monastic institutions are considered out of date, it will be strange if a band of Trappists is the first efficacious civilizer of the Caffre.

The Japanese are pushing their way forward steadfastly and persistently in the road of civilization. Their latest move is to send a commissioner to England to study its police system, the modes for the suppression of crime, and the general arrangements for the detection of criminals. They have already a pretty fair idea of how the Western nations deal with culprits when they are caught, for scores of Japanese students have passed with credit the examination in the Temple. It is suggestive of the growing importance of Japan that Russia has subsidized a large number of missionaries of the Greek Church to take up their posts in the country.

The increased attention which Russia is devoting to Japanese affairs is shown by the elevation of her representative at Tokio from the rank of Minister Resident to that of Envoy Extraordinary, his salary at the same time being raised to 30,000 roubles, or not far short of $15,000.

A TRIBUTE OF RESPECT

TO THE MEMORY OF FRANK LESLIE, BY THE EMPLOYES AND FORMER EMPLOYES OF HIS PUBLISHING HOUSE.

As soon as practicable after the death of the eminent publisher, FRANK LESLIE, a meeting of the Editorial and Art staffs, and representatives of the various departments of Frank Leslie's Publishing House, was called to take suitable action in regard to the event. A large number of former members of the Art staff were also present in response to the following invitation issued by Mr. Joseph Becker, Superintendent of the Art Department: "All artists who have been employed by the late FRANK LESLIE, are requested to attend a meeting in the Art-room of the establishment, Nos. 53, 55, 57 Park Place, on Monday afternoon, January 12th, at 3 o'clock, for the purpose of making arrangement to attend the funeral on Tuesday, 13th inst."

The meeting was held in the Art Rooms of the establishment, at Nos. 53, 55 and 57 Park Place, on the afternoon of Monday, January 12th, 1880, and was called to order at 3 o'clock by Mr. B. G. Smith, who briefly explained the objects of the assemblage.

Among those present were John G. Shea, LL.D., Mr. David B. Gulick, Mr. B. G. Smith, Mr. Thomas Powell, Mr. N. Robinson, Mr. George J. Hagar, Mr. Charles H. Webb, A. H. Guernsey, M.D., Mr. William Harding, H. M. Brandis, M.D., Mr. Charles McLachlan, Mr. D. E. Harvey and Mr. B. W. Tomlinson, of the Editorial Department; Mr. Joseph Becker, Mr. Albert Berghaus, Mr. James E. Taylor, Mr. Henry A. Ogden, Miss O. A. Davis, Mr. Walter E. Yeager, Mr. Frederick Opper, Mr. B. T. Thulstrup, Mr. Augustus Schimff, Mr. Walter Goater and Mr. W. Parker Bodfish, of the Art Department; Mr. Horace Baker, of the Engraving Department; Mr. John McCabe, of the Composing-room; Mr. Joseph L. Firm, of the Press-room; Mr. Michael Crane, of the Electrotype Foundry; Mr. G. W. Heller, of the Counting-room; Mr. L. S. Mont, of the Stock-room; and Messrs. Frank Schell, Thomas Hogan, John Hyde, C. E. H. Bonwill, L. H. Hopkins, Henry L. Stephens, John A. Wales, Robert Stewart, George F. Smith, George Le B. Hartt, Clarence Grey Parker, Philip G. Cusachs, A. Zenope, Fernando Miranda, Charles Edmunds, Stephen Berlett, Charles Kendrick, George R. Halm, Arthur Hayman, John Swinton and Frederick S. Cozzens, of the former employés of the establishment.

The meeting was organized by the election of John G. Shea, LL.D., as chairman, and Mr. B. W. Tomlinson, as secretary.

On motion of Mr. Hagar, a committee was appointed to draw up a series of resolutions expressing the sentiments of the meeting. The members of the committee were appointed by the chair as follows:

Mr. N. Robinson, representing the Editorial Department; Messrs. Alfred Berghaus and Joseph Becker and Miss O. A. Davis, representing the Art Department; Mr. Horace Baker, representing the Engraving Department; Mr. John McCabe, representing the Composing-room; Mr. Joseph L. Firm, representing the Press-room; Mr. Michael Crane, representing the Electrotype Foundry; Mr. George W. Heller, representing the Counting-room; Mr. L. S. Mont, representing the Stock-room, and Messrs. C. E. H. Bonwill and Fernando Miranda, representing former employés.

The committee having retired for consultation, the arrangements for the funeral were stated by Mr. Hagar, and it was resolved that the employés and ex-employés should attend the obsequies in a body, wearing the customary badge of mourning on the left arm.

Mr. Albert Berghaus related some affecting incidents of the brief illness which preceded the death of Mr. LESLIE, whom he inquired affectionately as to the welfare of several old friends and associates in his professional career, and spoke in the kindliest manner of all.

Mr. David B. Gulick followed, narrating an incident which occurred on the previous Tuesday night, when Mr. LESLIE had seemed to have clearly foreseen for the first time that his end was approaching. He had clasped the speaker's hand, and, speaking in his old, familiar and friendly way, had said: "My boy, my work is done." The speaker had responded: "Do you really think and feel so?" And the dying man had said, wearily, "Yes, oh, yes, it's done; it's done, it's done." And, after a moment's silence he had added, calmly and thoughtfully; "I've no regrets; if all men had done to me as I have done to all men this might not have occurred, and my only regret is for my poor, dear darling." To the last, the speaker said, Mr. LESLIE was bright, cheerful and affectionate, and his intellect remained as bright as the noonday sun. As late as the preceding Saturday morning he had issued instructions for the conduct of his business with his usual clearness and ability, and on that same morning the gentlemen in the office had received the gratifying intelligence that the crisis of his illness had passed, and that in a few weeks he might be expected to resume his position at the head of his establishment, with health fully restored and even improved by the ordeal through which he had passed. On that same day his devoted wife had intermitted her watch by the sick-bed to come to the office and attend to some duties there, but at a few minutes before noon there had come an urgent message which told of a sudden and alarming change and which quickly recalled her to his side. Then the friends who had gathered around him saw that the last hours had come, and at a few minutes before six o'clock Mr. LESLIE breathed his last, expiring so peacefully and painlessly that it had been almost impossible to tell the precise moment when his spirit had taken flight and his eventful life had ended.

Other brief tributes of respect were paid to the memory of the deceased, and then, the committee on resolutions having returned, the following preamble and resolutions were reported by Mr. Robinson:

Whereas, the untimely hand of death has removed from among us our dearly loved and respected employer, FRANK LESLIE, and

Whereas, in tribute to his sterling worth and never varying kindliness, this meeting of his afflicted employés and ex-employés has been called together: therefore be it

Resolved, That we hereby express our unfeigned and heartfelt distress at the irreparable loss we have sustained through the demise of Mr. FRANK LESLIE, a generous employer, a gifted counselor, a stanch friend and a courteous gentleman; of one who was endeared to us by so many associations, and by so many links of human sympathy.

Resolved, That we hereby tender our most cordial sympathy to his afflicted and sorrowing widow, with the hope that this earnest expression of regard on the part of so many who loved him so truly and loved him so long will at least tend to console her under her heavy tribulation.

These resolutions were unanimously adopted, and, on motion of Mr. Hagar, were ordered to be duly engrossed and framed, and presented to Mrs. Leslie.

On motion of Mr. Gulick, it was further resolved that the resolutions be furnished for publication to the newspapers of the city.

On motion of Mr. Robinson, Mr. Joseph Becker was called to the chair, and the thanks of the meeting were presented to Dr. Shea, the chairman, for the able, courteous and dignified manner in which he had conducted the business of the occasion.

The meeting was then adjourned.

JOHN G. SHEA, LL.D., Chairman.
B. W. TOMLINSON, Secretary.

THE LAST RITES.

The funeral of FRANK LESLIE took place on the morning of Tuesday, January 13th. The day was one of the wildest and most inclement of the present Winter, a furious storm of snow and sleet prevailing throughout the morning. Despite the terrible weather, however, the employés of the publishing house, in the number of nearly three hundred, assembled in Reservoir Square, at Sixth Avenue and Forty-second Street, with mourning badges, and proceeded in a body to the late residence of the deceased, No. 511 Fifth Avenue, and afterwards to the Church of the Divine Paternity, at the corner of Fifth Avenue and Forty-fifth Street, the central pews in the church being set apart for their occupation.

It had been intended that the remains should be carried by the pall-bearers from the residence to the church at the head of the procession of employés, but the stress of weather compelled a change in this part of the arrangements, and the coffin was taken from the house to a hearse in waiting and thus conveyed to the church. In leaving the residence and entering the church the coffin was preceded by the following pall-bearers: Ex-Governor Alexander H. Rice, of Massachusetts; Sinclair Tousey, President of the American News Company; ex-Judge John McKeon; ex-Judge John Fitch; General C. K. Graham; R. L. Kimball, Esq.; Erastus Brooks, Isaac W. England, Esq., publisher of the Sun; Mr. Henry F. Gillig, of the American Exchange, London; and Whitelaw Reid, Esq., editor of the New York Tribune. The coffin was borne into the church by Messrs. David B. Gulick, Albert Berghaus, B. G. Smith, George Ladd, John McCabe, and Michael Crane.

The chief mourners, from the immediate family of the deceased, were already seated in the church. They were the widow of the deceased, and his brother William, his two surviving sons Henry and Alfred H. Leslie, and Mrs. Alfred H. Leslie and her two children. There was also a large number of distinguished gentlemen present.

As the remains were borne up the centre aisle and deposited in front of the chancel, all in the church arose, and the choir sang the hymn, "Nearer, my God, to Thee," the soprano part being sung by Miss Laura Joyce. The services were then opened by the reading of certain well-chosen passages of the Scriptures by the Rev. Dr. E. H. Chapin, beginning with the Psalm, "The Lord is my Shepherd, I shall not want." Mrs. Florence Bliss-Knox sang Mendelssohn's "Rest in the Lord," after which Dr. Chapin delivered a brief but very touching discourse, pointing to the principles and promises of the Christian faith as the surest consolation in time of grief. He spoke feelingly of Mr. LESLIE'S life and character, dwelling upon his benevolence, courtesy and kindness, both in public and private life, and the energy, perseverance and ability with which he had built up a business in which he was the pioneer, and which had for its mission the dissemination of literature and the popularization of art. His merits, he said, were best known by those that were nearest to him, and those who had known him the longest and the most intimately were the ones who loved him best. The present separation from him could not but bring pangs of the profoundest grief, but those who now wept for him mourned not as those without hope, for the coming of Christ had presented the whole subject of death in a newer and truer aspect than it had ever been known before His advent. We would not mourn for departed friends if we were assured that after a brief time they would return to us, and this is, in effect, the consolation that is assured to us by Christian teachings. It is true that the loved ones who have gone before will not return to us, but we may go to them, and what does it matter after a separation of friends whether the reunion be in this place or another, so that they be reunited? The confident knowledge that they will be reunited is the thought that is sufficient to assuage the grief of separation, and this it is that, under the loving dispensation of Christ, has removed the sting from death and robbed the grave of victory.

At the conclusion of the discourse the choir sang "Jesus, Lover of my Soul," after which an opportunity was given for all in the church to take a last view of the remains, the vast congregation passing up the north aisle, defiling past the coffin and leaving the church by the south aisle.

The body was attired in plain evening-dress, the features wearing a peaceful, natural expression, and the hands, which were folded across the breast, clasping long branches of palm laid there by the hand of his wife. The casket was covered with black broadcloth with silver handles, and on the inside of the upturned, satin-quilted lid was a large silver plate bearing the simple inscription

FRANK LESLIE.

After all present had passed before the casket it was again closed and borne from the church to the hearse by Messrs. Joseph L. Firm, George W. Heller, W. P. Hadwin, H. L. Bridgeman, Horace Baker and George J. Hagar.

The funeral procession then re-formed and proceeded to the Grand Central Depot, where a special train of four cars was in waiting to convey the remains and the mourners to Woodlawn Cemetery. There the impressive burial service of the Protestant Episcopal Church was read by the Rev. Edward M. Brems, and the body was committed to a grave in the Leslie family lot, in East Border Avenue, opposite its intersection with Central Avenue.

THE WILL OF THE LATE FRANK LESLIE.

In the last will and testament of the late FRANK LESLIE, which was offered for probate on January 15th, occurs the following:

I do give and bequeath unto my dearly beloved wife, Miriam Florence Leslie, whose maiden name was Miriam Florence Follin, all the property, real or personal, legal and equitable, of which I may die seized or possessed; and I do particularly bequeath to her the trade-mark or name under which I have published newspapers and periodicals, and all my interest in the publications established by me and known by my name, and in the property connected therewith, which property I heretofore assigned to Isaac W. England for the benefit of my creditors, and which is now held by the said England, subject to a certain agreement between my creditors and myself, made October 4th, 1877, whereby the said property was to be held by Trustees and to revert to me at the expiration of three years from the 1st day of January, 1878, or sooner if the profits of the business should sooner pay the debts for the security of which the said property was assigned. * * * * And it is my will that my said wife shall take my place in the said agreements with the creditors, and perform the same on my part; and, after the expiration and performance of said agreement with my creditors shall continue the business of publishing, under the name and trade-mark of Frank Leslie, the various publications which have been established by me, and in the establishment of which she has contributed largely, and shall have the power and right to deal with and dispose of the same for her own use and benefit, free and clear of all claims of any other person whatever.

THE sum of $92,656,943 has been accumulated in the sinking fund since the present administration came into power.

IN spite of the agitation of trade organizations there is a growing belief that our large and expensive penal institutions should be rendered as nearly as possible self-supporting. An argument in favor of this belief, commonly used, is that it is not just to tax the people to maintain convicts in idleness. This is met with the objection of the tradesmen that it is not just that the more cheaply produced work of the convict should be allowed to enter into competition with that of the honest, law-abiding citizen who has to support himself without any State aid. The question of employing or utilizing the convict labor in State Prisons has entered largely into the politics of the day, and from the way it is treated it is evidently regarded as a very unpleasant subject to handle. Still the effort to use this "pent up energy" is gaining ground in many of the States. It is well-known that the prison at Sing Sing, N. Y., earns a handsome profit every year, the amount for the month of December last alone being over $3,000. Last year the Maryland Penitentiary earned nearly $20,000, and turned into the State Treasury $13,000, while the State Penitentiary of Missouri, for the same time, received $117,349 as the value of the whole labor of its inmates, and, after paying all expenses, turned into the Treasury a profit of $18,844. In the South the practice of hiring out convicts to work on railroads, works of public improvement, and even on farms, is quite general. In Georgia the law is so framed that a woman was allowed to hire her husband, sentenced to twenty years' imprisonment, for a small annual sum, and he is now legally working for her as if he had committed no crime. The latest attempt to make prisoners work and to apply the profits to their support is in the form of an application by the Secretary of War for permission to enable the Department to apply the proceeds of the labor of the prisoners confined in the Military Prison at Leavenworth, Kan., towards the support of the prison.

THE OYSTER WAR IN VIRGINIA.

LAST Summer we gave illustrations of the oyster business in Chesapeake Bay, with details of the operations of the owners of the oyster beds in that locality. The rights of the owners, however, seem to have been seriously interfered with by parties from Baltimore, consisting of roughs, dock-rats, and bad fellows generally, who, in fast-sailing boats, visit the Bay and drag for oysters on the private grounds of the Bay. The aid of the police has been invoked, but the marauders are on the constant watch for police boats, which they detect, however disguised they may be, and inasmuch as the boats are not remarkable for speed, the rascals manage to escape. Under these circumstances active operations have been commenced at Richmond, Virginia, against those piratical vessels. The land and naval forces of the State are to be called out to capture the vessels and put a stop to oyster-dredging by alien ships. This warlike course is indicated by the passage of a joint resolution in the House of Delegates, which states that in view of the depredations by marauding vessels in the waters on the Eastern Shore, and the outrages on the people along the banks of the Rappahannock River by the crews of such vessels, several of which have committed murders, the sum of $1,500 is appropriated to enforce the oyster laws in that section. Dr. Pitt, the delegate from Lancaster County, the citizens of which have been so outrageously victimized, said that there is now quite a fleet, numbering some thirty odd of these vessels, in the mouth of the Rappahannock River, violating the oyster laws of the State; that the local authorities are powerless to prevent them, and that two citizens of the county had been murdered by these non-resident pirates. It is proposed to fit out an armed expedition consisting of a vessel—steamer, if possible—to be manned by sixty men, armed with long-range rifles, and having on board a battery of rifled artillery. This vessel will be dispatched to the scene of the outrages with a view to blockade the marauding fleet in the river and arrest the crews. The militia forces of Lancaster and other counties along the Rappahannock River will be on hand to co-operate with the steamer, and it is confidently expected that the invaders will be captured and made prizes. Those who know the crews of the trespassing oyster vessels and the manner in which they are armed with the best long-range rifles, assert that there will be bloody work as soon as an attack is made upon them. Quite an excitement has been created in official circles by the warlike outlook.

OWNERS OF LONDON PALACES.

IT is curiously significant of the limited ownership of London that there are not more than four, if indeed so many, of the British dukes inhabiting houses in the metropolis which they own in fee simple. The Duke of Portland, the eccentric millionaire, who died last month, possessed a great metropolitan estate; yet Harcourt House, the vast, gloomy mansion in which he lived and died, belonged to Mr. Harcourt, M. P. for Oxfordshire, whose grandfather inherited it from his maternal uncle, Earl Harcourt. Even the far-famed Stafford House, the palace of the Duke of Sutherland, stands on land paying ground rent to the Crown, as does Montague House, the vast mansion of the Duke of Buccleuch. The Duke of Bedford, whose London rentals are about $500,000 a year, had a stately abode, the same to which the patriot Lord William Russell fondly turned when on his way to execution, in Bloomsbury. This, much to the regret of the present duke, was pulled down at the beginning of the century, but he now pays rent to his brother, the Duke of Westminster, as does the Duke of Richmond, whose grandfather's house occupied the site of what is now known as Richmond Terrace, near the House of Parliament. That Carabas of the West End, the Duke of Westminster, does occupy a house of his own, as did the Duke of Northumberland until Northumberland House, Charing Cross, was pulled down, but he, too, now pays rent to his brother Westminster, who, like the Browns, of Providence, buys but never sells. His own house stands in an excellent situation, but is architecturally entirely unworthy of his estate. The handsomest thing about it externally is a stone screen dividing it from the street, which was brought from Carlton House when that palace—now as completely effaced as though the prince regent had never existed—was dismantled.

FOX-HUNTING IN WINTER.

A STRANGE innovation has just been introduced into fox-hunting records in Fifeshire, Scotland. According to the Sporting Gazette, Colonel Anstruther-Thompson, finding that the Winter promised to be a long and a sharp one, made up his mind that neither frost nor snow should stop him from his favorite sport, and trained men and horses accordingly. A few days since the result was seen. With the thermometer at eight degrees below freezing-point, and the ground covered with snow, he and a number of his neighbors met, among them being one lady, their horses having previously had the soles of their feet covered with gutta-percha. For a while Balcorm Wood was drawn without success, but presently a fox rushed out and a sharp run followed. The scent in the snow proved amazingly good, and, despite all the circumstances which until now in fox-hunting have been regarded as disadvantageous, the going was of the very best. At length, however, the fox managed to escape, and as the sun was by this time at rest, it was too late for further sport that day. But the experiment Colonel Thompson has thus successfully made has created such an impression in Scotland that it is likely to be followed everywhere this season, so that the owners of hunters who trembled at the prospects of the early Winter may take heart, and, by the aid of gutta-percha soles and a little training, yet chase the fox over the snow-covered ground.

WONDERS OF VISIBLE SPEECH.

PROF. BUTTERFIELD gave a demonstration of visible speech, recently, in Boston. This consists of an arbitrary alphabet of between 100 and 200 characters, by which, it is claimed, the words in any language may be delineated, so that any one understanding the universal alphabet can read and pronounce them in such a manner that any one familiar with the dialect can perceive their meaning. For instance, Professor Butterfield sent a pupil out of the room, and a lady gave him a sentence in French, a clergyman one in Latin, and a missionary one in Hebrew. He wrote them in the universal language, and then the pupil was called in and read them all correctly. At a second trial, the pupil being sent out of the room, the sentence was given: "The boy stood on the burning deck," but, at the suggestion of a doubter, "deck" was changed to "mast," and Rev. Mr. Richardson, missionary from Turkey, gave a difficult passage from the Armenian language. These were written down, and when the pupil was recalled, she read the quotation correctly, with "mast" for "deck," and also the Armenian sentence. Finally, the pupil and the little daughter of Rev. Mr. Richardson were sent out of the room, and Mrs. Richardson gave the Arabic words of "Our Father who art in Heaven." This was written in the visible speech language; the pupil was called in and read it correctly, and the little girl translated it. The practical value of this visible speech or universal language, unless it be of too complex a character, must be apparent to those who have to learn or teach foreign languages. By this method, it is claimed, the correct pronunciation of any language can be learned in a very short time, and, besides that, the reader can correctly pronounce words which are almost impossible to acquire by the natural method, unless learned in infancy. Rev. Mr. Richardson, says Professor Butterfield, was the only man he ever met who could pronounce, for the first time, correctly a very difficult word that he gave him in the Arabic language. At first sight, this visible speech may seem to be a thing of trifling importance; but, it is claimed by its advocates, when it is fully comprehended it will be classed among the greatest discoveries and inventions of the present age.

THE STORY OF A KID GLOVE.

By J. ESTEN COOKE.

I HAVE a friend who had a curious adventure, which he related to me one day. He assured me that it was strictly true, and as it amused me it may amuse others. Here is the adventure:

At that time my friend, who is Frederick Bryan, Esquire, was twenty-five years old, and was called Fred. He professed to practice law in one of the Atlantic cities, but really practiced literature, and had written a work of fiction, called "Henry Bolingbroke," which had made him something of a small social lion in the friendly little city. The consequence was, that Mr. Bryant's doom as a lawyer was sealed. He became more and more absorbed in the life of a littérateur, and, what was worse, fancied himself a poet, and began to dream of beautiful fairies—of the female sex—who were to come and bless him, etc., etc.

One morning, when his literary afflatus had collapsed temporarily, as will happen to his class, he put on his hat and walked up-town, gazing around him, and surveying such young ladies as he encountered with idle interest. They pleased him in only a moderate degree; but one passed in a landau, seated by the side of an elderly lady in black silk, whose appearance was rather striking. She had a rosy face, and a quantity of auburn ringlets, which assumed a golden tint as the sun fell upon them; and when she disappeared, Mr. Bryan mustered sufficient interest and energy, to say aloud:

"Handsome! I wonder who she is?"

His morning stroll terminated at the house of a gentleman in the upper part of the city, where two young cousins of his own were at that time on a visit. They were "country girls," but very attractive country girls indeed, and Mr. Bryan could think of no better device to destroy an hour of his valuable time than to pass it in their society. He found them both in the drawing-room—Miss Elise (Alecz), literary, poetical, very plump and handsome, with rosy cheeks, and a sentimental expression; and Miss Fanny, a slender young creature, with very wicked eyes, a very pretty mouth, and an amount of vivacity which produced the impression that she had been charged by an electric machine, and would dart a spark at you if you approached her. Elise, who was writing a letter on her knees, smiled sadly and sweetly as Mr. Bryan came in, and Fanny made him an elaborate courtesy.

"How glad I am to see you, and to know that nothing has happened to you!" she said.

"Were you really uneasy about me, my dear cousin? Explain."

"I was afraid your valuable existence had been extinguished by some passing vehicle—you are so absent and dreamy. Think of the shock of reading in the papers—'Yesterday, one of our most popular and promising young lawyers——' for they are certain to call you promising, you know—it means almost anything!"

"I know what it means with you, my dear cousin Fanny," Mr. Bryan said, with a languid smile; "but I hope I won't be run over."

"You certainly will if you walk along in a reverie, composing your new poem. Have you found her?"

"Her? May I ask to whom you refer?"

"To Miss Moonlight—Miss Faery Queen—or any of the family."

Before Mr. Bryan, who was smoothing his hat in a smiling and thoughtful manner, could reply to this attack, an open carriage drew up before the door, and a portly gentleman of middle age, with the appearance of a bank president, came and bore off Miss Elise for a ride. Fanny had received the visitor with great politeness; but, as soon as he and Elise disappeared, her wicked tongue and laughter assailed them. The practical and sentimental Elise was going to marry Mr. Bankstock—that was his other name! What a world!

"It is not so bad a world, when it has faces as pretty as yours in it, Fanny."

Mr. Bryan never could resist the temptation when he was tête-à-tête with a girl—he liked to indulge in their affectionate speeches. It was natural to him, and he had found his match. Miss Fanny accepted his challenge, and grew very quiet and sweet. Her eyes were cast down, and when she did steal a glance now and then at Mr. Bryan, she quickly looked away. When they parted, the small hand of the young lady reciprocated his manly grasp with the least imaginable squeeze; she shot a last glance at him, and "he was gone."

"What a tongue! And what eyes!" was Mr. Bryan's smiling comment, as he went to the post-office. Here he found a long envelope handed to him, and, opening it, saw a kid glove, which he gazed at with some astonishment. What did it mean? But a letter accompanied it in the handwriting of a man, and Mr. Bryan ran his eye over it. It was as follows:

"The inclosed glove, with the note therein, was slipped into the hand of the writer yesterday evening, at the Lyceum, by an unknown but very comely damsel, with golden curls and it was not until he had left the building, that the billet-doux was discovered, which revealed the sad truth that he had been mistaken for another! Acknowledging the compliment implied, he makes haste to give the 'memento' its proper direction, and remains,

"Respectfully, J. B.

"To the author of 'Henry Bolingbroke.'"

Mr. Bryan scarcely read to the end, the words, "the inclosed glove, with the note therein," had electrified him. He opened the glove hastily, and found a narrow slip of paper, on which was written in pencil, in a delicate hand, the following words:

"The author of 'Henry Bolingbroke' will please keep this glove as a memento from a sister writer, who thanks him for many hours of pleasure. "M. C——."

Mr. Bryan sat down in his office and read this note for about the tenth time. If at that moment a client had called to propose a lawsuit, and pay him one thousand dollars as a retaining fee, Mr. Bryan would have been tempted to request him to call again. He was in a maze. Who were "J. B." and "M. C.," and what did it all mean? How had it happened that a note intended for him, Frederick Bryan, had been slipped into the hand of this politely satirical "J. B." who had been mistaken for another—to wit, himself? He was deprived that night of at least three hours of his natural rest, and when he woke in the morning thought it was all a dream. But, no; there, on his toilet-table, was the glove!

The whole affair was the mystery of mysteries, but that very morning he made a discovery which put him upon the track of the secret. He had a mercantile friend whom he visited frequently. He related the incident to this friend, and showed him the note of "J. B.," and his friend exclaimed, "I know that handwriting!" He went to his desk, examined a policy of insurance, and, coming back, said, triumphantly:

"I knew it. Jack Baltby wrote it, Secretary of the Mutual!"

Jack Baltby wrote it! The mystery was revealed so far, and, to his friend, Mr. Baltby, Secretary of the Mutual Insurance, Mr. Bryan hastened. A smile diffused itself over the face of Mr. Baltby on his appearance.

"Well, I thought you would be likely to drop in some time to-day," he said.

"Yes, yes; but tell me about it, Baltby! You are not playing me a trick?"

"On my honor, I am not, my dear fellow."

"Tell me about it."

Mr. Baltby laughed, but seemed to recognize the fact that his friend's curiosity was incurable.

"Well," he said, "I was at the Lyceum, you see, at the public meeting to present the service of plate to the ex-Governor. Just in front of me sat an elderly lady in black, and a younger one with auburn ringlets. Such hair! It rolled from under her hat and down her back, in a way—well, in a way—let me restrain myself—which took my breath away! Her blue eyes—let me depict them——"

"Go on, Baltby!"

"Well, I'll be more concise. You see I've read 'Henry Bolingbroke,' and was giving you a touch of your own style. The unknown, in short—so to speak (see 'Henry Bolingbroke' passim)—was a beauty. She turned her head once or twice. The ringlets brushed against her roses—pardon a married man for his enthusiasm!"

"Go on, Baltby!"

"I will proceed. They were evidently strangers, as I soon discovered. The elder lady turned round, and, seeing a respectable gentleman behind her—I refer to myself—asked the names of the speakers who addressed the meeting. Now, as everybody knows these high-toned orators who reside in our city, and pop up on every occasion, it necessarily ballanced that the ladies were strangers."

"Yes, they were strangers!" exclaimed Mr. Bryan. "They passed me in a landau this morning; but go on."

"I now come to the romantic portion," said Mr. Jack Baltby. "The meeting ended and every one rose to go. As I was rising from my seat, I rested my hand on the back of the seat in front of me, and felt it suddenly come in contact—(see 'Bolingbroke')—with another hand, the hand of the golden-ringleted one. I am a gallant man, as you know, and was about to beg a thousand pardons, when the hand deposited a glove in mine, and its owner whispered, 'Keep this to remember me by.' It was but a moment I gazed on her face—it was full of smiles and blushes—let me pause to describe it——"

"If you do I'll commit murder, Baltby!" exclaimed Mr. Bryan.

"And that was all. She dropped her vail—it was a brown gauze one—over the ringlets and roses, and in a moment she and her companion disappeared in the—well, in the jam."

"You don't mean that was the last you saw of her?"

"I do, indeed; she vanished. I did catch a glimpse of her once, some distance before me, in the crowd—the ringlets shone on me for the last time. I could not reach her in spite of superhuman efforts—that is, treading on people's toes, and inserting my elbows into their sides. When I reached the front of the building she was gone."

"It is impossible!"

"It is possible since it is a fact," said Mr. Baltby, philosophically. "You never saw such a tremendous crowd, and she disappeared—probably in one of the carriages. Well, I walked home in a state of wild excitement. I am a married man and had supposed that no young woman would presume to make improper approaches to me. But here was the phenomenon. Here was a little beauty with golden ringlets looking sweet at me, and giving me gloves to remember her by! Why should she wish me to remember her? I concluded I would not inform Mrs. Baltby. I would keep my own sweet secret. I would explore every public resort for another sight of my dear one. I walked on the air. It was moonlight and I felt romantic. I had evidently made a deep impression, and I have never concealed from myself the fact that I am handsome. It was a challenge which I would accept. If the feelings of the dear owner of the golden ringlets were entangled by a married man, it was her look out. Married or not married, a man had no right to repulse the dear creature. I would—yes, I would—when suddenly (see works of contemporary novelists), I felt something in the glove! I drew that something forth, found it was a note, thrilled as it met my gaze, and then proceeded to read it by the moonlight."

Mr. Baltby had delivered these remarks standing and gesticulating. He now sat down and said, meekly:

"I assure you, my dear fellow, when I found the note for you, I never felt so mean—that's the word—in all my life!"

"But what does it all mean, my dear Baltby? How could it have happened?"

Mr. Baltby smiled and said:

"I can think of only one explanation."

He opened his desk and took out a small oval toilet mirror.

"Take a look at yourself and then at me," he said.

Mr. Bryan did so, and, for the first time, realized that he and his friend were very much alike.

"That's probably it," said Mr. Baltby, smiling; and as a client came in at the moment to have his life insured, Mr. Bryan went away, was nearly run over by an express wagon on the way to his office, and spent the remainder of the day in perusing M. C——'s note in pencil.

Henceforth the life of Fred Bryan, Esq., was a dream. Who was "M. C.?" He went to all the hotels and looked at the registers; there was no "M. C." there. He frequented the churches, the theatres, public concerts—no golden ringlets in company with black silk. He had seen both in the landau that day; he was sure they were the same, but where were they? They were, doubtless, passing visitors to the city and had disappeared.

Thereat Mr. Bryan fell into love-melancholy. If he only had her picture to kiss and press to his heart! She was so beautiful with her ringlets and roses—for had he not seen them. And then she was a "sister writer," too, and had spent "many hours of pleasure" over his—Mr. Bryan's—writings. She had read "Henry Bolingbroke." Which passages did she prefer? That where the hero declared his love and was discarded, or where he had a brain fever after? He examined the work again with the view of discovering which of its many beauties had probably produced the deepest impression.

After this fashion did Mr. Frederick Bryan, Attorney-at-Law and Notary Public, pass his time. Not in study or the trial of lawsuits, but in amorous dreams; not in interviews with John Doe and Richard Roe, but in stolen meetings with Incognita. He had told no one; it was a secret between himself and his two friends as yet; but one day he thought he would go up and tell Fanny all about it. She would pity him at least, and pity was better than nothing.

So he went, and the first words of the young lady were invigorating.

"I really never saw any one look so love-sick. Is anything the matter? Tell me, and if she has treated you badly, I'll go and give her a scolding."

"No one has treated me badly, my dear—excuse me, it was accidental," said Mr. Bryan.

Miss Fanny actually blushed a little at the "my dear," and responded:

"Don't tell a fib. It is only necessary to look at you to see that you are pining away."

"I assure you I am not."

"Don't attempt to deceive me. Do you suppose I am blind?"

"I hope not. Your eyes are much too beautiful," said Mr. Bryan, gazing at her sadly.

"Or that I have no sense?"

"I have always told you that you were one of the most brilliant people I knew."

"You are too tiresome! Come, tell me everything. I am going home in a day or two——"

"Going home, Fanny?"

"And I object to pining away and dying of ungratified curiosity."

"Don't speak of dying," said Mr. Bryan, with pathos. "If you were to die I think I should—like to."

"Would you, really?" said Miss Fanny, casting down her eyes and coloring faintly, for this young lady was always ready for an engagement.

"I would, indeed," said Mr. Bryan.

"I am afraid you are only jesting," she said, stealing a bashful glance at him and leaning her handsome head towards one shoulder.

Mr. Bryan looked at her sadly, admiring her face and figure. It was a very pretty and graceful one, and two small feet peeped from the skirt of her close-fitting dress.

"Just like Bonnybel in 'Bolingbroke,'" he sighed, contemplating the feet, which suddenly retire—"the heroine I dressed so absurdly, you know, that all the girls laughed. I have no doubt she laughed too, though Baltby said she was in the 'sad-sweet' style."

"Who is Baltby?" said Miss Fanny, "and who is the 'sad-sweet' one? Please tell me, sir."

"I will," said Mr. Bryan—"in fact, I came to ask your advice."

Thereupon he drew forth the glove and note, and related the whole adventure. Miss Fanny listened with an air of wonder, gazing at the glove.

"How strange—how romantic! Are you sure that you did not dream all this?" she said.

For response, Mr. Bryan pointed to the glove.

"But what can be the meaning of it?"

"Baltby and myself are very much alike, though I'm a long way the best-looking," said Mr. Bryan, mournfully.

"So you were mistaken for each other! But how could your fair one have been so unladylike?"

"Unladylike? That does not strike me. You angels are so hard on each other."

"And you lords of creation are so charitable where your vanity is concerned. But what on earth are you to do?"

"I really don't know, my own F—that is, my dear cousin. Never was so cut up in all my life. I thought I'd come to you for advice and consolation, and all that. Woman is the consoler of wounded hearts, you know—the angel to pour balm into the——"

Here Mr. Bryan attempted to possess himself of a hand which was hanging beside the young lady, but she quickly drew it away, apparently for the purpose of arranging her braid. It was a very pretty attitude and Mr. Bryan found himself admiring it.

"But think! If you should ever meet her," said Miss Fanny, with an audacious glance and a slight blush, "what a charming scene it would be—you would know her, of course, as you saw her in the landau."

"I'm not certain; I caught only a glimpse," said Mr. Bryan, sadly.

"I should suppose you would recognize your fair one without the least trouble: Golden ringlets, blue eyes—they were blue, I believe—hair falling ov——"

"Snowy shoulders? Precisely; but, then, there's so much golden hair and so many snowy shoulders," said Mr. Bryan.

"She may live in the city, or be here on a visit still."

"Impossible. I should have seen her somewhere."

"It might be Elise."

"Elise?"

"She is a sister writer, and admires 'Henry Bolingbroke,' and remember the color of her hair?"

"Elise! She's engaged to a bank president, or something of the sort."

"But that might be accounted for. Have you never heard of hearts being caught on the rebound? Why find fault with a poor girl who loses her heart to a poet and romance-writer, and writes him notes and gives him her glove, and, finding he cares nothing for her, consoles herself elsewhere!"

Mr. Bryan looked utterly bewildered.

"She has golden hair and steel-blue eyes," said Miss Fanny, wickedly, "and may have intended to mystify you. Elise is very fond of mystifying people."

"It is not possible!"

"Why not satisfy yourself? You may do so very easily, sir."

"Satisfy myself?"

"There is her desk on the window with a half-finished letter upon it which Elise was writing this morning. Why not compare the handwriting with the handwriting of the note?"

Mr. Bryan rose with energy, and exclaiming: "I really never thought of that!" hastened to the window. No sooner had he turned his back than Miss Fanny took a pencil from her pocket and wrote something on a scrap of paper which she found lying on the table beside her. She had just finished and concealed it when Mr. Bryan came back.

"The two handwritings are not at all alike," he said; "you were only amusing yourself at my expense."

"But Elise is so sly she may have gotten some friend to write the note for her."

"You know best—it is possible," said Mr. Bryan.

"You seem very indifferent, sir. So you are not so anxious to discover your incognita after all?"

"I thought I was, but I am not so sure now," Mr. Bryan said, looking into his companion's eyes, and as he had resumed his seat on the sofa beside her, he did not have to look very far. "I was under the impression up to a recent period that the best style of maiden was the moonlight love and flowers sort. But I begin to think I was rather spooney; the best roses are in a real girl's face."

As Mr. Bryan emphasized his meaning by gazing at the roses before him, a small bouquet du corsage worn by Miss Fanny became a little agitated.

"But only think," she said, coloring slightly, "how much disappointed your young blue eyes and golden hair would be."

"Not long," said Mr. Bryan, with a philosophic air; "she'd marry some old Moneypenny, and console herself with a brown-stone front."

"But she'd be so jealous?"

"She would not care."

"Ah, you do her injustice, sir; I am certain you do! Poor thing, she will pine away, and you are just like the rest—first all flame and then all ice—there's no depending on you," added the maiden, with a pout and a blush. "You have actually forgotten her, and would not recognize her if you saw her again."

"Well, I really am not certain that I should," said Mr. Bryan. "I should never forget you."

"If she was seated by you, within a few feet of you, you would not care?"

"I don't know—I might—but I do know, Fanny, dear Fanny——"

Mr. Bryan made another ineffectual attempt to gain possession of the hand.

"You have forgotten your poor dear incognita, the golden hair on her shoulders, and blue eyes, and all. Was she at all in my style? Of course, a poor little country girl like myself could not compare with her. But you know ugly people are sometimes like pretty people. Was there any resemblance? Was her hair like this?"

As Miss Fanny spoke her cheeks turned the color of blush roses, and untying a ribbon which confined her hair, she allowed the gold-brown mass to fall on her shoulders. Mr. Bryan sat perfectly still, looking at the hair, the blush roses, the eyes half-concealed by the long lashes, and suddenly blushed worse than his companion.

"Fanny!" he exclaimed, with his eyes wide open, "you don't mean to say——"

"Am I anything like incognita? I should so love to know her!" murmured Miss Fanny. "I would give anything in the world to see her, and I can't think how I missed noticing her. I was at the Lyceum that evening with mamma, who was passing through town on her way to Georgia, but I did not see your dear unknown—what a pity! Now, I should like to congratulate her."

"Fanny! I am losing my senses! Do you really mean——?"

"But I have one consolation," murmured Miss Fanny, with a bouquet du corsage accompaniment, "she's a girl of my style and her friends may like me on her account. Maybe our writing even is alike; do you think there is any resemblance, sir?"

She held out the paper which she had written, when Mr. Bryant went to the window. It was a fac simile of the note in the glove—the same words in the same writing.

"I signed 'M. C.' because you were so obliging one day as to call me Miss Candor, sir!" she said.

"Oh, Fanny!" exclaimed Mr. Bryan, quite forgetting to be sad and languid, and, indeed, seizing her hand with ardor.

"Please, don't!"

"I love you so! It was wicked in you, but I'll forgive you if you will——"

Such was the ardor of Mr. Bryan that the kid glove lying between them fell from the sofa to the floor.

"Please pick up my glove," murmured Miss Fanny, and they both stooped and the two faces came together——.

* * * * * *

My friend Bryan told me this story and showed me the glove. As he finished, Mrs. Fanny came in and, patting his shoulder, laughing, said:

"Poor Fred! he was very much in love with me," she said, "but then, I was very much in love with him, and that kid glove was the cause of everything!"

Depopulation of the Esquimaux.

A SHOCKING account of the sufferings of the Esquimaux living in the vicinity of Behring's Straits has reached San Francisco with the return of the Californian whalers. It appears that the constant chasing has driven the whales considerably further to the north, and the American whalers have in consequence during recent years taken to kill the walrus at the rate of nearly 100,000 annually. As the seal is a necessary of life to the Esquimaux in Greenland, so is the walrus to those on the shores of the Straits; and the gradual destruction of this animal is causing terrible sufferings among the people. On the shores of the Bay of St. Lawrence nearly one-half of the population has died from starvation, and it is stated that in one village containing 200 inhabitants every one has succumbed. It is computed that for every 100 walruses killed one Esquimaux family is starved to death. What seems to be wanted is a regulation to stop the wholesale destruction of the walrus in the same way as the seal is now protected.

National Railroads.

THE vital point of interest in the question of the purchase of German railways by the State, the measure for which has passed both Houses, was clearly brought out in the speech of Count von Moltke during the discussion of the Bill. It was manifest, he said, that the possession of the most important lines of railway by the State was most desirable from a military point of view. Railways, in the present age, were one of the most essential instruments of war, and the means of rapid transport was of the utmost consequence. He added that it was natural to suppose that the conditions of the latter would be amazingly simplified, when there was a single administration in place of forty-nine. This opinion, however, is nothing more than an echo of that daring and successful strategy which led to the latest German successes—that is to say, the rapid movement of large masses of troops.

The Site of Temple Bar.

AT a recent meeting of the Court of Common Council, the London City Lands Company submitted for the approval of the court the model of a design for marking the boundary of the city's jurisdiction on the site of Temple Bar. In their report they stated that the structure would also provide a rest for foot passengers crossing from the New Law Courts, sixteen feet being left on each side for vehicular traffic. It is stated that the extreme height will be thirty-three feet, the material to be used in the construction being either a hard white stone or an equally durable and fine-grained material, capable of withstanding the weather. The base and pedestals are to be made of gray or other granite, whilst the statues, which it is proposed should be of heroic size, as well as the surmounting griffin, will be of bronze. The report was adopted nem. con. Mr. Bedford then moved, "That the Right Honorable the Lord Mayor be requested to take the necessary steps for obtaining Her Majesty's pleasure with reference to some important details connected with the proposed design." This also was agreed to unanimously.

Japanese Students in America.

THE education of Japanese girls in America is not regarded with favor by the Tokio Times, which says that even the male Japanese students now in the United States believe that the foreign experience of their half-dozen young countrywomen will render their future life wretched. The reason given for this view of the matter is that on returning to their homes the girls find their education and acquired tastes utterly antagonistic to the social customs to which they are compelled to conform. They are sent to this country when very young, and during their stay here become thoroughly Americanized, so that Japan is practically foreign to them, and its sex restrictions and humiliations revolting. But the conventional laws cannot be set aside, and they are forced to become Japanese again. The career of one girl after her return from America is thus given: "Her home was in the house of an official of very considerable rank, who encouraged her retrogression to the normal condition of her sex. Four years ago she was an expert linguist, with talents and endowments not inferior to what are seen among the best foreign classes. At this day she is nearly unintelligible in any tongue but her own, and the bright ambition and mental activity of her youth are dead, if not forgotten."

Winter Wheat.

WHEAT-GROWERS seem to be in a fair way to make an overstock of wheat the next crop-year certain. The area devoted to Winter wheat in the Western States is twelve per cent. larger than last year, with a prospect that the yield will increase in in even larger proportion. For the first time in five years Winter wheat in England promises a good crop, and the same is true in Europe. With a short crop in Europe, and a yield of 448,000,000 bushels at home, a break in wheat here is altogether probable, because England does not want the surplus here badly enough to take it at speculators' prices. If the crop abroad is good, and the production here anything like 500,000,000 bushels, wheat will scarcely pay to harvest in many parts of the West.

Prussian Iron Trade Statistics.

THE yield of iron ore in the kingdom of Prussia during the past year was 2,956,872 tons, raised from 849 pits, and employing 21,991 hands. The number of charcoal furnaces is 44, of which 33 were in blast during 1878, the consumption of home ore being 74,013 tons, and of foreign ore 1,270. The production of pig from these charcoal furnaces was 16,392 tons. The coal and coke furnaces numbered 184, of which 128 were in blast. The yield from these was 2,334,830 tons of pig, of which 56,983 were foundry pig, 426,816 Bessemer pig, open-hearth pig and spiegeleisen, and 1,040,830 mill pig. Two furnaces have also been running on mixed fuel, making the total pig-iron production for the year 1,868,061, smelted in 163 furnaces, and employing 12,902 hands. There were also 871 foundries, employing 19,815 men. Wrought-iron is made in 264 establishments, employing 36,540 men, and the production was 1,123,171 tons. As to the steel trade, 28 out of the Bessemer converters were in operation during the year, together with 42 open-hearth furnaces and 25 crucible furnaces. The total production of Bessemer steel was 452,399 tons, and of open-hearth steel 81,731 tons. The crucible steel trade was stagnant during the year, only 74 crucibles being in operation out of 282 existing.

PICTORIAL SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN ILLUSTRATED PRESS.

The "Thunderer's" Burst Gun.

It will be remembered that after the giant gun on the British ironclad Thunderer burst while being fired, the remains of the monster were taken to Woolwich Arsenal, where an investigation was held. Our illustration represents the shattered gun as erected on a temporary platform, with the bands holding the splintered pieces in position, and with diagrams drawn upon the surface to show the relative positions of the two charges that are supposed to be the cause of the disaster.

Nordenskjold at Cape Chelyuskin.

Cape Chelyuskin is considered the most northerly promontory of Asia. It was while passing that point on the 19th of August last that Professor Nordenskjöld fired a salute from the Vega in honor of the successful navigation of the famous Northeast Passage. After rounding the cape the Vega and her escort, the Lena, came to anchor, and the famous navigator erected a tablet on the shore, and deposited records of his trip beneath blocks of ice and snow.

The Press Fetes in Paris.

An interesting feature of the great fête given by the Press of Paris in aid of the fund for the relief of the sufferers by the late floods in Spain, was the procession of tableaux before the ex-Queen Isabella, who occupied a box in the vast Hippodrome on the occasion. It is worthy of note that when citizens of several large cities in Spain desired to compliment, by a serenade and reception, the consuls of France settled among them, this appropriate acknowledgment of French charity was prohibited on the ground that such demonstrations might lead to the dangerous spread of republican ideas.

The Capture of Morosi's Mountain.

This natural stronghold, after defying the attacks of the British army for several months, was taken by assault on the 20th of November, with a loss of only two Fingoes killed, and two men of the Cape Mounted Rifles dangerously wounded. The mountain had been shelled for three days previous to the attack, which was made simultaneously from five different points. Morosi himself, who had been shot through the neck, was subsequently found in a cave, or schanze, into which he had managed to creep. His son Inda, whose escape from prison was the immediate cause of the outbreak, managed to get clear away. The capture of the mountain and the death of the rebel Morosi will, it is hoped, put an end to the disturbed state of the district.

The Tay Bridge Disaster.

Divers are still at work at the scene of the terrible disaster to the remarkable railroad bridge over the Tay in Scotland. Thus far but few results have been obtained upon which a thorough investigation can be had, and the first belief of the authorities gains ground that the bodies of the victims have either been buried in the sand or washed by undercurrents seaward. The accident produced the greatest consternation through Scotland and England, and every point from which a view of the scene could be had has since been crowded with sightseers.

Execution of Afghan Chiefs.

After the recapture of Cabul by the British the first victim of extreme measures was the Kotwal (head man) of the city. He had taken a leading part in the disturbances of September 3d, and had, further, issued proclamations and furnished provisions to the troops fighting against the English since then. He was tried along with several others. One, a chowkeedar, had, after the Residency massacre, dragged the head and shoulders of a corpse through the bazaars of the city. This man, the Kotwal, and three others, were hanged on the morning of October 20th, in the Bala Hissar, close outside the late Residency walls. On the very spot where the mutineers had brought into position the gun they fired on the Residency, a high gallows had been erected, within sight of the whole city. On it the Kotwal suffered the penalty of his offenses, while the four others were hanged within the inclosure lately occupied by the Guides' escort.

The Bird-market in the Plaza San Andres, Madrid.

The occupants of the French flats in the tall houses of Madrid are great bird-lovers, and those who visit the Spanish capital and have a weakness for feathered pets should visit the bird-market on the Plaza San Andres. There you find birds of all countries, from canaries to cockatoos, and even fancy breeds of fowl, with, of course, a crowd of purchasers—ladies young and old, married and unmarried—seeking a purchasable object for their affections; or, perhaps, if the day is not favorable, men will predominate as they did when Muñoz sketched, for on such a day a gentleman may buy a gift for a fair one without being detected by some other lady and his movements being reported to the whole circle of his acquaintance.

SCIENTIFIC INTELLIGENCE.

It has been Suggested by the Temps meteorological editor, that the whole of Europe and a large part of Asia and Northern America being covered with snow, the appearance may be analogous to the red spot discovered on Jupiter by astronomers, and this may be considered as an indication that some unusual cooling influence prevails on the whole solar system.

The University of Gottingen has become the possessor of a magnificent herbarium, containing over 40,000 specimens of plants from all parts of the world. It was left to the University by the late director of the Göttingen Botanical Gardens, Professor Grisebach. There is no doubt that it is by far the largest collection of plants ever brought together by any single individual.

Bee-culture is reduced to a science in Europe, and has its special journals and its affiliated societies all over the land. The German and Austrian apiculturists will hold their twenty-fourth meeting this year at Prague. This will be accompanied by an international exhibition of living bees, and all products and apparatus connected with bee-culture. The members of the society are particularly indignant over the frauds practiced upon the public by the sales of grape sugar as genuine honey. As the case now stands there is a lively competition between the bees and the chemists, with the advantage in favor of the latter. Even the "busy bee" cannot compete with the manufacturers who have a store of a milliard bushels of Indian corn from which to make grape sugar. Honey in the comb is all that we can expect to find genuine in the future.

Metallic Manganese is now obtained in large quantities at the furnaces of Dillenburg, in Nassau, and is used extensively in the manufacture of bronze and other alloys. In consequence of the rapid oxidation of manganese the addition of one-half to one per cent. of copper washes out the copper of all its air-bubbles and makes it more compact and malleable. As it is difficult to keep pure metallic manganese, owing to its ready absorption of moisture, it is generally sold in the form of an alloy of 70 per cent. copper and 30 per cent. manganese. Copper-manganese is added to other alloys in the proportion of 2½ to 6 per cent., according to circumstances. An alloy composed of 80 parts copper, 9 parts manganese copper, 6 parts tin and 5 parts zinc is mentioned as possessing most valuable properties. Pure metallic manganese is sold at Dillenburg at $1.25 per pound, and the manganese-copper at 62½ cents per pound.

A Rich Archæological Find in Russia.—Russian newspapers announce that a very rich archæological find has been made by M. Kitsikhich in Southern Russia, on the banks of the Trubesh River, in the Government of Poltava. In a locality covered with numerous small mounds, a sheet of earth with pieces of coal, bones, broken pieces of earthenware, as well as stone and bronze implements, were discovered under the recent roads. The number of stone arrows and knives discovered is no less than 372; besides, M. Kitsikhich has found two large stone implements which were used for breaking great bones, several clay and glass ornaments, earthenware with ornaments, and five bronze arrows. This find is the first in Southern Russia, whilst, as is known, the remains of the stone and bronze periods are very numerous in Northern and Eastern Russia. The Russian Government takes great interest in preserving and properly exhibiting the specimens.

Other Worlds than Ours.—Professor Peirce, in his paper read before the American Association at Saratoga on the "Meteoric Condition of the Sidereal Universe," stated that "the aggregate mass of the invisible meteors probably surpasses that of the visible celestial objects." The same idea was advanced nearly fifty years ago by Isaac Taylor. In his work entitled "Saturday Evening," Mr. Taylor, while discoursing of the vastness of the material universe, says: "The invisible material creation, it is probable, vastly outnumbers the visible; and it may justly be thought that the worlds made known to us by their inherent splendor are to the unseen only in the proportion of the chiefs of an army to the thousands that fill the rank and file. It is as if from the summit of a tower we were looking by night upon a boundless plain filled with the army of war, and could discern nothing but the gemmed crests of the captains gleaming amid the countless and unseen multitudes they were leading on."

The Paris Astronomical Museum contains, among other objects of historical interest, a pair of Mercator's globes, dating from the middle of the sixteenth century. That figuring the earth is the first on which meridians of longitude and parallels of latitude were laid down. The great equatorial lakes of Africa, it is reported, are all to be found upon it. Another case contains the standard metre of the first republic; the toise used in 1738 in Peru for measuring a degree at the equator; the toise used in Lapland some short time afterwards for measuring the polar degree, and the platinum kilogramme made by the Republican Commission of Weights and Measures; the object-glass of the astronomer Cassini, which he used in successively determining the existence of Jupiter's satellites, Saturn's double ring, the abnormal flatness of Jupiter's poles, and the vast velocity of his rotation, as well as that of Mars; the double refracting prism with the help of which Arago measured the diameter of the great planets.

South Carolina Fossils.—Some of the remains of terrestrial animals, found as fossils in the Ashley phosphate beds, including even the softer or more spongy bones, exhibit no evidence of violent water action other than the signs of decay from the combined influence of moisture and air; neither do such fossils exhibit the marks of boring mollusks nor the attachments of barnacles. Usually black and more or less friable, these fossils, such as the bones of mastodon, megatherium, deer, etc., are no doubt the remains of animals which become mired and sank into marshes of the Ashley phosphate beds after they had become elevated above the surface of the neighboring sea. Of this nature, also, are the remains of more recent animals, including also specimens of human bones, those of domestic animals, and stone implements, which are occasionally found in the Ashley phosphate beds. The Ashley beds also contain a remarkable intermixture of the remains of marine and terrestrial animals, consisting of bones, teeth, coprolites, shells, etc., derived from contiguous formations of various ages from the early tertiary to those of a comparatively recent period.

In Edison's Electro-chemical Telephone an arm extends at right angles from a diaphragm and touches a cylinder of chalk, moistened with a solution of phosphate of soda in water. The arm is pressed against the chalk cylinder by a little block of rubber, which is pressed upon the arm by a screw touched by the finger of the receiver of the message, who keeps the cylinder in rotation by a little crank. The working of the instrument depends upon the principle that the passage of a current of electricity through a moistened substance, prepared in the way the chalk cylinder is prepared, prevents friction. Hence, when the electric waves come from the transmitter, there is no friction during the passage of a wave, and this absence of friction affects the arms projecting from the diaphragm, and the diaphragm itself vibrates with an intensity greater than that of the impulse which comes over the wires from the transmitter. Hence the enfeebling of the current by the length of wire that it passes over is made up, and the voice of the speaker at the transmitter is heard nearly as loudly, or sometimes even more loudly, at the receiving instrument than at the transmitter. Mr. Edison is now making 500 of these instruments at Menlo Park.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

—A FACTORY in New Haven, Conn., made over 22,000,000 fishhooks last year.

—THE post-office at Atlanta will be moved into the new Government building early in the Spring.

—ALABAMA coal is fast becoming the fuel for steamships that ply in the commerce of the Gulf ports.

—THE Bank of Montreal has agreed to loan the city $1,000,000 at five per cent., to retire its six per cent. bonds now overdue.

—TEXAS has 7,000 schools, and her school fund is apportioned equally among the children of scholastic age, regardless of color.

—THE proposed Centennial Exposition building at Nashville will contain 40,000 square feet of floor space and 8,000 feet of wall space.

—SWITZERLAND is this Winter almost one mountain of snow; trains, steamboats and telegraphs have been in a chronic state of interruption.

—THE bells of St. Peter's, Zurich, are to melted to form a new set, but the local antiquarian society has interfered to save one cast in 1294, seven years previous to Zurich's adhesion to the Swiss Federation.

—THE Gaceta of Madrid reports the population of the Island of Cuba at the end of 1878 at 1,399,979, of whom 268,719 were creoles or free blacks, and 187,396 slaves.

—GOETHE once presented a set of his works to Harvard Library—a fact which has just been brought to light in the process of re-cataloguing the German literature of the library.

—OVER $22,000,000 was expended in New York city last year in the erection of new buildings, which is in excess of the amount expended for new buildings any year since 1871.

A GRAND official banquet will be given in honor of General Grant in Havana, and a brilliant reception will be tendered him at the Palace by high public functionaries and distinguished members of society in that city.

—MAYOR OSBORNDLZ and Comptroller Adrian, of St. Louis, have disposed of $100,000 in five per cent. city bonds at a premium of $1.25 per $1,000. There are still $275,000 in bonds unsold. This is the first issue of five per cent. bonds.

—THE metric system has now been adopted by twenty-eight different nations, including a majority of the civilized world. In eleven countries it is in exclusive use, while in several, as in Germany and France, there are penalties for using any other measures.

—THE tract over which distress exists in Silesia covers 5,000 square miles, a little bigger than Connecticut, and has a population of 500,000, of which nearly 90,000 are suffering from want and hunger. The population, landowners and tenants together, are Roman Catholic.

—A NEW trade has sprung up in Paris. Furs are the fashionable wear this Winter, and it is now a business to hire them out by the day, or even by the hour. This industry flourishes principally in the quarter of Notre Dame de Lorette, which abounds in demi-mondaine, where games of chance may be indulged in, and in lending shops, where luckless gamesters can raise money on their apparel at a moment's notice.

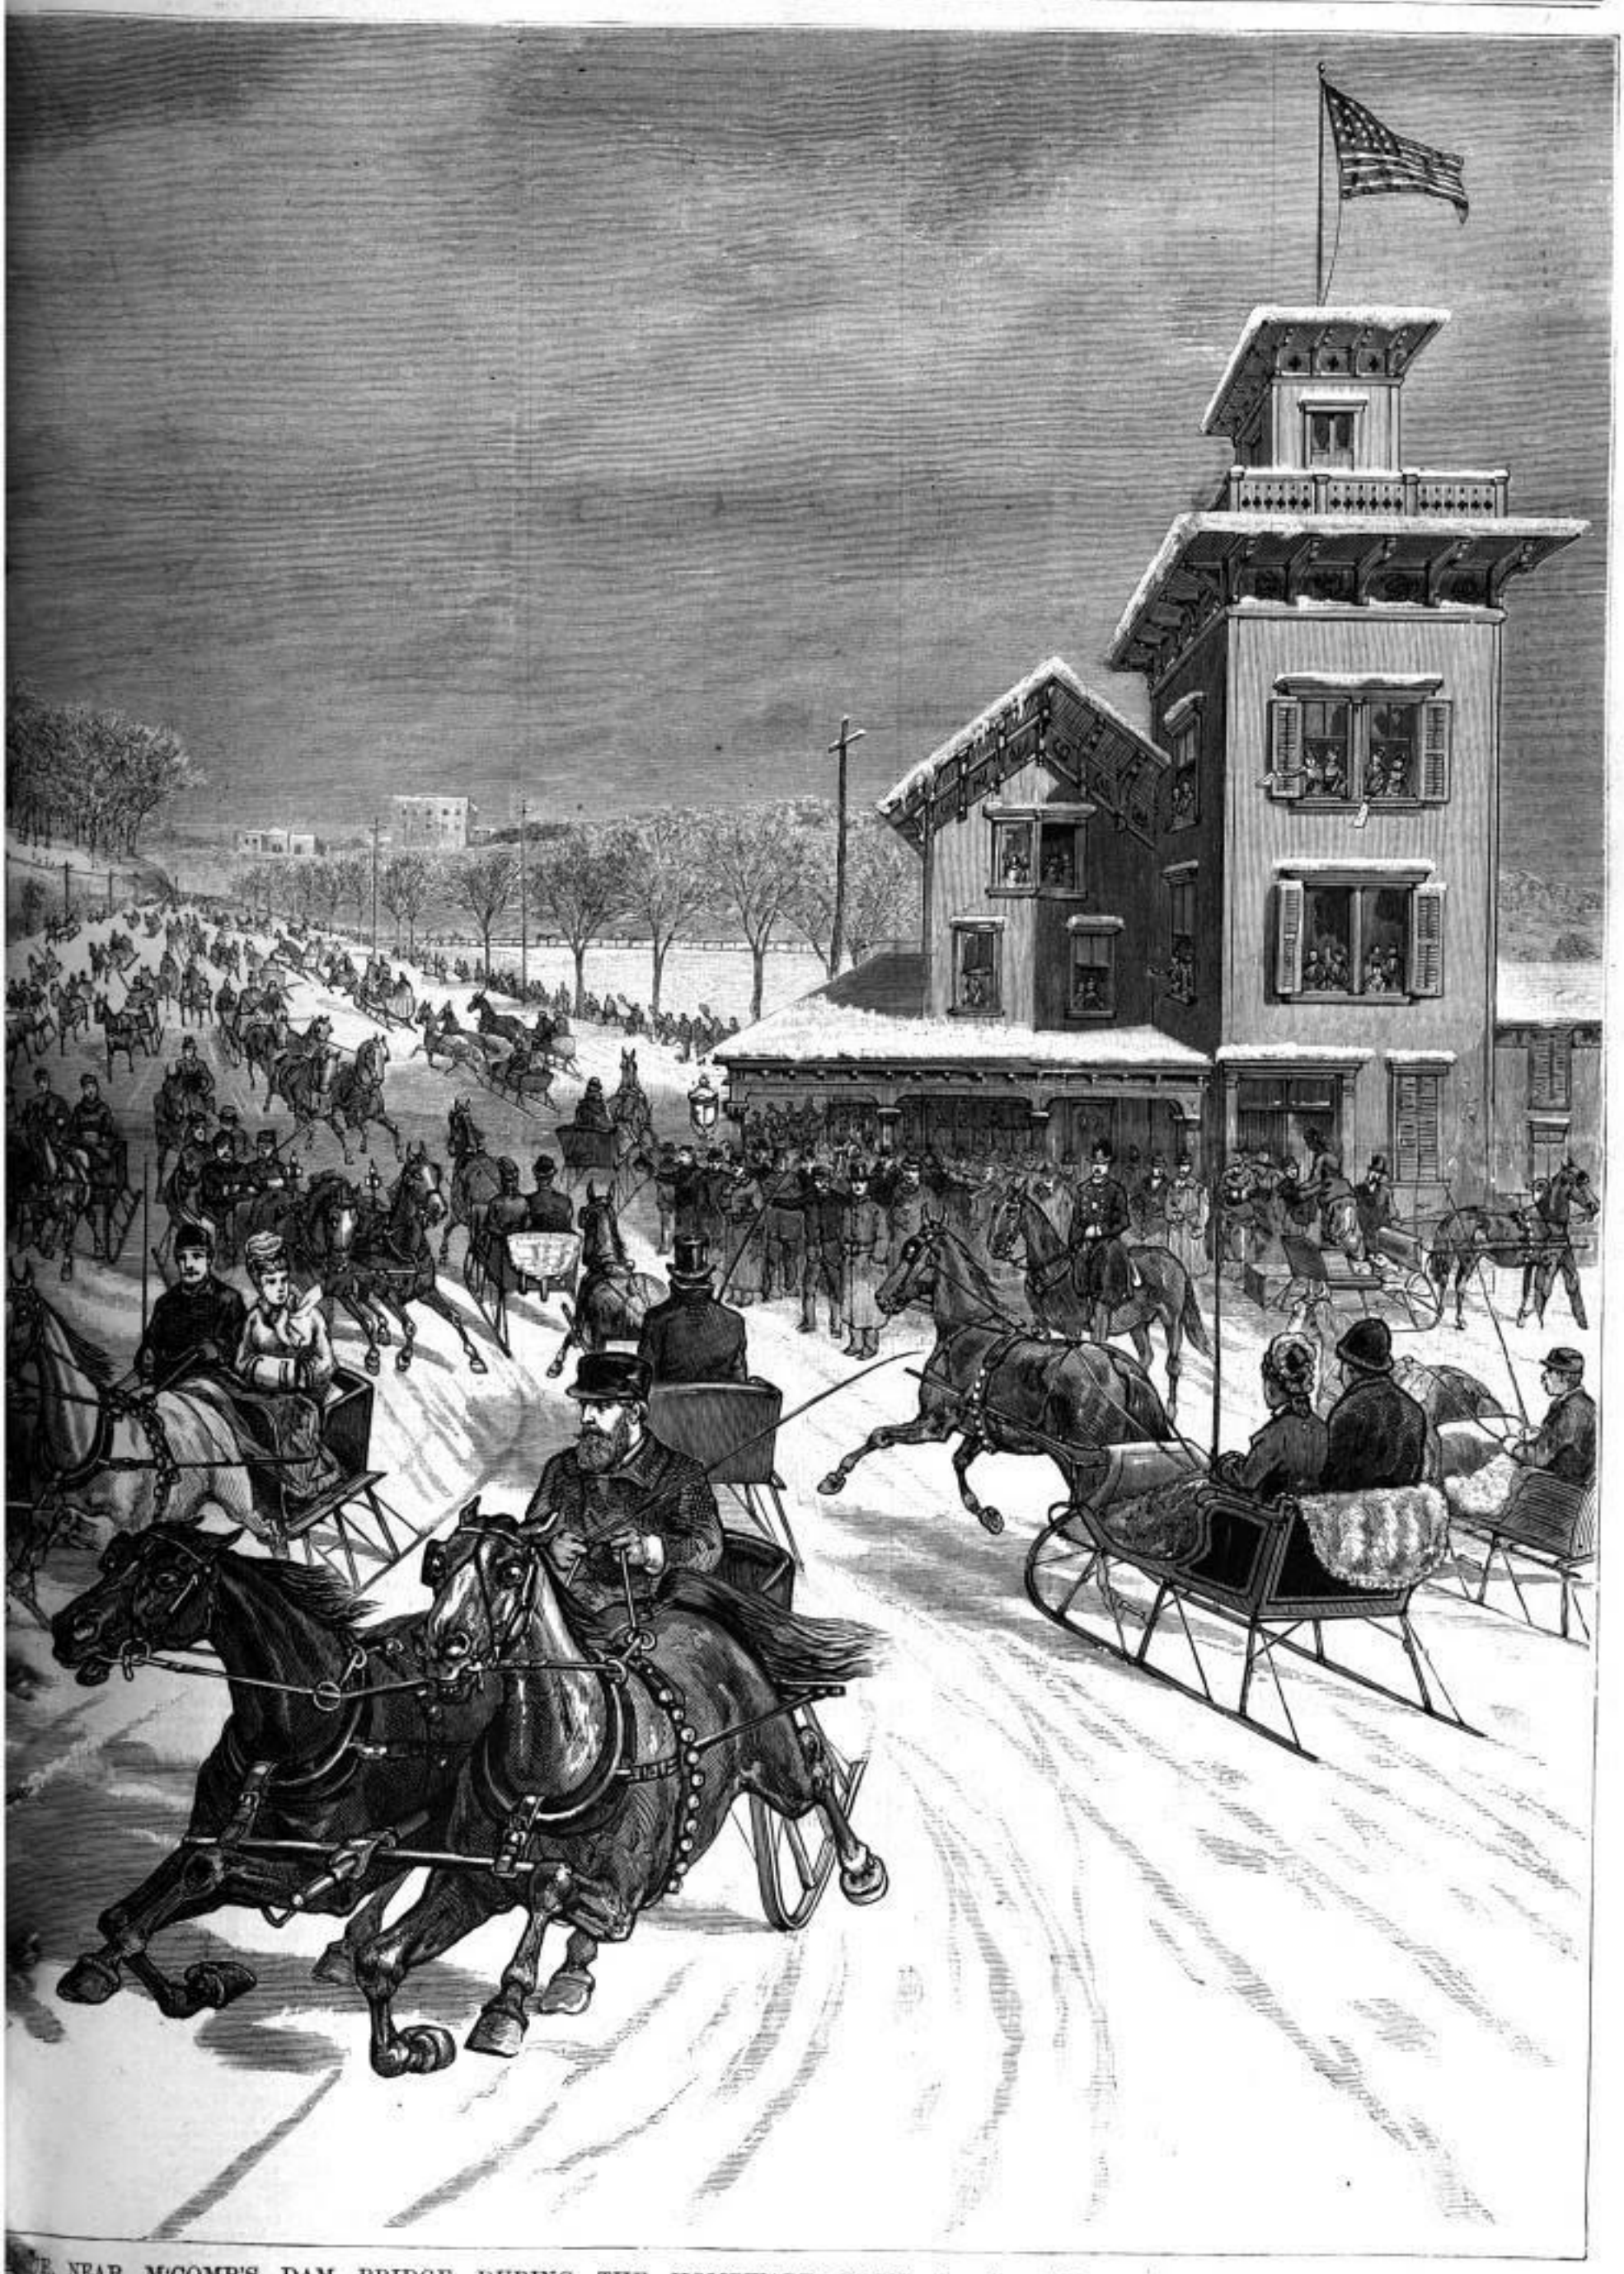
—OFFICIAL statements respecting the foreign commerce of France during the last year shows a remarkable growth of French trade with the United States. In the month of December the exports from the consular district of Lyons reached 3,202,237 francs, an increase of 1,000,000 francs over November. The total exports from the Lyons district for 1879 were 48,339,844 francs, against 41,000,000 francs, which was the total amount for 1878, and against 47,000,000 francs for 1877.

—THE English National Lifeboat Association saved 637 lives during the past year. Twenty-one vessels were saved from destruction. In the same period the lifeboat institution granted rewards for saving 218 lives by fishing and other boats, making a total of 855 lives saved last year, mainly through its instrumentality. Altogether since its formation the society has contributed to the saving of 26,936 shipwrecked persons. It should also be mentioned that during the past two years the institution has not lost a single life from its 269 boats.

—AMONG the provisions of the new California Constitution, those concerning the prosecution of persons accused of crime are now exciting most discussion in that State. The chief function of grand juries will not be the making of indictments, but prosecution may directly follow information after the preliminary examination and commitment of a magistrate. In cases below felony, the trial by jury may be waived by the consent of both parties, or the jury may consist of any number less than twelve mutually agreed upon; but no man, if he so chooses, can be tried any other way than before an old-fashioned jury.

—IT is reported from St. Petersburg that the Minister of the Interior has signed a concession giving the American firm of Hutchinson, Cole & Co., the right to the fur trade of the Komandorskia and Julian Islands, of Kamtschatka, for a term of twenty-five years, at a rent of 5,000 roubles per annum. This, it is stated, is the first of a series of concessions that will be granted to American citizens in connection with the fur trade and fisheries upon the Pacific Siberian coast, as being the best means of dealing with the disputes that have occurred recently between the Russian and the United States Governments in respect to those industries.

—THE new Mexican inter-oceanic railway across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec is to pass through the State of Chiapas, which probably contains the only population in the world which possesses no iron, nor anything of the nature of an iron industry, even of the crudest form. For the distance of eighty miles around Palenque, the capital, not a single blacksmith can be found, and the only articles of iron are axes and machetas, imported from the United States. Nails are unknown, all the woodwork being held together by cords or tendrils of vines; and even their tortilla, or corn cake, is prepared by grinding the maize between stones. The new railway through this territory has clearly a well-defined educational as well as commercial development to undertake.



—THE reigning Czar possesses in full measure the family love of being present at great fires, which his younger brother, the Grand Duke Nicholas, is enabled to gratify at will by his position as head of the St. Petersburg Fire Brigade. On one occasion this passion for "running with the machine" all but proved fatal to both. When the German Lutheran Church, on the Moika Canal, took fire, in the middle of the night, the Czar and his brother were among the first to reach the spot, and, while directing the operations of the firemen, incautiously approached too near the burning building, the belfry of which was already beginning to totter. Suddenly a huge beam, at least twelve feet in length, fell blazing from the roof and struck the ground with a tremendous crash, close to the spot where they stood, injuring several of the crowd with its flying splinters. General Trepoff, then Minister of Police, at once stepped forward, and succeeded in persuading the Czar to withdraw, but the Grand Duke Nicholas remained to the end, and saved the greater part of the building.

A SULTAN'S WHIMS.

SHE has perfumed the flood of her hair
With the oil of the attar-gul rare,
And the flowers that are dear to me;
She has tinted her lashes with khol
As she waits for the muezzin to toll,
For the hour to be near to me.

She has bathed her white body in nard;
And the sleek, yellow hide of a pard
Warms the delicate feet of her;
While the lily and rose of her breast
By the glow of the moon are caressed
In the beauty complete of her!

All her turban's rich, delicate furls
She has studded with Orient pearls,
Where the gems of her crescent are,
And has cut with her Alep blade's tip
To make redder, the red of her lip,
Where my kisses incessant are!

She is clad in a shimmer of sheen—
In a dolman of gold damascene—
Starred with emeralds numberless,
On a divan of cashmere she lies
With impatient, black flashings of eyes—
Of black passion-eyes, slumberless!

Both her wee hands, of princess and fay,
Have been tipped to the nail in henneh
To delight and to charm me with;
While her slaves, with curved scimitars bare,
Pace, with slow, cat-like tread, here and there,
As a jest to alarm me with!

From the satin and silk of her kiosk
She dreams out to the moon-glamoured beak,
As she waits till I come to her:
While the songs of the bulbul arise,
And the wail of the soft lute replies,
And the sad guzlas thrum to her.

From her palace, invading the dusk,
Steals a subtle, soft odor of musk,
And her sighings ascend with it;
While the murmurs of millions of flowers,
From the mazes of fountains and bowers,
Seem in silence to blend with it!

As she waits mid the perfumes that swarm,
The checked passion that darts thro' her form
Burns restless and comet-like;
For her love there is no Rhamadan,
And no fasting, no faith, no Khoran—
No tame passions Mahomet-like!

* * * *

She may wait by the moon and may dream,
But to-night, to her splendor supreme,
My soul dares not be dutiful;
I have given the love that she craves
To Al-Lella, the pearl of her slaves—
To Al-Lella, the beautiful!

F. S. SALTUS.

THE HIDDEN WITNESS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THAT HUSBAND OF MINE."

CHAPTER XXXII.—WHAT HAD HAPPENED?

SHE does not die, for the horse and his rider go by. Salome loosens her grasp upon Sylve's neck, and the really frightened girl hears a quick salutation and a little rippling laugh from Salome.

"There, get up, the farce is ended, dear," said Salome; "nobody has come to carry you off. How silly we were! Standing here like two gawks. Well, of course, if we had run, it wouldn't have been much better. If it had been the veritable Flix himself, he would have gone straight to the house. Don't let us get frightened again."

"There wasn't a bit of need, of course not," Sylve murmurs, shaking out the disarranged folds of her dress, and preening as she slowly comes up to her own stature. "Flix Forester would never think of coming himself—a farce, sure enough," she repeats, indignantly. "I'll not be such a fool again. But who was it? Didn't you speak to him?"

"Of course I did; it was no other than Ray Wilde," Salome replies, the dimples still dinting her cheeks. "What a splendid horseman he is! There, from this rising ground we shall see him in a moment."

Sylve stands, the sun in her face, looking from under a slender white hand, from whose rounded wrist dangles the chain of a gold bracelet, that flashes in the red light. Yonder is a bit of wheat-field, then a road, along which the straggling shanties of several families of poor whites air their shingled sides and broken roof-tops, and in whose backyards tow-headed urchins can be seen in every variety of posture, while the whites' gray clothes flap from ropes tied to the dilapidated fences—for it is washing-day; beyond the miserable tenements a long stretch of the road appears, and just as they reach the acclivity, from whence they can observe all this, the horseman comes in sight. Sylve, half-provoked with herself for thus passively consenting to see him, cannot help the pleasure visible in her eyes, as, with a splendid carriage, head erect, a perfect seat, graceful as Antinous, he rides, as if the eyes of the world were upon him.

"Isn't he magnificent?" asks Salome.

"Rides well," Sylve answers, reluctant to express her admiration. "He seems to be a great favorite of yours."

"He is; everybody likes Raphael; he, as well as Eve, is a general favorite."

"It's very warm," Sylve says, frowning a little as she turns; "would you as lief go in the house?"

"Certainly," and Salome leads the way; "but wouldn't I like to be there to see the meeting? Poor little Eve has so few pleasures! He is nearly there now. Won't he fly up the terraces? You saw for yourself the superb situation of Lewin House; you ought to sit on the piazza—the view is unsurpassed. There one never suffers from the heat of Summer."

Sylve listens impatiently as she hastens on. Why, she cannot tell, but it makes her angry to hear these praises of people who are nothing to her. Does she fear a rival in this girl? What chance is there of that? Neither will probably ever take the first step towards an acquaintanceship. Every time she thinks of her she shuts her teeth and frowns. Is it coming to hate?—this miserable aversion at first sight.

For a moment she regrets the haste of her decision to leave the known for the unknown. But, having decided upon a given line, she will not turn back. She has been longing all day for one of Mrs. Forester's sweet smiles, for the homage so freely accorded to her in the place she calls home, but she steels her heart against it.

"I will not be despised," is her mental decision; "I had rather die. Only I wish I had never seen that girl—I hope I shall never see her again."

Meanwhile Ray nears the object of all his desires—the goal he has been longing for—the fine old wreck of Lewin House looms before him. Yes, and there are fluttering white garments on the piazza. And there, by the gate—though it can be no longer used, but lies prone on its face at the side of the entrance—stand Desire and Father Crow, dressed in their best and cleanest. In a trice Ray is off the horse; in another he has flown forward and up, Dee following slowly, her fine black face wreathed in smiles. The neglected flowers in red and white beauty he trampled under his relentless feet. There was but one flower in the world to him—a cloistered saint, fairer than any pink or snowy petals.

Up there in mid-air, the varied wreath of garden woods and river banks beneath them, the cool sky full of tiny seraphs of white cloud, glorious sunshine over all, they met—Eve blushing, smiling, angelic; Ray exultant, a little flurried, as became him, and almost breathless from his climb. He caught both outstretched hands.

"May I?" he asked, and without waiting for an answer, kissed her bashfully on her cheek, so red under his lips.

"Glorious!" said Ray, as she led him into their transformed kitchen. "Why, you saved your piano!"

"Don't you remember Dee got up on top when the soldiers were going to destroy it, and prayed?"

"Deed, did I," says the old nurse, coming into the parlor by stepping from the polished pine boards on to the bright, well-mended carpet. "Says I, 'If you's men, you won't spile de on'y thing that my little missee hab lef' to give her comfort,' and den I kneeled down, and, my Lord in heaven, didn't I pray! Reckon Massa up dar open His ear dat time; fac' is, I jest battered de walls of heaven."

"I had forgotten," laughed Ray; "it was nowhere in sight the last time I was here. Well, I declare, this is comfortable."

One would not have thought them poor to look at the table. There were flowers and silver, and chicken broiled and brown as a chestnut, and golden pone, and the daintiest of white biscuit. How happy they were, the handsome fellow of twenty-one and the tender, pretty little orphan of seventeen. After supper came a stroll through the ruined garden, where grew neglected flowers, straggling bushes, unpruned trees, and shaded spots full of painted trilliums, with their wavy-white petals blushing in faint pink at the heart. It was sunset, too, and all the west was one blazing gallery of color-gems, fitly framed in the red gold of the horizon.

"Do you remember the marsh callas?" asks Eve, as they linger at the foot of the garden, each, perhaps, busy with thoughts of the past.

"Yes, indeed, and how I never could induce you to go near the haunted pool, though you liked them so much. I suppose they grow in the same place?"

"Yes; but I got Crow to find some roots and plant them over in the hollow. We will go there to-morrow—it is too late now," and he feels her shudder, leaning on his arm.

"Is the pool still there?" asks Ray.

"Yes: in the spot where they found the poor peddler. Curious that it should change places. Before that it was on the other side of the fence."

"I rode past the spot to-day, but I never thought of it," says Ray. "I suppose they never found out who did the deed?"

"Not that I know of," replies Eve, and they turn and walk back in the lengthening shadows. "I remember the very night; I was ill, and the dog kept howling. He wouldn't even stop when Dee took off her shoe and said something which she declares always prevents it on any ordinary occasion; but, you see, then, murder was being done; now, how did the dog know?"

"One of those inscrutable mysteries that science has not fathomed yet," Ray makes answer. "Suppose we turn to some more cheerful subject?"

In-doors the candles were lighted. If there were strollers in the road that evening, as undoubtedly there were, their ears were charmed with the dulcet strains that reached them from the old house that held so much happiness. Ray was a fine performer; both sang well, and their sweet voices floated out beyond the dark walls of night, in merry songs and duets. Desire sat in her part of the domicile by the side of her old man and listened. The house was so high, and the evenings still so cool that she had made a fire, and the pretty leaping flames in the background, the two delighted old ebony faces, the youth and the maiden in the soft rays of the candlelight at the piano at the other end of the room, made a picture worthy of perpetuation upon canvas.

And so the time passed, and day followed day. Sometimes Ray read as they sat together on that grand piazza, a soft rose haze upon the wonderful vista of fields and meadows and farms, blooming plains and swart, shadow-covered hills; distant villages clustered like blossoms of white amidst the deep green of southern verdure. On one occasion he was reviewing some of her lessons. She, more mindful of the view before them, and a little weary, answered wide of the mark, and then, with evident mortification, threw down her book like a tired child.

"The fact is, Ray, I don't know anything," she said, with a choking sigh, and, turning, entered the room. Dee was out planting with her "ole man." "I wish there were no books of that sort," she added, petulantly. "I shall never learn anything."

Ray had followed her and was laughing.

"Why not avail yourself of the services of the new teacher?" he asked.

Eve turned upon him like a whirlwind, her blue eyes flashing.

"What do you know about the new teacher?" she asked.

"Nothing at all. Dee told me there was one at the Braddock's."

"I wouldn't look at her—speak to her," exclaimed Eve, vehemently, "much less study with her. Don't laugh—you exasperate me," and so saying, she seated herself moodily.

"Well, upon my life," cried Ray, a little startled, "you seem to have taken a dislike to the poor girl."

"I don't like her. I don't want to hear her mentioned. I hate the sight of her," continued Eve, explosively. "You thought me so good-natured, I suppose, that I would give my hand to everybody, even to my father's murderers."

"Isn't that rather strong language to apply to this poor little schoolmarm? I'm sure she never carried a gun."

"No; but her father did, or her brother, or her townsman, and that is enough. And as for learning, Ray, I shall never be your equal. I shall grow up in ignorance."

"How much more do you intend to grow, I wonder?" asked Ray. Her eyes sought the little mirror opposite which she stood. Perhaps the vision of yellow rippling hair, blue eyes and pink cheeks softened her mood. She laughed childishly.

"I don't know; I'm nearly up to you, and, oh, Ray," she turned to him, a passionate sob in her voice, "I'm but a silly girl yet. Sometimes I get thinking about all my life, how lonely it has been, how crossed by all the disasters of poverty and war and death. And this poor desolate land that I love with all my soul, see how beautiful it is and how ruined."

"Why, Eve, dear, you have dropped like a star out of the blue depths into sudden darkness—what has come over you?" asked Ray, tenderly.

"It all came on, I suppose, through feeling myself such an utter ignoramus, so—so different from the smart girls you see North. Oh, poor papa, you little thought the 'baby' for whom you cherished such hopes would be little more than baby on her seventeenth birthday."

"Come now, that's a libel," laughed Ray, gazing with his heart in his eyes at the slender graceful figure, clothed all in white, the lovely head encircled by a coronet of braided gold, so lustrous and beautiful was the crown of her tresses, the soft, sweet dove's eyes every glance of which sent a thrill of admiration through his heart. "You know more than many a Southern girl of your own age, still, I am friend enough to tell you there is room for improvement."

"To be sure, I'm quite aware of that," and she turned petulantly away to the window, "but what good will improvement do me in this lonely place? Who is there I can measure wits with? Salome Braddock will only talk of butter and cheese, clever as she is. The young men here care for little but horses, and the girls for dress. I have neither money, relations nor influence, no friends save you and two old slaves. There goes Dee now, God bless her! She is not fit for the work, but she will dig and plant to the last minute to serve me. And then the house—poor papa made a palace of it for my sake, I suppose, and do you wonder I hate the people, who, not being able to harm me, ruined my home! Oh, Ray, I'm so miserable! What is to become of me?" and letting her face fall in her hands, the overwrought nature gave way, and she burst into tears.

"Oh, my Lord God!" sounded shrilly outside, and Desire, coming in through the window, fell all in a heap on the floor, trembling from head to foot. "Oh, my Lord God!" she cried again; then throwing her apron over her head she wept bitterly. What had happened?

CHAPTER XXIV.—NURSE DEE'S SUDDEN TERROR.

FATHER CROW had fallen down in his traces. In other words dropped dead while transferring some choice vines. Dee happened to be with him at the time, as the vines were favorites of hers, and Eve had some special wish in regard to their disposal. The old man had justly been delivering a little homily on the resurrection, a theme he was very fond of illustrating, when all at once he put his black hand to his black head, with the words: "I's feels 's if I's going up some whar, I's lifted an' lifted," and fell in a lifeless heap beside the freshly-dug earth. When the faithful wife found that life was indeed gone, she went wailing and sobbing to the house, hungering for consolation and broke upon the conference of Eve and Raphael as I have stated. All selfish considerations were at an end now. Eve was again her generous, simple, forgetful self. Of course the death and burial, though only of an old worn-out man who had been a slave, put a stop to the preparations in progress for pleasure, for the time at least. The neighbors came in, but it was to the funeral, and staid sombrely to tea, the preparations for which Desire went solemnly on with, as soon as she had put away her decent black bombazine bonnet. That bonnet was a great solace to poor bereaved Desire. To have a real quality black bonnet was a new experience in her simple life, and a real widow's vail.

"Well, now, Miss Eve," she said, when she first tried it on, "I's kind'r hate myself for bein' so pleased wid dis yer, an' he, pore soul, layin' down yer, nebber to rise till de resurrection—de Lord forgive me. Ef he could on'y see it hisself, I know it would tickle his pore old soul; he liked nice tings, an' I'm sure he'd thank you ef he was living, he'd be mighty thankful for the kindness you done showed to his widder."

"Now, there are only two of us," Eve said, in another conversation with Raphael; "and if Dee dies—oh, I dare not think."

"But I do," says Ray, stealing round to her side; "I dare think. Don't you know I am a man now? Look up, Eve," and, as his arm stole round her waist, she lifted her eyes, and met his passionate gaze. Had she ever thought that this might be; if she had, it surely overpowered her now with its suddenness, that simple action. Her golden curls streamed over his shoulder, and, like a little frightened child, she hid her face among the rippling hair.

"Don't you know Eve, child, that I love you? Haven't you guessed it before this? Can you believe that I would let you stay in this forlorn and ruined place any longer than I can help? My precious darling, I have always loved you. When I was only a boy the ardor of a man's love burned in my bosom. I have never even compared you with others, you being seated upon my heart's throne never to be removed. And soon, when I claim you, I want to take you from this narrow field, and show you to the world. Don't shrink, darling, you shall not stay there; it is my ambition to rebuild my father's home—to spend my life in the beautiful South—only I want to disabuse your mind of some errors—there is nothing like travel for that. Am I taking too much for granted? Won't you tell me, Eve, dear, that you will try to love me—you who I know have loved me as a brother ever since we have known each other."

All in a sweet surprise the fair girl listened, conscious at that moment that Raphael was more to her than any brother could be, remembering how she had cherished his image in many an hour of loneliness; that in every trouble her thoughts had gone out to him; that in every joy she had missed the sweetest part of her pleasure if he did not share it with her. She felt scarcely more than a child—conscious of all her defects, of her ignorance, but a woman's resolve sprang up in her brave little heart; she would be worthy of him in time, would spare no pains, would stop at no sacrifice, to become such as he might be proud of. From that hour life was full of new beauty and promise. She had to recall but one thrilling moment if care pressed upon her more heavily than usual.

"Dee," Ray said, lightly, as he left Lewin House to resume his studies, "take good care of my little wife."

"Well, now! The Lord and de blessed angels! You don't mean it, Mars Rafe," exclaimed Dee, her great eyes shining.

"Well, if I know myself, I rather think I do," replied Ray, his fine face lighting into intense beauty, as he caught Eve's shy, protesting glance. "As sure as she's her father's daughter," he added, "she will be my wife."

"Oh, my Lord! Don't say dat!" cried Dee, in a sudden terror. "Oh, merciful Master, what's I talking about?"

"Well, I should think so," said Ray, looking sternly at the old woman, whose black face actually seemed to whiten, as she stood there dumb and aghast. "See, you have frightened the child. "Don't mind it, Eve; I think the woman must be crazy."

"I is, Mars Ray," said the old nurse, humbly, seeming to shrink into herself. "I has these 'luny spells sometimes. I's in a dream like, when de very stranges' visions comes up to me. Lord, don't mind me, Mars Ray. Please don't look upon me dat ar way, or I shall go right crazy for sartin."

"I don't know about leaving Eve with a crazy woman," he said, gravely.

"Hebenly Marster! I's no more crazy dan you! Now, don' go for confusin' my wits; dey's good enuf. Don't ye see that I's all right, ef you'll on'y let me alone?"

"What did make Dee act so strange?" queried Eve, going slowly down the terrace by her lover's side. "Really and truly her manner did frighten me. 'Twas like that of some great tragic actress. My very blood ran cold."

"Oh, nonsense; she only wanted to do something for effect; she's a queer creature and growing old. But let that pass. Eve, you must write to me—not every day, that would be too great a tax, but almost every day."

"Indeed, you'll get tired of my letters," said Eve, trying to smile, the tears brimming her bright lashes.

"You know better." They were moving very, very slowly down the last terraced slope, along which the soldiers had worn a path. "I'd find time for more than one a day. And now, dear love, one last assurance. Nothing that could happen would change your love for me?"

"Nothing—nothing," she answers, solemnly, standing there in the white moonlight, the pillars, portico, terraces, mutilated statues and neglected fountains shining with a clear, white pallor, even the roses and the full clusters of untrained geraniums showing their distinctive coloring and tinting.

"Think; are you sure? Is there nothing?"

"Not even death!" she answers, more tremulously than before.

"Don't cry, dear; we mustn't part that way." He snatches a kiss from her pale lips knowing that salt tears are crowding into his own eyes. "I shall write very, very often, and send you books very, very often, and think of you—without ceasing. Now go back while I stand here and watch."

With a mighty effort she turns from him, but he runs after her, catches her once again in his arms, whispers in her ear: then, bidding her fly, he seats himself upon the step and does not look, only listens.

Dee stands where they left her, folding her smoothly ironed white apron into a hundred creases.

"My Hebenly Father!" she mutters to herself, watching the white figure coming, "what made he say dat? 'Clar ef it wasn't like de Day o' Judgment, when all de sins ob de world 'll be revealed. Ef I hadn't almost done clean forgit. Lord have marcy upon me; don't let de debil git my soul! Oh, Lord, wha' did Crow die for? I's all alone now."

Interview with General Myer.

Germany Adopting Our Maps.

THE INNER LIFE OF THE SIGNAL SERVICE.

THE NAVIES OF THE WORLD ACTING AS FLOATING STATIONS.

THE SOLAR SYSTEM TO BE APPROACHED NEXT.

I FOUND General Myer seated at his desk at the Bureau of the United States Signal Service, Washington, and surrounded by all the delicate and mysterious insignia of his wondrous office. "Old Probabilities," as he has been facetiously styled, is every inch a soldier. He graduated at Geneva College at the age of 19, and, after professional studies, entered the army in 1854. His introduction to the Signal Service dates from 1858, when he was assigned to special duty therein, achieving promotion to the head of the service, as then organized, two years later.

He is tall, erect, alert, with the air of command in every look and gesture. He is a sharp disciplinarian, but quick to discern and recognize merit. Possessing a large fortune, surrounded by every evidence of culture and refinement, with æsthetic tastes and tendencies, hedged in by temptations to a life of indolence and ease, he applies himself with unceasing industry and vehement energy to the work assigned him, finding in the outcome of his toil perfect compensation for all losses of physical comfort. Under an Act of Congress, approved in February, 1870, General Myer was charged with the special duties of the observation and giving notice, by telegraph and signals, of the approach and force of storms on the seacoast, and northern lakes, at the military posts in the interior, and at other points in the States and Territories. Addressing himself with genuine enthusiasm to the work assigned him, and foreseeing, apparently, results of which the average mind had no conception, he at once organized the meteorological division of the signal office on an efficient basis. By a subsequent Act he was charged with the special duties of telegraphing, etc., being authorized to establish signal stations at lighthouses, and at such of the life-saving stations as are suitable for the purpose, and to connect these stations by telegraph with such points as may be necessary.

The building in which General Myer and his able staff are located, in Washington, actually bristles with meteorological insignia, the roof being a very grove of cups, and balls, and flags, and mirrors, and telegraph wires and barometers, and fifty other omens. Wires from the four times four corners of the earth converge at this point, and, not content with the results obtainable by a single roof, the General has compelled the roofs of his immediate neighbors to pay tribute in the form of accommodation for the numerous wind, water and weather gauges, the vigilant study of which enables him to warn those who would go down to the sea in ships, and those who would make pilgrimage by land.

"A hundred, nay a thousand, columns of your paper could not exhaust the subject of the Signal Service," observed the General, after we had exchanged conventional greetings. "It embraces so wide a field with so minute a detail. However, let us begin at the beginning, and we'll see if we cannot give you some of the results. The officers and men are instructed for the different branches of the service at a signal-school of instruction at Fort Whipple, right on the other side of the Potomac, about three miles from here. The term of enlistment is for five years, and the service is open to any American citizen of good character, who can face the rigid tests of the preliminary examination. The course of instruction includes the use of meteorological instruments, the modes of taking observations, and the forms and duties required at observation-stations, and for the display of storm-signals. The men are also taught telegraphy, and are drilled with arms and in the usual duties of soldiers—the design being to qualify them for any possible exigency that may arise. Obviously, a knowledge of mere meteorology would be insufficient for an observer stationed on the Western plains, surrounded by hostile Indians, where he is exposed to constant peril of attack. And it is essential that he should know how to use firearms, and also how to summon help by the use of the telegraph if the danger is urgent. All enlisted men, before leaving Fort Whipple, are also drilled in the manœuvring of field telegraphic trains, the rapid erection of telegraphic lines, and the management of all the apparatus habitually used by the corps in the field."

"What is the average number of men being trained at Fort Whipple?"

"Fifty."

"Have you many applications for admission into the corps?"

"About twelve hundred; but we have no vacancy."

"How many men have you at the Central Office?"

"One hundred."

"Do you drill them?"

"Yes; there is a semi-monthly drill. They don't much like drilling."

"Do you get good men invariably?"

"That is our strongest point. We get the most earnest thinkers and the best men in the world."

"What is the strength of the force, General?"

"The Signal Service, as now organized, consists of 18 commissioned officers, 150 sergeants, 30 corporals and 200 privates. This force has the management of 300 stations, extending from the Dominion of Canada to the Rio Grande, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean. Of these stations, 143 take meteorological observations; 24 are known as sunset stations, 11 as display stations, 24 as special river stations, 12 as commercial stations, and 3 as printing stations. Telegraphic and mail reports are also received from four stations in the West Indies, and 19 in Canada."

"How often do the men report, General?"

"At stations furnishing telegraphic reports, the men are required to furnish tri-daily on each day, the results of observations made at three fixed hours, and embracing in each case the readings of the barometer, the thermometer, the velocity and direction of the wind, the rain gauge, the relative humidity, the character, quantity and movement of upper and lower clouds, and the condition of the weather. These observations are taken at such hours at the different stations as to secure absolute simultaneity — allowance being made for the differences between the fixed times, 7:35 A. M., 4:35 P. M. and 11 P. M., and the local time at the different stations. At the Meteorological Congress held at Rome in April last, arrangements have been made for simultaneous observations all over the world at 6 P. M., Washington time. The chiefs of the Meteorological Departments on the globe send in reports of observations by mail twice a month. Two thousand reports come in daily. Two hundred reports are handled in thirty-five minutes. All navies now take a simultaneous observation on shipboard. These floating stations will help the breaks on the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. This system only commenced on the 1st of November last."

"Do you take other observations?"

"Yes; we take three, at 7 A. M., 2 P. M., and 9 P. M., local time, and a seventh and special observation is taken and recorded at noon each day. When such instrumental changes are noted at this observation as to cause anxiety, the fact is at once telegraphed to the central office at Washington. An eighth observation is taken at the exact hour of sunset at each station, and this, embracing the appearance of the western sky, the direction of the wind, the amount of cloudiness, the readings of the barometer, thermometer, and hygrometer, and amount of rainfall since the last preceding report, is communicated here with the midnight report. So perfect is the description, and so trustworthy the work of the force, that the reports from the stations, covering the whole expanse of the continent, are frequently concentrated at the central office at Washington in the space of forty minutes."

"What is the highest rate at which the traveling of wind has been registered?"

"One hundred and ninety five miles. In the cyclone of the 18th of August last we measured up to 138 miles, but the cups blew away. At Cape Lookout, North Carolina, 1,100 miles of wind was registered in one day. It is upon the data accumulated at the central office that the daily deductions, or weather forecasts, and the especial deductions, in pursuance of which orders are issued for the display of cautionary signals, are based."

"I assume that we get the result of the tri-daily synopsis in the papers each morning, General?"

"You do. The tri-daily synopsis show the meteoric conditions existing over and near the territory of the United States for each period of twenty-four hours immediately preceding the publication of the report. The indications or probabilities foreshadow the changes which seem to be suggested as probable by a study of the charts, in connection with the meteorological rules and generalizations which experience has more or less established."

"The work of preparing the report must be very elaborate?"

"Eight charts exhibiting the data of the observation reports, as to the barometric pressure, relative humidities, cloud conditions, and dew point variations, etc., are draughted and examined before, and are essential to each official announcement. The statements de-official announcement. The statements designed for publication, issued thrice daily, are telegraphed at the moment of their issue to the principal cities, and reach, I am led to believe, fully one-third of the population of the entire country."

"What per centage of accuracy do your forecasts yield?"

"Over ninety per cent. The danger signal of the service is not, indeed, infallible, but it is seldom disregarded; and when it is, the consequences are not unfrequently disastrous."

"Did not the Huron disregard the danger signal?"

"With a strange perversity she ignored the signal at Norfolk."

"The Metropolis also?"

"Yes. The vessel that goes to sea in the face of our danger signal braves possible disaster."

"How many miles of telegraph-wire does the service operate, General?"

"We operate five thousand in the wildest regions of the American continent, through Texas and Dakota and Washington Territory. We have 1,300 miles alone in Texas, and the whole 5,000 miles have been built by ourselves."

"What is the pay of the men?"

"About $75 a month, including commutations of various kinds. Every official is a member of the United States Army."

"Do you hope to touch the solar system, General?"

"We do, and Pike's Peak, which is three miles high, would make a good post for solar observations. I will now," added the General, "ask Captain Howgate to take charge of you."

In Captain Howgate I encountered an official of the most radiant intelligence, the most winning courtesy, and the most retiring modesty. Speak of himself? No. Of his scientific researches? No. Of his Arctic experiences? No. He would speak of the Signal Service, a service to which he seems utterly devoted.

Ascending to the topmost story, we entered the Instrument Room, a long apartment, partly divided by an arch. The very atmosphere breathed of brain-softening calculations. I was confronted by an anemograph, which registers the wind continually; by a rain gauge worked by electricity, and so delicate in its operations that it records the 1-400th of an inch; by barometers registering the pressure of the air, showing a change of pressure equal to 1-4000th of an inch of mercury; by a barometer registering its changes by electricity, and enabling a barometer in San Francisco to register in New York; by a thermometer also worked by electricity, giving a continuous registration, and showing all the fluctuations of the temperature of the air; by Father Secci's meteorograph; and by Dr. Robinson's anemometer, which is gradually displacing all others on account of its simplicity and accuracy. Here I learned that the cups travel at one-third the velocity of the wind, and that 500 revolutions of a cup registers a mile of wind. In the room is a glass-case, showing in model the different clouds (in wool), their relative altitudes, and the manner in which they are formed.

"Upper currents of air," quoth my cicerone, "have been known to carry ashes sent up by volcanos 1,500 miles, and to drop them after six weeks."

In this case the manner in which the fogs of Newfoundland are formed is shown. In this room are scientific instruments of every sort, shape, size and description, each a marvel in its way, and each doing its marvelous work in solemn silence.

Quitting this apartment, we turned into the Photograph Room, wherein is photographed the action of the barometer and other omeners, and from thence to a wooden shed, called the Instrument Shelter. Here are thermometers, showing the minimum and maximum temperature for the twenty-four hours. Here are instruments so delicate that the heat of the body of the person approaching them affects them. The instruments are set at 11 P. M. A thermometer is set by swinging it round and round at full force, and it is tested from boiling water to melting ice, an error of the 1,000th part of an inch being allowed. We descended to the Report Room, where we found grave, bright-eyed men, straight-backed men, silently engaged in perusing reports, of which 2,000 come in daily. The men are always on duty, the reliefs being 8 to 4, 4 to 11, and 11 to 8; sixteen are on duty during the day and six at night.

From the Report Room we entered the Fact Room, and it is in this apartment that the figures are made up for presentation to the public. The Study Room came next. Six men, with an officer, work here. The officer comes on duty at 11 P. M., and remains till 1:30 A. M.; the men being relieved so as to come on duty twice in the twenty-four hours. The principal maps are made up in this apartment. No. 1. Showing details of weather over the United States. No. 2. Abnormal change of barometer in United States. No. 3. Actual changes. No. 4. Shows abnormal change of temperature. No. 5. Actual changes. No. 6. is a colored map.

At 1 A. M. the prediction goes to the country. Everything has to be charted and acted on in fifteen minutes. The officer has to predict the weather in a brief quarter of an hour. While the operation of preparing the prediction is taking place, a "translator," who stands at a desk, and who has 4,000 of the 8,000 cipher words by heart, reads the electric messages. This room is the very heart of the Signal Service. It is impossible in the space of this article to do more than to glance at each department in this storehouse of Science; to attempt aught else would lead to confusion worse confounded. Any one room is in itself a study, and in itself worthy a special article. The Signal Service is one of the supreme triumphs of our century, and a subject of most justifiable pride to the country. As I parted with General Myer and Captain Howgate, a letter was received from Germany asking for the forms of the Signal Service maps, with a view to adopting the modus operandi of "Old Probabilities."

Sport in Norway.

NORWAY must be a sort of sportsman's paradise. Among the game which his gun can bring down are the tydder, roer, ryper and jerper, which are sufficiently outlandish to English ears. The tydder is the bird known of old in Scotland by the name of capercailzie. The cock is a noble bird, of the size of a turkey-cock, with a bill and claws of great strength. The roer is the female, and in size, plumage and appearance so different from the male that it has received a different name. The ryper is the Scottish ptarmigan, but larger and better clothed. The jerper is a delicate bird for the table, of the grouse species, and about the size of a full-grown pigeon. Woodcocks are also abundant and of delicious flavor.

PERSONAL GOSSIP.

THE Rev. Ballard Thompson, late pastor of the First Presbyterian Church at Nashville, is going to Brazil as a missionary.

PROFESSOR DARWIN has received from the Turin Academy of Science a prize of 12,000 lire for his discoveries in the physiology of plants.

THE new Senator (Gorman) of Maryland, used to be president of the National Base-Ball Club of Washington, and is renowned as a good "catcher."

PROFESSOR DAVID DUNCAN, of Spartanburg, S. C., has presented his valuable classical library of 1,200 volumes to Woodford College, at that place.

THE Committee on Elections of Harvard College have presented a report favorable to the eligibility of the Rev. Dr. Bellows for membership in the board.

THE late William Ripley, of Columbus, Ohio, left $75,000 to Wesleyan University at Middletown, Conn., to sustain a chair to be called the Ripley professorship.

MISS TH. PETURSSEN, a daughter of the bishop of Reykjavik, Iceland, has made an ascent of the great volcano Hecla, for the purpose of getting geological observations.

IT is said that the Republicans who desire the nomination of Senator Edmunds to be Associate Justice of the Supreme Court are planning to secure the present retirement of Judge Hunt on full pay.

THE Wittelsbachers, who trace their ancestry to Duke Arnold, about 1180, and said to be the oldest reigning dynasty in Europe, intend to celebrate their seven hundredth anniversary this year.

M. TURGENEF has been obliged to give up his project of passing the Winter in Russia for the purpose of studying the state of affairs there; he received an intimation from high quarters that he had better not.

THE Emperor William himself went about Berlin before Christmas buying presents for his trusted friends and servants. Day after day his carriage stood waiting for him before the fashionable shops in which his elderly Majesty was rummaging.

MRS. ANNA OLDHAM COOK, whose husband sacrificed his life last year in seeking to save the fever-stricken people of Hickman, Ky., has been elected State Librarian by the Kentucky Legislature. The widow of a deceased Confederate soldier is State Librarian in Tennessee.

THE senior peer of the British realm is Lord Kilmorey, an Irish peer, aged ninety-two, about the gayest viveur of his day. He is grandfather of Lord Newry, so well known in the theatrical world. Lord Kilmorey has large estates in England and in the North of Ireland, but never goes near either of them. He lives near London.

MISS ROGERS, a cousin of Richard Cobden, is the prodigy in the last examinations at Oxford University, England. She outstripped all the other students in Greek and Latin. Her knowledge in other branches is quite as wonderful. After passing her examinations she was at once appointed lecturer in Somerville Hall, one of the Oxford buildings for women students.

WILKIE COLLINS, the English novelist, is fifty-five years old, and his father was a landscape painter of considerable fame, who named his son Wilkie, after the Scotch artist. Young Collins studied law. His first novel was written when he was twenty-six years old. He wrote "The Woman in White" when he was thirty-six. He is a hard and painstaking writer.

THE Duke of Devonshire graduated at Cambridge when twenty-one, as second wrangler, thus only missing by one place the very highest honor the University can bestow, and Smith's prizeman—an honor only second to first wrangler, and generally going with it—and the same year was returned as one of the representatives in Parliament of the University, an honor without a parallel in a man of his years.

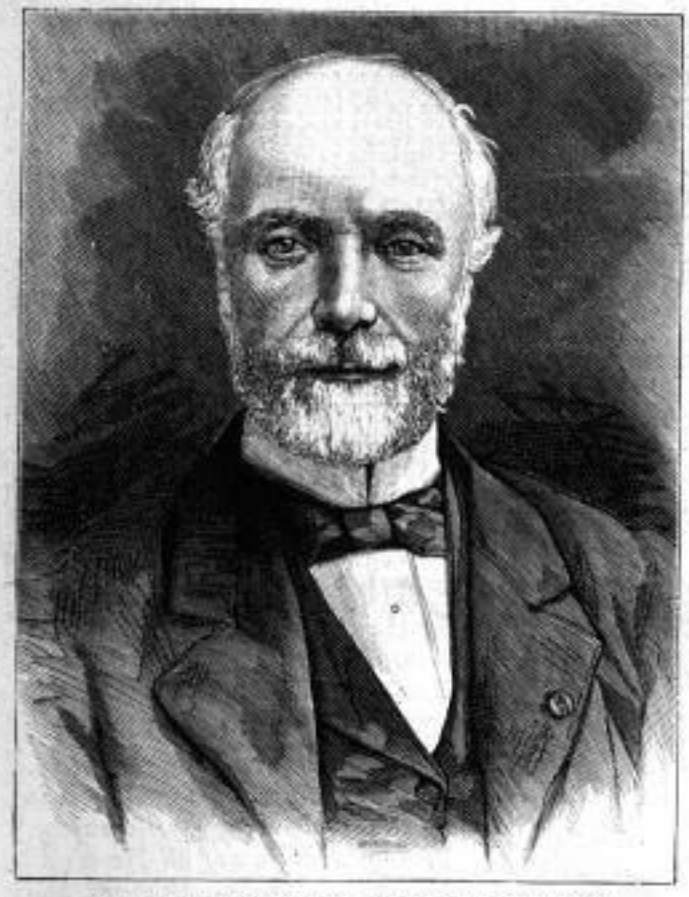
MRS. J. J. ASTOR has sent out recently from the office of the Children's Aid Society a "New Year party" of 100 homeless children to homes in the West and South, at an expense of $1,500. This makes, during seven years, a total number of 677 homeless children whom this generous friend of the poor has placed in homes, mainly in the West, at an expense of $9,750. Many of these lads have now grown up, having farms of their own and doing well in the world.

THE cable announces the death of Frederic Christian, Duke of Schleswig-Holstein, in the fifty-first year of his age. During the long European debate over the Schleswig-Holstein question the late Duke, as Prince Frederic, took an active part in maintaining the rights of his House. His father finally renounced them in his favor. He was a Bavarian major-general, and by his wife, a princess of Hohenlohe, he leaves four daughters and one son, the latter, Ernest, now Duke of Schleswig-Holstein, being in his seventeenth year.

ONE of the life-saving stations on the California coast has been officially named the Maggie Geddes. This is a recognition of the bravery of Maggie Geddes of San Antonio. She is only nine years old. Seeing a young playmate fall down a high embankment into a millrace, she instantly jumped after her. The water was deep, and ran swiftly towards a large wheel; but Maggie was a good swimmer, and by a desperate struggle got ashore with her playmate. Such coolness and courage were deemed worthy of special honor.

QUEEN VICTORIA has placed in her pew at Whippingham Church a memorial medallion of the late Princess Alice, bearing this affectionate inscription: "To the dear memory of Alice Maud Mary, Princess of Great Britain and Ireland, Grand Duchess of Hesse, who departed this life in her thirty sixth year, on the anniversary of her beloved father's death, December 14th, 1878. 'Blessed are the pure in heart; for they shall see God.'—St. Matthew v., 8. This monument is placed by her sorrowing mother, Queen Victoria. 1879."

MR. GEORGE H. STUART, the Philadelphia philanthropist and merchant prince, whose business embarrassment has been reported, will retire altogether from business. Among the articles in his Philadelphia office are several large chests containing letters of the United States Christian Commission, and a box full of watches and valuables, which agents of this commission found upon the bodies of dead soldiers on the battle-field, but which, though advertised and otherwise brought within the reach of claimants, had any existed, could never find owners.



PRUSSIAN generals seem to enjoy a rare longevity. Without reckoning Marshals von Moltke and Von Roon, there is found in the higher grades of the army a body of veterans who began their military careers three-quarters of a century ago. General von Sierstorpheden, born in 1785, entered the service in 1797, and, after having risen through all the intermediate grades in the long wars which marked the beginning of this century, was created a major general in 1819. On the first of November last he celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of his elevation to that dignity. To-day, at the green old age of ninety-five, this veteran displays an almost youthful vigor.

THE LAST SUBJECT ACCEPTED FOR ILLUSTRATION BY MR. FRANK LESLIE—MORNING SERVICE IN THE HOUSE OF THE HOLY COMFORTER, NEW YORK CITY.—DRAWN BY MISS GEORGIE DAVIS.

Digitized by Google

M. DE FREYCINET, NEW PRIME MINISTER OF FRANCE.

A FREE HOME FOR INCURABLES.

THE HOUSE OF THE HOLY COMFORTER, NEW YORK CITY.

A SMALL and unpretentious dwelling-house in Twenty-third Street was thrown open last September as a Free Home to that most to be pitied class of our population known as incurables. A Sister of the Episcopal Church opened the Home, with no other capital or earnest of help than the sanction of the Bishop and some clergymen, one month's rent in advance, and her faith in the hearty co-operation of the generous public of New York. Her plan was to afford a quiet and permanent asylum to that large class of incurable sufferers whose social status raises them above the average Ward's Island patient, but whose circumstances will not permit them to pay the weekly board charged by the institution at Fordham; and to combine with this a training-school for servants, where girls of from eight to fourteen years might be received and instructed in housework, besides being subjected to the wholesome influence of good moral discipline and religious training. So far the Sister's work has been well and successfully carried on.

The Home is small, but it shelters already nineteen inmates, the patients comprising women of all ages from eighty years to nineteen. Women crippled with rheumatism, helpless from paralysis, and fading away in the slow stages of consumption, have their quiet refuge here from all those ills and discomforts and terrors of poverty which press so heavily on the sick. The wards, though necessarily small, are bright and sunny, and, in spite of their plain appointments, have a very cheerful and home-like air, while the stillness and quiet and order of the place are in themselves like soothing medicine. The kind little Sister who started and organized the work is, of course, the presiding spirit, and, in spite of the cares and anxieties on her hands and heart, seems as cheerful and sunny as the rooms.

On the parlor floor is the ward devoted to the most helpless patients, and, separated from it by folding-doors, is the little chapel where week-day and Sunday services are held, and where the solemn burial service of the church is read over those who have passed away. One has already occurred in the Home, since its opening in September. The windows are covered and darkened with a heavy curtain, and the simple furnishing of the room consists of the altar and reading-desk, which, when we visited the Home, had just been dressed with their Christmas garlands of green. The morning and evening prayers of the church are daily read by the Sister, while the Sunday services—always including the Holy Communion—are conducted by Doctor Houghton, the spiritual adviser of the Home. Apart from its deeper significance, no more touching sight could well be imagined than one of these services, when the doors are thrown open and the darkened chapel forms a background to the long, sunny ward, crowded with those who are able to come downstairs to prayers, and those who join in them while they lie upon their beds of pain.

The work of the wards is done chiefly by the six young girls now in training in the Home. A class for instruction in dress-making and plain sewing has been formed, and numbers thirty pupils, and free dinners are given three days in the week to fifteen outside patients. Thus the little Home stretches its helping hand to sixty-seven needy persons, and, to do this, its annual expenses must amount to four thousand dollars. It is earnestly hoped by the Sister, not only that this sum will be contributed from year to year by the thoughtful and charitable, but that larger means will be furnished her to extend the good work, and that increased accommodations may, before long, be provided for the many patients who cannot be received in the present building. It is certain that the charity need only be more widely known to insure its hearty and sufficient support.

M. DE FREYCINET,

HEAD OF THE NEW FRENCH MINISTRY.

TALL, thin, pale, with sharp, almost emaciated features, quick in his movements, striking in mien, sober in words, precise and deliberate in all he does—such is physically the future President of the Council to whom the President of the French Republic committed the formation of a new Ministry. For in France, as in England, a parliamentary defeat requires a change of Cabinet. The President cannot, as with us, continue a Ministry whose policy the legislative chambers condemn.

M. de Freycinet is a distinguished engineer, accustomed to national affairs, an eminent organizer, and, above all, a quick, practical business man, used to command.

His political career corresponds with his character. Business drew him into public affairs during the terrible war of 1870-71. The transition was sudden. From directing the transportation of goods, he assumed that of armies and war material, developing rare administrative powers.

In Parliament he has acquired a great authority, which has stood the test of strong opposition. There is every evidence that the Cabinet formed by him will be thoroughly practical, active and energetic, not swayed by vague ideas or Utopian plans. M. de Freycinet is Minister of Foreign Affairs; Lepere, Minister of the Interior; General Farre, Minister of War; and Admiral Jauréguiberry, Minister of Marine. M. Waddington declined the English Embassy.

HON. JAMES A. GARFIELD.

HON. JAMES A. GARFIELD, at present member of Congress from the Nineteenth Ohio District, was elected United States Senator on January 13th, to succeed Hon. Allen G. Thurman, whose term expires on March 3d, 1881. He is a native of Orange, Cuyahoga County, Ohio, and was forty-eight years old last November. In 1856 he graduated from William's College, Mass., and immediately after entered upon the study of law, completing the usual course, and in due season engaging in its practice. He was a member of the State Senate of Ohio in 1859-60, and laid down his newly-acquired political honors early in 1861 to accept the commission of Colonel of the Forty-second Ohio Volunteers, with which regiment he entered the Union Army. In January, 1862, he was promoted to the rank of Brigadier-General, and soon after was appointed Chief of Staff of the Army of the Cumberland. In the following year he was promoted to the rank of a Major-General.

He first took his seat in Congress in 1862, and has been a prominent member of the House ever since, serving at times upon the committees on Military Affairs, Ways and Means, Banking and Currency, Appropriations and Rules. He was one of the House members of the Electoral Commission appointed to adjudicate upon the disputed points in the Presidential election of November, 1876.

His election as United States Senator has given much satisfaction throughout his State, and was the occasion for hearty congratulation from his fellow-Congressmen, irrespective of party. It is needless to remark that the new Senator is known as a Republican of the stanchest kind.

SLEIGHING ON CENTRAL AVENUE.

THE sleigh-bells ring cheerily out on the frosty air, and Central Avenue is black with fast trotters and crack teams, and sleighs of every sort, shape, size and description that cut merrily over the glistening snow. The "hi, hi, hi" of the knowing ones as they urge their willing horses onwards has music in it. The crackle of the hard snow has music in it. Everybody is joyous in the keen bracing atmosphere, and diamonds hang upon mustaches and beards—diamonds presented to his faithful subjects by King Frost. What a sight is Central Avenue! What a wealth of horseflesh, of vehicles, of costly furs, sables worth a Jew's ransom; sealskins fit for the Princess of Trebizonde; buffalo robes, possum rugs, bearskin aprons. Now the railway king flashes past, pressed closely by an outsider. Now a pair of spanking horses, driven at their utmost stretch and as they used to be at the Olympian games, disappear almost ere they come into sight. Now a trim little cob attached to a trim little sleigh scoots in and out, always escaping by the breadth of a five-cent piece. Blacks, grays, chestnuts, roans, all in superb condition, all en rapport with the musical jangling of their bells, come and go and gladden the evening air. Some sorry nags, too, may be counted in the throng, Roman nosed and, like Mr. Winkle's famous steed, displaying great symmetry of bone—lean starvelings who for the nonce feel elevated by the frost and the sleigh-bells. Gabe Case's celebrated hostelry is alive with befurred, blue-nosed, red-cheeked, watery-eyed men, who demand hot Tom-and-Jerry in frozen voices. Here are the merits of the teams discussed as the grateful beverage goes down, and here wagers are riveted that will make the spin home "a caution." Out again into the frosty evening, where the good steeds champ their bits and the bells tinkle melodiously, and, with smacking of lips and great readjusting of wraps, the sleighs turn towards Gotham. Away! and off they go at a pace that seems fleet as the wind, past cheery pedestrians who give them a cheery "hi," past horses that have given out, past teams lying in wait who endeavor in vain to pick up, past houses like a flash, past everything like the arrow from the bow—and until the city is reached, when the jog-trot becomes the order of the day. Bravo, King Frost, your majesty's carnival means health and diversion!

COST OF LARGE STRIKES.

VARIOUS estimates have been hazarded with regard to the actual cost in money, and losses sustained in wages, in these gigantic struggles. Supposing that the very highest of such estimates are not exaggerations, have not the men some kind of set-off for all this expenditure? In a very few cases they may not, but in the majority they have. Take, for example, the builders' strike and lockout in London, in 1859. It is said that about 24,000 men were thrown out of work in the first instance; of these certainly not one-half ever applied for any relief; the highest number ever paid strike-pay was 9,812; and these diminished so rapidly, that at the end of the seventh week 5,779 only were on the funds. The whole of the other men must therefore have obtained employment elsewhere. At that time the total number of artisans and laborers interested in the result of the contest was between 40,000 and 50,000 men. So that while from 10,000 to 6,000 were engaged in the struggle, at least five times that number expected to be recipients of the benefit, if a victory was scored. After spending upwards of £50,000, besides the loss in wages, the men were compelled to yield; but in reality they won the Saturday half-holiday, and have enjoyed it ever since. At this moment not fewer than 100,000 workmen cease work at twelve o'clock on Saturdays who but for that prolonged contest might still be working until four o'clock, at even less pay than they now receive. The value in money of three hours per week for eighteen years, by the whole of the building operatives in London, is almost incalculable. At the lowest computation it represents a net gain to them of £562,500 a year, if not in money, at least in money's worth.

BIBLIOGRAPHY OF 1879.

HISTORICAL works lead the way everywhere in importance. Belgium makes, as usual, a good showing. Bohemia and Denmark exhibits increased activity. France, strong in historical research, has produced little of value in philosophy. A furor for reprints of eighteenth-century poetry and fiction is noted as a curious phase of taste. There are but three or four novels of note, and Victor Hugo's "Fitil Suprême" is the only important poem. Germany keeps at her level of earnestness and production in all branches, an advance being noted in the comic drama. Germany here, by the way, includes Austria and other German-speaking nations. A reactionary impulse against the fashionable prest-mistic atheism in poetry is observed. Greece has been all but barren. Holland reports fiction of low life and poetry as in fair production. Hungary has a new poem by her greatest poet, John Arany. There is some progress in philology and novels. Italy has principally turned back to examine her literary history; fiction is low; there are a few historical works of interest. Poland has been active in her own history, literary and national; poetry is poor; the drama mostly translations of French demi-monde pieces; the novelists are active. Spain shows genuine improvement in the general range of literature. Sweden has produced biographies, novels and poetry of a not very high order; the advent of Zolaism is noted in fiction.

SILK-GROWING IN CALIFORNIA.

SOME twelve years ago mulberry-trees were extensively planted in California. The State undertook an experiment near Davisville, and planted out a large number. In Los Angeles County many private individuals entered into the business. The mulberry-trees grew and prospered, but there was a complete failure in taking care of the silkworms. One reason which may be assigned for this is that it is practically impossible for California in the present condition of society to compete with China, Japan and Italy in the care and culture of these valuable insects. The most successful experiments in sericulture in California have been made in Calaveras and Placer Counties. But these were on a small scale, and therefore did not enter largely into any record of State industries. In those countries from which raw silk is imported, women and children are employed in attending to the silkworms, but the wages are so small as to preclude the possibility of American families ever entering into competition with them.

A FORTRESS WITH A HISTORY.

ONE of the most interesting buildings in France is Pierrefonds, the finest example of a French fortress of the beginning of the fifteenth century. In 1635 its Governor, having sided with the nobles, was besieged by the troops of Louis XIII., who breached the walls with cannon, and in the following year it was blown up by Richelieu's orders, in accordance with his plan of destroying the fortresses of disaffected nobles, and remained a ruin until 1858, when Napoleon directed Viollet-le-Duc to begin its restoration, wishing it to be a specimen of the military art of the Middle Ages, and of the abode of a great feudal lord. About $1,000,000 was spent on it, and the greater part of the restoration was done before the late war; for M. Viollet-le-Duc, foreseeing events, hastened on the work. It is a noble pile, and will now probably be at the service of the president.

The Snow in Paris.

SINCE the heavy fall of snow which took place in Paris in the beginning of December, an average number of 17,256 workmen, with 3,916 wagons and carts and 7,500 horses, have been daily employed in clearing the streets. Despite, however, the large number of laborers engaged, the work has proceeded but slowly. It is calculated that during the storms on December 6th and 8th, seven and a half million cubic metres of snow fell in Paris, while during the sixteen days between the last downfall and Christmas Day only 670,000 cubic metres could be carried away. The most rapid way of getting rid of the snow was found to be to melt it by scattering salt over it; but this method was also found to be too costly to be employed except along the tramways and some of the most frequented thoroughfares. A vast number of other expedients were suggested, and several were tried, but none proved practicable.

What Chewing-gum is Made of.

WE have it upon common report that chewing-gum is a substance well known to the youthful part of the community. The qualities which it possesses at the time that it comes from the confectionery are all familiar to the youngest of us. It certainly seems a very attractive edible. The reason for this is not so hard to find. Think how much eating there is in it in proportion to actual weight and cash value. But there is more in chewing-gum than is dreamed of even in juvenile philosophy. One can easily comprehend the main ingredients of candy, but who, without being told, would suspect that chewing-gum is often only a refined product of petroleum? The time was when the fragrant spruce furnished the most common material for the purpose. But this is no longer the case. The reader familiar with the process of refining coal-oil is aware that the thick, brown liquid which comes from the earth, at one stage of its manufacture is strained through heavy linen cloths. The residuum left after this operation is a dirty, brownish yellow wax, that smells abominable. That unpromising substance, melted, bleached, deodorized, and prepared for commerce, appears in masses that weigh about one hundred pounds, resembling oblong blocks of clouded ice. It has no odor, and no taste except what belongs to any wax in its purest state. It may be used for many purposes, but it is not necessary to describe them now. The manufacturer of chewing-gum purchases these blocks ready made to his hand, and at once melts them down. To the hundred pounds of wax he adds about thirty pounds of sugar, and gives the mixture a flavor by the use of some essential oil, as lemon or vanilla, and, perhaps, adds some coloring matter. The melted mass is poured out upon a clean marble slab and cut in the various shapes known to masticators.

The youthful epicure rarely becomes so luxurious as to demand balsam of tolu, but if he does, the manufacturer is ready for him. This resin, which is obtained from South America, is at first in an almost fluid condition. It is the product of a tree known as—now hold your jaw, for the name is worse than a whole box of chewing-gum—myrospermum toluiferum. This balsam is boiled by the manufacturer until finally it is brought to such a consistency that it can be run through rollers. It comes out in the shape of a little slender rod, of a brownish-yellow color, which is cut into pieces, each about two or two and a half inches long. The balsam may sometimes be mixed with a less costly wax, since its flavor is very marked.

The balsam from the "chicle"-tree, from Central America, is used in making what is known as snapping-gum. It is very ductile when worked and moistened, and the process of making is similar to that of pulling taffy. The original gum exudes from the tree and forms in a mass sometimes several pounds in weight. Even in this natural state it would be a very satisfactory substance to keep the teeth at work. It cannot be worn out.

SALT RHEUM

On Face, Head and Parts of Body. Head covered with Scabs and Sores.

Messrs. WEEKS & POTTER.—I commenced to use your Cuticura last July. Have only used one large and one small box, and one bottle of the Resolvent. My face and head and some parts of my body were almost raw. My head was covered with scabs and sores, and my suffering was fearful.

I had tried everything I had heard of in the East and West. My case was considered a very bad one. One very skillful physician said he would rather not treat it, and some of them think now I am only cured temporarily. I think not, for I have not a particle of Salt Rheum about me, and my case is considered wonderful. My case has been the means of selling a great many of your Cuticura Remedies in this part of the country. Respectfully yours,

MRS. S. E. WHITTLE.

JOHN HOLLAND'S Patent Record GOLD PEN

Patented Oct. 2, 1877.

Is the highest achievement in the manufacture of Gold Pens and the result of experiments for more than twenty years. The "RECORD" Pen is produced by a skillful combination of the two precious and non-corrosive metals: 14 kr. Gold and Platinum, while the ordinary gold pen contains an alloy of copper, reducing its fineness without yielding that elasticity, density and steel like temper which the costly Platinum supplies. The "RECORD" Gold Pen Points are of the best Iridium, (Diamonds,) indestructible with fair treatment, and polished to glass like smoothness.

Steel pen writers have now every objection to gold fairly overcome, and every requirement in a Pen which will endure and not oxidize, squarely met. The "RECORD" Gold Pen is guaranteed to possess Durability, Permanency of Spring and Perfection of Point. Price, $2.50, sold by all Jewelers and Stationers in the United States. KNOW THYSELF.

THE untold miseries that result from indiscretion in early life may be alleviated and cured. Those who doubt this assertion should purchase the new medical work published by the PEABODY MEDICAL INSTITUTE, Boston, entitled THE SCIENCE OF LIFE; or, SELF-PRESERVATION. Exhausted vitality, nervous and physical debility, or vitality impaired by the errors of youth or too close application to business, may be restored and manhood regained.

Two hundredth edition, revised and enlarged, just published. It is a standard medical work, the best in the English language, written by a physician of great experience, to whom was awarded a gold and jeweled medal by the National Medical Association. It contains beautiful and very expensive engravings. Three hundred pages, more than 50 valuable prescriptions for all forms of prevailing disease, the result of many years of extensive and successful practice, either one of which is worth ten times the price of the book. Bound in French cloth; price only $1, sent by mail, postpaid.

The London Lancet says: "No person should be without this valuable book. The author is a noble benefactor."

An illustrated sample sent to all on receipt of 6 cents for postage.

The author refers, by permission, to 308. S. FISHER, president; W. I. P. INGRAHAM, vice-president; W. PAINE, M.D.; C. S. GAUNTT, M.D.; E. J. DOUCET, M.D.; R. H. KLINE, M.D., J. S. HOLCOMB, M.D., N. Frank Leslie's
LADY'S MAGAZINE
—AND—
Gazette of Fashion,
Universally regarded for nearly a quarter of a century as the
FASHION STANDARD OF AMERICA

FULL AND ACCURATE DESCRIPTIONS ARE GIVEN OF THE LATEST PARISIAN STYLES OF LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S COSTUMES.

Beautiful Colored and Plain Fashion Plates
Are imported monthly from Paris,
EXCLUSIVELY FOR THIS MAGAZINE.

"FRANK LESLIE'S LADY'S MAGAZINE for January, 1880, is out, and the lady who is fortunate enough to get a copy will need no further information as to what she shall wear or how it shall be made up. Here you have fashions for the home, visiting, carriage and promenade toilets—children as well as grown people—street dresses and bridal toilets, and everything, to the minutest detail, to make the ladies happy. A large number of short, interesting stories complete the book, which has quite a number of good engravings. The subscription is only $3.50 a year, postpaid, which, considering the character and style of the magazine, makes it the cheapest and best we know of."—The Covenant, Phila., Pa.

"FRANK LESLIE'S LADY'S MAGAZINE needs no special praise at our hands; it speaks for itself, and is a prime favorite in every household where it has ever gained a foothold. Its stories, its poetry, its sketches, its engravings, its fashions—all things about it, in fact—are first-class in their way; and, take it for all in all, we don't know of a lady's magazine in America that excels it, and few that come within cannon-shot of equaling it, in any of the departments we have mentioned. In point of cheapness it outranks them all, quality and quantity considered, its price being only $3.50 a year, postpaid."—Lyons (N. Y.) Republican.

The readers of the LADY'S MAGAZINE have the earliest information of the constant change in Fashions, as its reports appear simultaneously with those in the journals of Paris.

Each Number is Profusely Embellished.

Published on the 15th of every month. Annual subscription, $3.50, postpaid.

THE MAINE EMBROGLIO.

THE embroglio in the executive and legislative organization of the State of Maine seemed for a moment to have reached a solution which might be regarded as final and conclusive. When Governor Garcelon and his council determined to throw out the returns from certain towns and precincts on mere questions of form, they betrayed a disposition to exalt the mere letter of the law over its spirit. It was well known that the people of Maine at the last election had chosen a majority of Republicans to compose the State Legislature. To defeat this will under color of adhering to the letter which kills, and at the sacrifice of the spirit which makes alive, was to incur a grave responsibility not only in the eyes of the citizens of Maine, but in the eyes of the whole American people, who cannot look with composure on the subversion of political and moral right. It was to revert to practices in other States which the sound sense of the nation had condemned.

It seems to be regarded by the advocates and abettors of the so-called "Fusion" Legislature that though on a final scrutiny of the case the merits of the questions at issue would have probably been decided in favor of the Republicans who were elected, but who failed to receive the due official certificates at the hands of the Governor and council, it is at the same time none the less true that the "Fusion" bearers of these certificates had a prima facie right to take their seats in the Legislature. On this theory it is held that the Republicans who claimed to have been fairly elected, and to have been illegally deprived of their certificates, could appear before the Legislature only as contestants after the Legislature had been duly organized by its certificated members.

There might have been some color of truth in this representation if, anterior to the meeting of the Legislature, Governor Garcelon had not submitted to the Supreme Court of Maine a series of questions designed to test the legality of the grounds on which the council had made its award of certificates. On questions formulated by the Governor himself the Supreme Court returned a series of answers which had for their effect to convict the council of error in all the essential rulings by which it had reached its decisions in the premises. It was an inevitable consequence of this action on the part of the Court that the odor of legality was at once transferred to the Republican members who had been unlawfully evicted of their seats, and the members of the "Fusion" Legislature, in attempting to effect an organization on the strength of certificates which had been pronounced invalid by the chief judiciary of the State, were guilty not only of imprudence but of something closely akin to political contumacy. It is no matter of surprise, therefore, that, in pursuance of the opinions already foreshadowed, the Court should have subsequently thrown the ægis of legality over the constituents and organization of the Republican majority in both Houses, although their opinion in that case was not within the range marked out and was really extra-judicial. And just as little is it a matter of surprise that the Republican majority, supported in their claims and pretensions by the Supreme Court, should have proceeded to constitute themselves into the regular Legislature of the State, and to complete the organization of the Executive department by electing a Republican Governor under the forms prescribed by the Constitution of the State when there has been no choice by the people.

The spectacle now presented by the Pine Tree State, with a dual Executive and a dual Legislature, with excited partisans thronging the halls of the State House and trembling from day to day on the brink of anarchy, while a major-general of militia kept the peace, and preserved the public property of the State—this strange and novel spectacle is far from being one which the lover of law and order can contemplate with satisfaction. And yet there is one aspect of the case in which we can find some consolation for the unseemly and untoward exhibition. If recent events in Maine have put a fierce and unnatural strain on our political system, it is some compensation to know that the civil institutions of Maine seem adequate to weather the crisis without precipitating the people into the throes and agitations of a revolutionary struggle.

For days the State of Maine was without an Executive head and without a recognized Legislature; yet the whole body politic of the commonwealth was so instinct with the forces of a conscious political life that the currents of business and of social order moved on as before without shock and without intermission. It is only in communities which have attained to the stage of what Doctor Lieber has called "institutional liberty" that such a phenomenon could have been witnessed. When the political life is congested in the head, and not equally diffused through the entire organism of the State, such a stroke of political paralysis would have carried wreck and ruin through the whole system. But in Maine the presence of a major-general of militia, with only the simulacrum of a military force at his command, proved sufficient to meet the emergency thrust upon the State by a political squabble between its excited partisans contending for supremacy with more of heat than discretion.

It seems to us that Governor Chamberlain, in the difficult position he was called to fill, held the scales evenly between the "Fusionists" and their competitors. It will be gratifying to know that if the quivering balances of law and order have at length been righted and steadied in Maine, they have not been righted or steadied by laying a sword in the balance of one party against the balance held by the other party. If it is through some defects of form that the Republicans have attained to a control of the Legislature and to a possession of the Executive, it is only just to admit that the steps taken have the support of the supreme judiciary, and that the will of the people, as expressed through the ballot-box, has been substantially carried out, though with much more of friction and irregularity than it is pleasant to contemplate.

The case is one where a state of events has arisen of which the possibility was never contemplated by the framers of the State Constitution, and where neither party occupies a perfectly defensible position. It is a case calling for the exercise of the highest political wisdom, and, what is more, of the most thorough honesty.

It is greatly to be hoped that such deplorable conflicts as these, fought over the very palladium of American liberty, may not be drawn into precedent. To poison the ballot-box is to poison the very fountain of the nation's public life. To misread the returns of the ballot-box is to defraud the people of their best guarantee against revolutionary resorts, for the framers of our institutions supposed that they had shut the door against all such resorts when they opened a door for the redress of all grievances through the awards of the electoral urn.

LEAP YEAR.

LEAP YEAR is generally understood to be a necessity which arises from the unfortunate length of the year. Were the year precisely 360 days in length it could be nicely divided into twelve months of thirty days each, but as it consists of 365 days and a residue of certain odd hours, minutes and seconds, it becomes impossible to so divide it. Even if we were to divide it into five months of seventy-three days each, there would still be the exasperating remainder of hours, minutes and seconds, not to mention the fact that such a division would at once ruin the Quarterly Reviews and seriously interfere with the business of the Monthly Magazines. It has always been urged that since the length of the year is regulated by the sun, common decency requires that the moon should be recognized in the arrangement of the months. Thus all nations have agreed in making their months not much longer than the length of time occupied by the moon in revolving around the earth; but how to arrange twelve months in such a way as not to have any odd days and hours at the end of the year is a problem which has never yet been solved in a satisfactory way.

The Egyptians boldly grappled with the matter by making each of the twelve months thirty days in length. They thus at the end of the year, issued the remaining days as a supplement. The fault of this system was that, while it accounted for 365 days, it left the remaining five hours forty-eight minutes and fifty seconds unaccounted for. The result was that after a few years a new day made its mysterious appearance. This created in the popular mind a feeling of great uncertainty. It was felt by the Egyptian public that the year could not be trusted, and that if a new and unexpected day could thus turn up, there was no security that a new month might not suddenly appear and throw the entire business of the kingdom into disorder. The scientific men of the period tried to straighten things by issuing larger and larger supplements, but in time it became evident that the calendar must be reformed.

As every one knows, Julius Cæsar was the first man who invented leap-year. But he, too, made an error. He assumed that the year consisted of 365 days and six hours, which was eleven minutes and ten seconds too much. Of course, this error became more and more manifest as time went on, and when Pope Gregory XIII. made the first reformation of the calendar it was thought wise to drop no less than ten days from this particular year before taking a fresh start. This was perhaps necessary, but it was hard for the children whose birthdays came within the dropped days, whereby they lost all birthday parties and presents for that year. It was probably this consideration which prevented Russia from adopting the Gregorian reformation. Certainly the retention of the Julian calendar has given the Russian small boy a vast advantage over other European boys in the matter of Christmas. The children of the Duke of Edinburgh, for example, have the regular Christmas Day of England, and in addition they, of course, keep the Russian Christmas of their mother, twelve days later.

It was, doubtless, Pope Gregory who also invented the cheerful metrical table, beginning, "Thirty days hath September"; for, without the aid of this, it would have been obviously impossible for him to remember the peculiarities of the months. It is, however, wrong to credit him with the original invention of leap-year, an invention which was solely the work of Julius Cæsar. The Pope meant well, and, perhaps, did improve as well as reform the calendar, but for leap-year no responsibility attaches to him.

It must strike every man who loves order and exactness that the use of leap-year is, after all, a mere palliation. It is the compensation for an error and not the correction and total abolition of the error itself. The trouble in the calendar arises partly from the effort to show respect to both the sun and the moon, and partly from the impossibility of exactly dividing the year by twelve. The true scientific and manly way of meeting this difficulty would be to either reconcile the sun and moon, or to give to the year a number of days which could be divided into equal months without leaving a remainder.

The difficulty which exists in the fact that twelve lunar months do not make a year can be abolished by simply abandoning all reference to the moon in arranging the calendar. In the days when the moon was regarded as a goddess of exceptionable respectability—for that little scandal in connection with Endymion was never thoroughly investigated, and may be regarded as not proven—it was very proper to treat her with respect. But we have long ago ceased to believe in the divinity of the moon. Indeed, we have latterly learned that she is a dead planet, and her persistence in revolving around the sun, as if she were still alive, is believed by many astronomers to have no higher motive than a desire to avoid funeral expenses. A dead moon deserves no kind of consideration, and we should arrange our months without the slightest reference to her.

We can, then, so far as our relations with the moon are concerned, have as long or as short months as we please. People whose salaries are paid monthly will naturally want short months. If Mr. Denis Kearney were really a statesman, he would insist that all wages should be paid by the month instead of the day, and that there should be at least twenty-four months in the year. This would be merely an expansion of the principal of the Eight Hour Law, and it will sooner or later become one of the chief "planks" of the Communist Party. Science, however, need not concern herself with this. What science should endeavor to do is to give us a year which can be accurately divided into a reasonable number of symmetrical months.

No one can deny the scientific eminence of Professor Paddock, of Edinburgh. He does not believe in the existence of a God, of a future world, or of any distinction between morality and crime. Hence he must evidently be a scientific person of transcendent ability. This learned and gifted man proposed, just as an experiment, to try to extinguish Vesuvius by filling the crater with water. He thinks that if water enough is pumped into the crater the volcano will be extinguished, and that by a like process all existing volcanoes can be put out. If this be true, he has unconsciously hit on the true way to reform the calendar.

If we put out the volcanoes we put out at the same time the central fires of the earth. This will greatly hasten the cooling of the earth. In all probability the earth would become as cool in the course of three or four years as, in the ordinary course of things, she would become in a hundred thousand years. The shrinkage of the earth consequent upon cooling would be correspondingly rapid. Among the results of this shrinkage would be the increased velocity of the earth's motion and the shortening of the year.

What we ought to do is to turn water into the volcanoes until the cooling of the earth brings the year to the precise length of 360 days. We would then have twelve months of thirty days each, and there would be no need of leap-year. This would be a radical and scientific reformation of the calendar, and there is no doubt that Professor Paddock, now that it is suggested to him, will enthusiastically advocate it.

WHEN a man with many aliases acknowledges that while serving a term in Sing Sing he learned the "art of a boarding-house thief," and that within the seven months that have elapsed since his release he has committed twenty-two thefts in boarding-houses, there are people who will be anxious to know what kind of discipline is maintained in that institution.

IN the account of Mr. Frank Leslie's funeral published in our last issue, we inadvertently omitted mention of the presence of the officers of the American Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals in this city, and delegates from a number of branch societies in this and other States. We particularly regret this omission because of the long and warm relations which had existed between Mr. Leslie and President Bergh.

THE authorities of Tennessee, appearing determined to check the escape of prisoners from their keepers, and at the same time to give a warrant for extreme means of retaining possession of convicts both in prison and while being conveyed from court to prison, have decided upon a law of great latitude. According to this new code an officer, having a prisoner in custody for felony who attempts to escape, will be excused for killing him if he cannot be otherwise retaken; but, if he can be otherwise retaken, in any case, without resort to such harsh measures, it will be at least manslaughter to kill him. But, in cases where the person slain is arrested or held in custody for a misdemeanor, and he fly or attempt to escape, it will be murder in the officer to kill him, although he can not be otherwise overtaken; yet, under some circumstances, it may be only manslaughter, as if it appear death was not intended. It is considered better to allow one guilty only of a misdemeanor to escape altogether than to take his life.

A SUIT, understood to be of a friendly character, is to be instituted by the Insurance Commissioner of Missouri to determine the legal right of benevolent societies to engage in life insurance business. This proceeding will be watched by thousands of families throughout the United States, because it is directed from some motive against the popular Orders of Masonry, Odd Fellowship, Knights of Pythias, Knights of Honor, and many others of a similar character, which have of late years transacted a large and extremely satisfactory business in a cheap and simple form of life insurance. In addition to the old established Orders, new ones are springing up every year or two for the express purpose of affording an inexpensive method of making pecuniary provisions for wives and children after the death of the members. Almost every trade organization now has its insurance feature. The associations within the societies are, in general, successful. The members join freely, having greater confidence in the officers they associate with weekly or oftener than in those of public companies they seldom see. They know that none of the profits are devoted to the erection and furnishing of business palaces, and they know that the amount insured for will be paid promptly without any contest, fee or reservation. Thousands of men belonging to one or more such associations are now carrying insurance varying from $500 to $7,000, at an annual cost of from $5 to $75 per year. The usual rate is $1 or $1.10 on a death, and the amount of insurance is either $1 for every member at the time of a death, if the membership is not limited, or from $1,000 to $3,000 where the membership is limited or classified. It will thus be seen that this form of insurance is the cheapest and the simplest of any of which a man can take advantage. Many societies that could be mentioned have accumulated handsome assets in the long years of their existence. All such funds are being returned to the members in dividends on each death, thereby reducing the cost of assessment, inciting greater interest among the beneficiaries, and giving to the societies more of the mutual benefit character. It is not unreasonable, therefore, that the proposed proceedings in St. Louis should be watched by a great army of provident men in every section of the country.

THERE is much rejoicement over the length and breadth of the little kingdom of Belgium at the news that a Belgian trading station, the first, has been established by the intrepid Henry M. Stanley in Congo, near Yallala. This place being claimed by both England and Portugal, Belgium's pretensions may lead to what diplomatists are pleased to term "complications."

THE St. Gothard tunnel will soon be an accomplished fact. A few days ago there only remained about 404 metres of rock to be cut through; and as the average daily progress has latterly been 4 metres 70 centimetres, a pretty accurate calculation can now be made when communication, in the heart of the mountain, can be opened between Goeschenen and Airolo.

DESPITE the terrible distress in the Green Isle, there are many of the landlords who are looking to their "tops and leathers" in order to enjoy a "run" with the Empress of Austria during her month's sojourn at Her Imperial Majesty's hunting seat in Royal Meath. Those who "know you know" say that the Emperor is furious with his handsome and hard-riding wife—that measures to compel the willful lady to do her fox-hunting within the compass of her own realms are in active preparation. It does seem so strange that Her Majesty should thus annually expatriate herself, despite the remonstrances of her husband and the flouts of her subjects, for the purpose of what?

THE Princess Louise, who is now speeding across the high seas to the expectant Laird of Lorne, on the occasion of her departure from Liverpool on Friday last, came nearer to seeing the very last of her royal brothers, the Prince of Wales and the Duke of Edinburgh, than she anticipated. As the dispatch-boat Lively, with the heir-apparent and Prince Alfred on board, was returning from the steamer Sarmatian, the Lively collided with the British ship Arnot Lyle, piercing the side of the Lyle. Luckily for the house of Guelph, the Lively was constructed of steerner stuff than the Lyle. The yachts of the royal family have an unhappy knack of running down other craft. The man at the wheel must evidently be of opinion that there is a royal road on sea as well as on land.

THE new Army Bill, which will fix the footing of the German army for a term of seven years, will be submitted to the Reichstadt next session. This Bill, which proposes so largely to increase the war strength in piping times of peace, is considerably exercising the war departments of European Governments. If the German army is to be increased, why not the French, the Austrian, the Russian, the Italian and the English? Young blood in command is the order of the day in Germany, and the old generals are to make way for younger but—query?—better men. General Sherman, in an interview with the artistic correspondent of this journal, could not see why England had only one general—to wit, Sir Garnet Wolseley. The hero of the "March to the Sea" had no fault to find with Germany on this score.

OF the 5,000,000 acres under vines in France 1,000,000 have been totaly destroyed, and 500,000 more have been attacked. This means that France produces an average of about 1,300,000,000 gallons of wine, the value of which is estimated at $400,000,000. The only vines impervious to the attacks of the phylloxera are our own; this immunity is, as is alleged, owing to the toughness of their skins. It may therefore happen that America will not only supply the world with food, but with wine also. Apropos of wine during the last ten months, the consumption in gallons in the British Islands has been as follows: Sherry, 3,319,000; port, 2,392,000; claret, 3,463,000; champagne, 1,171,000; Spanish red wine, 852,000; other kinds, 1,193,000 gallons. The port wine drinkers have not entirely disappeared off the face of the earth.

WHO would be a Pontentate! It is the Sultan now who is in abject dread of assassination. The Pashas around him, aware of this, persuade him that, if he introduces reforms either political, social, or religious, he will offend the fanatical portion of his subjects and provoke retaliation. The Pashas themselves care no more for the Koran than they do for the works of Confucius, but they cleverly confound together a pretended regard for Mahomet and a very real regard for their own pockets. Queen Victoria is guarded by a posse of detectives armed to the teeth, and the ruler of the Empress of India, Lord Beaconsfield, has lately been so repeatedly worried by threatening letters that he has felt it his duty to place them in the hands of the Chief Constable of his county, who has deemed it advisable to place almost a cordon of police round Hughenden.

THERE is no longer the redeeming influence of novelty in misplaced switches, in fact the repetition becomes monotonous, and unless a director gets killed, and half a dozen prominent officials sent to Sing Sing, the burden of the old song will continue to be droned. In the case of the recent accident on the L. railroad, an engine jumped the track, despite the wooden guard rails so stoutly vaunted by the officials, falling into the street below. Had the accident occurred at any of those hours when the trains are crowded, the loss of life would have been awful. Who is in fault on this occasion? A misplaced switch! Who misplaced it? Possibly an overworked, weary pointsman. If the accident is due to the niggardliness of the company in not providing sufficient and intelligent supervision, then the company may perhaps find to their cost that it would be more economical to man the switches.

SPAIN managed to retain Cuba at a vast outlay of life and means; but the island does not prove to be a possession without burdens. She is endeavoring to negotiate a special loan for Cuba, inasmuch as the Minister of the Colonies at the last Cabinet Council of the Spanish Premier informed his colleagues that the deficit of the Colonial Treasury had increased from $5,000,000 to $9,000,000, owing to the war expenses. The new loan cannot be based on the customs revenue, as that is already pledged for fourteen years, and the levying of new taxes in any shape or form seems impossible.

THE Royal Academy has been at length, under certain restrictions, opened to the gentler sex, thanks to the genius of Elizabeth Thompson. That many "old women" exist among the Academicians goes without saying, but this step in the right direction will cause a throb of exultation in many an aspiring bosom. It is rather hard upon the female embryo R. A.'s to be excluded from the annual banquet, and the deprivation of the right to vote at elections will form the subject of a very substantial grievance. However, ce n'est que le premier pas qui coûte, and once the ladies obtain official footing the dinner and vote will follow as a matter of course.

ON Friday, January 23d, there was no session of the United States Senate. In the House the following public business was transacted: Mr. Horr, of Michigan, pronounced this epitaph upon Mr. Cox, of New York:

"Beneath this slab lies the great Sam Cox,
Who was wise as an owl and brave as an ox;
Think it not strange his turning to dust,
For he swelled and he swelled till he finally 'bust.'
Just where he has gone, or just how he fares,
Nobody knows and nobody cares;
But wherever he is, be he angel or elf,
Be sure, dear reader, he's puffing himself."

Which was called forth by an epitaph of Mr. Cox on Mr. Horr:

"Here lies the body of Congressman Horr,
'Tis Greece, but living grease no more. Requiescat."

Then the curtain was rung down.

GLAD tidings of great joy for Mr. Bergh. Lady Burdett-Coutts has just ordered a medal for kindness to animals, to be awarded by the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty. A group of creatures, horse, cow, donkey, goat, pig, monkey, dog and cat, is to appear on one side, and a figure of the Queen on the other. Her Most Gracious Majesty is certainly the patroness of the Society; but glimpses are given in her own journal of a state of feeling which can scarcely be considered maudlinly sentimental, to say the least. She sympathized much with her husband in the chase of the stag, but never, by any chance, with the stag himself, even when he got away wounded. And few people now remember the genuine stir of public feeling which put a speedy stop to the Prince Consort's introduction of the German battue—a horrible spectacle of slaughter—the deer were driven into a narrow inclosure, and the Prince sat and shot them, the Queen smiling by. But the English, who are not always very particular, would not stand that, and said so.

THERE is but little doubt that Home Rule is a question that is rapidly drifting within the scope of practical politics. An agrarian agitation which the Government is wholly impotent to stem, an impending famine which the Government is making no adequate preparation to deal with, are not by any means ill calculated to bring about this result. It is very far from improbable that before the Winter is over we shall find coroners' juries, summoned to ascertain the cause of death of people who have died of hunger, returning verdicts of "Willful murder against Lord Beaconsfield." It is, moreover, unfortunately almost certain that before the Winter is over many a man who now "owns land" in Ireland will have come, by means of a violent death, to own no more of it than some six feet by three. Ireland asks to be allowed to manage her own affairs; first, on the ground that she understands her own affairs better than England does. This may or may not be true, but it is not altogether improbable, for English politicians of both parties have been driven once and again to confess that they can "make neither head nor tail" of Irish affairs. The rumor gains ground that Parliament will be dissolved before Easter. If yea, at the present crisis in Ireland, Home Rule must get a fair and impartial hearing.

NO, THE English Government will not expend a shilling in public or any other works to relieve the starving Irish if they can possibly help it. "Jimmy" Lowther, the unpopular Chief Secretary for Ireland, was waited upon by 4,000 unemployed laborers of Dublin at "the Castle" upon Thursday last. These needy and desperate men spoke for the thousands dependent upon their exertions, begging, not for alms, but for work. The well-paid official expressed an icy word sympathy, but could not see in what manner the Government could give employment. The Corporation of Cork have undertaken to bell the cat by asking for a loan of $500,000 for carrying out a scheme of sewage and paving. If the Government refuse to lend the money, Cork will know the reason why! A deputation of the Dublin Mansion House Committee has been appointed to wait on the Lord Lieutenant, with a view to urging the Government to forthwith provide seed of various kinds for the destressed and driven farmers. The Duke of Marlborough will sympathize with the deputation, inform them that he will communicate with the Cabinet sitting in London, and—bow them out. The Duchess means well, but, as Mr. Parnell has said, money passing through Dublin Castle cannot lose its political stamp.

FEDERAL legislators appear to regard our time-honored and much-quoted Constitution as being in a decidedly bad way. So, during the present session, they have formulated the following prescriptions, which, in the course of time, they will endeavor to have applied. In the form of joint resolutions proposed amendments are now on the calendar of both Houses, providing—first, that general appropriation Bills shall contain nothing but appropriations; second, that the President shall have power to disapprove of any separate item of a Bill without thereby defeating the whole Bill; third, that the official terms of President and Vice-President be extended to six years, making such officers ineligible for more than one term consecutively, and limiting the terms of Members of Congress to three years; fourth, that polygamy be prohibited in the United States and in all places subject to the Federal jurisdiction; fifth, that power be given to Congress to grant exclusive right to adopt and use trade-marks; sixth, that the right of suffrage in the United States shall be based on citizenship, and the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States, or by any State, on account of sex, or for any reason not equally applicable to all citizens of the United States; and, seventh, that the election of President and Vice-President be hereafter by a majority of the votes of the people, and that the Electoral College be abolished. It would be bad, indeed, if those innovations were necessary. If Members of Congress would cease special legislation, and keep partisan or sectional "riders" off the appropriation Bills, and if the officers charged with executing the laws as they find them would do so promptly and impartially, we could get along very well without any further additions to the Constitution.

XLVITH CONGRESS—IID SESSION.

MONDAY, January 19th.—SENATE—A resolution was introduced requesting the President to invite foreign maritime powers to co-operate with the United States in the establishment of an interoceanic canal, and the maintenance of its neutrality. A Constitutional amendment was proposed providing that the right of suffrage in the United States shall be based on citizenship, and the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States, or by any State, on account of sex, or for any reason not equally applicable to all citizens of the United States. Discussion was had on the Bill to prevent cruelty to animals in transportation. HOUSE—A Constitutional amendment was proposed providing for the election of President and Vice-President by a majority of the votes of the people, and for the abolition of the Electoral College. The use of the hall of the House was granted for an address by Mr. Parnell.

TUESDAY, January 20th.—SENATE—The House Bill to admit free of duty articles for exhibition at the forthcoming Miller's Convention at Cincinnati was taken up and passed. Two more recusant witnesses were discharged. In order to meet the requirements of the many amendments to the Bill for the prevention of cruelty to animals, it was recommitted in order that a new Bill may be reported. HOUSE—The proposed Constitutional amendment presented to the Senate yesterday, in regard to the abridgment of citizenship, was introduced to-day. A Bill to appropriate $500,000 to be expended under the direction of the President and Secretary of State for the relief of the famine-stricken Irish was presented. The Bill requiring the National Banks to retain one-half their reserve in coin was taken up and discussed at length.

WEDNESDAY, January 21st.—SENATE—The joint resolution for the withdrawal of the legal-tender power of United States notes was taken up and debated warmly to the hour of adjournment. HOUSE—Majority and minority reports were submitted by the Committee on Military Affairs on the Bill for the relief of General Fitz-John Porter. The Committee on Appropriations reported a Bill for the payment of fees of marshals and deputy-marshals for the year ending June 30th, 1880, which was ordered printed and recommitted. The consideration of the Bill relative to National Bank reserves was resumed, but the Bill went over without having reached a vote.

THURSDAY, January 22d.—SENATE—Bills were introduced to protect the navigability of navigable rivers and to provide for the further distribution of the Geneva Award, and resolutions asking for information as to whether any Indian Commissioner had been interested in an Indian contract, and also in regard to grants of land made to railroad companies but liable to forfeiture for non-fulfillment of agreement. Further discussion was had on the joint resolution on United States notes, after which the Senate adjourned to January 26th. HOUSE—The Bank Reserve Bill was promptly taken up, and after debate the amendments proposed by the committee providing that the coin reserves of National Banks shall be kept in their own vaults was rejected by a vote of 33 to 19. A vote was then taken on ordering the engrossing and third reading of the Bill, which showed 78 yeas and 138 nays, consequently the order was not made and the Bill was killed. In Committee of the Whole the House resumed consideration of proposed revision of the rules.

FRIDAY, January 23d.—HOUSE.—No public business was transacted.

A VERY REMARKABLE DISPATCH.

IT was a grilling day in the July of 1876, as I sauntered into the office of the Western Union Telegraph Company, on Broadway, for the purpose of sending a dispatch to my friend, George Moyers, the artist, who implored of me to join him instanter at West Point, where he had pitched his tent for the purpose of doing a picture or two of the scenes enacted in that romantic locality during the glorious war of Independence.

I am a lawyer, and in '76 was a "rising junior." I had been fagging cruelly, sparing myself no amount of labor, and when on that July day my longed-for vacation was at hand, I felt like a school-boy about to get away for the real genuine holidays.

As I approached the grating and awaited my turn to pop in the message, I became interested in a young lady, richly but plainly attired, whose svelte figure was simply perfection, and whose golden hair was wound round the back of her graceful head in massive and luxurious plaits. Of course any man of a certain age obeys the impulse which bids him gaze on a fair face or a faultless form—it is but Nature's tribute to the beautiful—and in mere obedience to this mysterious law, I strained eagerly forward to obtain a glimpse of her features, but without success.

"When will this message be forwarded?" she asked, in a low and musical voice.

The clerk muttered something that I could not hear.

"Oh, I hope it will go at once. How much am I to pay?"

The phlegmatic employé proceeded to count the words, and announced that the message would cost two dollars.

The young lady put her hand to her pocket, started, colored violently, became deadly pale, and palpitated:

"I have left my purse at home. What am I to do?"

The clerk bit his pencil and said nothing.

"I live out of town, and the message would be too late," and in her perplexity she turned and faced me.

She was very charming. Lustrous violet-blue eyes, and long, sweeping lashes—eyes sad yet joyous, bright yet tender. A delicately formed nose, slightly retroussé, which imparted a piquancy to the face such as one only sees in Greuze's ravishing portraits. Luscious lips and pearly teeth. Her golden hair came low upon her forehead, and she wore a hat surmounted by a rich dark-blue feather that almost swung across her shoulders.

My voice was scarcely audible as I said:

"I beg your pardon. I inadvertently heard your conversation with the clerk. Will you permit me to relieve you from any embarrassment by allowing me to pay for the dispatch?"

She started as I spoke, and, bestowing upon me a haughty glance that almost amounted to defiance, exclaimed:

"We are strangers, sir, and I cannot accept your offer, however courteously meant," and she turned from me.

I felt nettled and strangely irritated. A keen sense of injury smote me. I resolved to act. Plunging my hand into my pocket, I seized upon two silver dollars, and, flinging them to the clerk, gruffly cried, "Send that lady's message," and, striding from the building, sprang into a passing stage.

"What an ass," I muttered, as we rumbled along up Broadway. "What a blooming idiot to indulge in two dollars worth of chivalry." And then her defiant loveliness came back to me, and I felt elated, triumphant.

She might be Lady Clara Vere de Vere for aught I knew to the contrary; but be she gentle or simple, she was in my debt, and she owed me two mighty dollars.

George Moyers met me at the dock at West Point.

"You never beheld such a charming ranch as I have dropped on!" he exclaimed, as we strolled up the hill. "It's all honeysuckle and sunshine, and birds whistling, and a rustic porch over every window, and a Summer-house instead of a stoop, and a landscape in every corner, and such lager, ah!" And he joyously kissed the tips of his fingers as he waved them in the direction of our temporary homestead.

Our ranch was all that George had painted it, commanding a view of the lordly Hudson, with its glorious and varied scenery. As we sat on the stoop lazily smoking our cigars, I related my adventure with the "Fair One with the Golden Locks."

"Why, I used to think you a hard-headed, shrewd, solid business man," laughed George, "but now I shall never see a two dollar bill that I will not think of my friend Tom Kendrick loafing around telegraph-offices for the purpose of paying for the dispatches of damsels who have forgotten their purses."

Our life at West Point was an enchanting monotony—a plunge in the river at seven, breakfast at nine, no letters to read or write—thank heaven—a prolonged smoke. George sketched, I read a trashy novel, with the full knowledge that it was rubbish of the most uncompromising description, but exulted in its flimsy fiction nevertheless; and then to the dock to meet the steamer—this act, together with that of attending evening parade at the Point, we regarded in common with all the guests at Cozzens's Hotel, and indeed of the village, in the light of a serious duty; and be the weather fair or foul, wet or dry, stormy or calm, the arrival of the boat found us on the dock, like a pair of detectives, awaiting the landing of some party telegraphed as "wanted."

Six weeks had glided away as though I had been in dreamland, and the hour was not far distant which was to summon me to work. The shadow of New York was upon me.

One exquisite afternoon found us, as usual, on the lookout for the boat en route to Albany. Tourists from all climes under the sun were passing backwards and forwards, and George's excuse for gazing at the pretty girls was on the plea of "studying character."

"I never saw such a colorless lot," growled my companion, as the boat commenced to glide from the dock. "As ugly as—ah, that's something over there in deep mourning—the girl with the hay-colored hair."

My heart leaped.

It was the young lady whom I had encountered at the telegraph-office.

My eyes caught hers and she flushed.

The boat was passing along the dock.

She spoke rapidly to her companion, a tall, aristocratic-looking young man, towards whom, in that single instant, I conceived a deadly aversion. This man instantly quitted her side and rushing to the stern of the boat shouted:

"Your name and address; I want to get out of your debt"—his tone as though he were addressing a lackey.

"You are not in my debt," I defiantly retorted.

The boat had almost passed from the dock.

He sprang upon a seat, and rapidly wrapping a silver dollar in a greenback, I know not of what value, cried, as he flung it:

"Catch! Debt with interest and thanks."

The boat had passed away from the dock. I was not the "boss" baseball-player in the Manhattan Club without being able to make a fair catch. I caught his missile as it came flying through the air. With all my strength I sent it spinning back to him. It struck him, and a savage thrill of pleasure ran through me as I saw him apply a handkerchief to his face.

The steamboat had passed away, and my heart's longings were with that fair girl who was being borne from me, whither I could not tell.

What was this haughty beauty to me? What link between us. None, save an act for which a newly-breeched schoolboy would flout me. Her husband, too. Strange to say, I never admitted the possibility of her being united to that man—whenever the thought came to the surface, I did not give it breathing time, but sent it down to the unfathomable depths of undefined idea.

"A letter for you, sir," exclaimed our landlady, the morning but one after my rencontre, handing me a square mourning envelope, with a monogram in scarlet and gold. The superscription was in an unknown female hand. I hesitated before opening it. It must be from her. I studied the monogram but it was as undecipherable as the hieroglyphics on the night-gown of the last of the Ptolemies. At last I tore open the envelope. The letter ran thus:

"Miss Jones begs to thank Mr. Kendrick"—it was from her—"for his great kindness in saving her pug from drowning in the Hudson on last Thursday, and——"

* * * * *

Upon my arrival in New York I found a letter which compelled me to take the night train to Boston. I ordered my berth to be made up without entering the sleeping compartment, and smoked a cigar before turning in.

It was bright daylight, and we were slowing into the depot when the porter shook me up. I rolled out of my berth, and stood gathering my impedimenta together preparatory to going in for a wash, when a conductor exclaimed:

"Please to let these ladies pass, sir."

My fellow-travelers were standing, anxious, like Mr. Sterne's starling, to get out. I muttered an apology for blocking the way, and, turning, cast a short, sharp glance at two ladies.

One of them was the young girl whom I had encountered at the telegraph-office.

* * * * *

My holidays had passed away, and work, grim, gaunt, earnest, was upon me. Letters to be replied to, papers to be hunted up, appointments to be made and kept, law-books to be consulted, opinions to be given, and every pigeon-hole in my waking existence crammed to the uttermost limits of its endurance. Bitterly I reviled the ill-fortune that closed my lids in the cars; bitterly the ill-luck that forced me into a corner beneath the bony knuckles of time; bitterly the mocking destiny that dashed the cup from my lips when thrice the brimming nectar was within reach of them. My work was heavy, and demanded a ceaseless vigilance. My work stood between me and her image, thrusting it aside with an iron and unswerving hand.

It was a murky, drizzling morning in December, upon the eve of the Christmas holidays. I had not the pleasing gratification of even seeing my bed upon the preceding night, as I was compelled to read up a case involving a series of the most important issues, and my night's rest went down before the interests of my clients.

It was a disputed will case, and I had been retained for the defendants.

Miss Isabelle Van Zandt died on the preceding August, bequeathing the bulk of her vast property to her nephew and niece, the children of a deceased sister, and a comparatively small residue to a sole surviving brother, who now disputed the will on the grounds of undue influence and the mental incapacity of the testatrix. On our side it was alleged that the testatrix was of sound mind at the time of the demise, and that the bequests were the result of natural affection, and that she was further influenced by the fact that the plaintiff was extremely wealthy and unmarried.

There were two weak places in our armory. The first, that Miss Van Zandt had been estranged from her nephew up to within a few days of her death; the second, that Miss Lindsay was generally considered somewhat eccentric. Her nephew, Mr. Edward Appleton, had married "a penniless lass wi a lang pedigree" contrary to the expressed wishes of his aunt; and it was solely owing to the influence of his sister Mabel that he was, at the eleventh hour, restored to the sunshine of the good graces of his offended relative.

It was late when I arrived at court, and, in addition to my brief, I was incumbered with a ghastly headache, which, at every throb, led me to imagine that my skull was in imminent danger of exploding as though through the agency of nitro-glycerine.

The plaintiff had a cloud of witnesses in attendance, and the case, from the magnitude of the property at stake, excited very considerable interest.

The plaintiff's case was ably, eloquently and argumentatively stated by his counsel, and about twenty persons who had been on terms of alleged intimacy with the deceased were examined as to her eccentricities, and also with regard to her visibly decaying mental powers, antecedent to her demise.

My "leader" cross-examined such of those witnesses as he deemed shaky, and, by dint of a series of artful and elaborate queries, totally irrelevant to the question at issue, succeeded in driving a number of these witnesses into a state of mental irritation bordering upon frenzy, and the remainder into a condition of hapless and irrevocable bewilderment.

When he had duly impressed the jury with the conviction that the individuals who had appeared before them were each and all possessed of a natural taste for perjury, he proceeded to state the case for the defense, and in a brief but incisive statement painted the conduct of the plaintiff in such hideous colors as to justify the refusal of the tears of a solitary angel to wipe the record out.

If our case was indented with weak points, it likewise bristled with strong ones, and one upon which we placed an unlimited confidence was the fact of the deceased lady's having telegraphed to her nephew, a few days prior to her death, to come and receive her unqualified forgiveness. The substance of the dispatch was written by herself, copied by her niece, and transmitted by the latter to Mr. Edward Appleton, who acted upon it instanter.

The existence of this dispatch was questioned. By a piece of extraordinary good luck the original, in the handwriting of Miss Van Zandt, had been procured, and, with a cool, self-satisfied demeanor, my "leader" rose and said:

"We propose to place Miss Appleton on the stand now;" and, turning to me, half-whispered, "You take her up, Kendrick; I'll hold myself in reserve."

Up to this particular moment I had preserved a masterly inactivity; my head was splitting, and my ideas were deranged by the tortures of physical anguish. I would willingly have given a hundred, two hundred, yea, five hundred dollars for a respite, but the chance was too good to throw away; I could not afford to lose the opportunity, so, by a vigorous effort, I drew myself together and, glancing rapidly at the marginal notes scrawled on my brief, I turned towards the stand, and, blinded with pain, drawled:

"You are Miss Mabel Appleton?"

"I am."

"Niece of the late Miss Isabelle Van Zandt?"

"Yes."

"You recollect Tuesday, the 27th of July last?"

"Perfectly."

"You are acquainted with the handwriting of this document?"

"Intimately."

"You recollect sending a dispatch to your brother at Montreal?"

"I do."

"At the request of your aunt?"

"Yes; she wrote the substance of the dispatch."

"Will you have the goodness to inform me if you have seen this document before?" Handing a half-sheet of note-paper all written over.

She raised her vail.

The court swung around me; Mabel Appleton held the original draft of the dispatch for which I had paid the two dollars.

* * * * * * *

That "bit o' writin'" is now framed and glazed, and suspended in a gold frame in my wife's boudoir, and many a time do we refer to that memorable 27th of July, when I paid two dollars for a dispatch that was destined to do so much for her, and so much for me.

THE NEW MARKET-STAND.

THE opening by the city of a new market-stand has led to an organization of the marketmen of Washington and West Washington Markets, for the purpose of preventing any up-town movement of the markets or their auxiliary stands, and meetings are being held almost daily by interested parties to further the object. Strong complaints are made of the action of the city authorities in driving the marketmen away from the locality they have occupied for fifty years or more. The resolution ordering the wagons to the Gansevoort Market was, it is claimed, passed at the solicitation of storekeepers in the vicinity of Washington Market. But these storekeepers now say they realize that they have driven away a large and remunerative trade, and they want to get it back again. There is also a doubt as to the legality of the ordinance establishing the Gansevoort Market, as an ordinance was passed July 7th, 1879, designating certain portions of Hudson Street as a market-stand, and this ordinance has not been rescinded. It is stated that the Superintendent of Washington Market had refused to recognize the resolution as in force, and the captain of the police precinct said he would, acting under orders, drive away any farmer who attempted to stand in Hudson Street.

While this controversy is progressing, the unpopularity of the new stand increases daily. It is bounded by Tenth Avenue, Little West Twelfth, Washington, Gansevoort and West Streets. It is a large plot of ground, near the river front, which for years was used as a depot by the Hudson River Railroad Company, prior to their removal to their present location in Thirtieth Street. Then the Bleecker Street Railroad Company became the tenants of the old Fort Gansevoort property, as it was called, and for ten years it was cumbered with old sheds and unsightly buildings. The plot, which contains about thirty acres, has been cleared of its buildings, the ground has been graded and laid out into paved avenues, wide enough to allow the bulky farmers' wagons to stand along the sides, and to admit of driveways through the centre so broad that an extraordinary pressure of business will be necessary to block them. Superintendent of Markets J. M. Varian has issued a circular notifying all farmers that this will be the only spot in the city where they will be permitted to locate while engaged in the sale of their produce.

—No. 15.—

A Day with the Marquis of Lorne at Rideau Hall, Ottawa.

TOBOGGINING WITH THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL.

Seven Hundred Yards in Twenty Minutes.

THE BOUDOIR OF HER ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCESS LOUISE.

I LEFT the Grand Central Depot, New York, at 8:30 P.M., struck Utica at 5 A.M., changed cars, reached Ogdensburg at noon, crossed the St. Lawrence at one, arrived at Prescott at 1:15, where I was encountered by rosy custom-house officials wrapped in fur from head to heel, boarded the cars, and at 4:20 beheld the twelfth-century Gothic State Buildings of the Dominion's capital looming up through a snow fog, strongly and strangely reminding me, in miniature, of England's Parliament Houses by the River Thames. My first duty was to announce my arrival in Ottawa, and, after the harmless necessary wash, I chartered a blooming sleigh, all scarlet and gold and bearskin, and spun cheerily along the two miles of snow-sheeted road that lay between mine hostelry and Rideau Hall, the official residence of John Douglas Sutherland Campbell, Marquis of Lorne, Lord Lieutenant-General and General-Governor of the Dominion of Canada.

The vicegeral domicile is not by any means a lordly dwelling-house, being a low, wide-extending private mansion, with two wings, one of which resembles a primitive Methodist chapel, the other possessing an undeniable soupçon of a meeting-house. Rideau Hall was originally built by the late Hon. Thomas McKay, and named after the river and falls in its vicinity. The residence with about seventy-seven acres of the estate was leased to the Government in August, 1865, for the sum of $4,000 per annum, with the right to purchase within three years for $70,000, and subsequently within twelve years for such sum as might be determined upon by arbitration. An additional ten-acre lot adjacent to it was added at a lease of $720. At the outset alterations and improvements to the property cost the Government over $80,000. These improvements consisted of new buildings, comprising vinery, laundry, Winter carriage-house, coach-house, ice-house, stables, etc. The Government purchased the property in 1868 for $162,000. Since that date upwards of $100,000 have been expended in additions and $295,000 in repairs. The Hall is surrounded by thirty-five acres of artistically laid-out grounds, which, on the occasion of my visit, were "enshrouded in seamless snow."

On my return to mine hostelry I found a letter from Major de Winton, private secretary to His Excellency, informing me that the Governor-General would receive me upon the following morning, and 10:30 saw my sleigh skimming into the porte cochère of the Government House.

The door was opened by a stalwart sergeant—formerly, by-the-way, in the Life Guards and at the relief of Lucknow as an artilleryman—who was attired in England's red. Another orderly-sergeant stood at attention, while a sentry gazed grimly at me as, Martini-Henry on shoulder, he paced backwards and forwards, reminding me of Brinsley Sheridan's luckless creditor who "walked fifty miles on this d—d carpet."

I waited, while my card was being delivered to Major de Winton, in a large hall, with short stairways right, left and centre, the latter giving a glimpse of a sombre interior. The hall is fitted up in oak, with high oaken dados. The paper above the dado is chocolate-color. The Visitors'-Book stands at a desk beside a stove. On the desk is the following order:

"The A. D. C. in waiting will be much obliged if visitors will write their names and addresses, in Ottawa, in full."

The sergeant returned to the head of the central staircase, and requested me to follow him. I passed across the inner hall, wherein hangs a superb photograph of the Queen, done in 1875, the gold frame surmounted by the V. R. Here also is a bust—life-size, in bronze—of the Marquis of Lorne, in fur cap and fur collar, executed by Miss Montalba. The hall is furnished with oaken cabinets laden with real "bits o' Chelsea," statuettes and vases in majolica. The carpet is Brussels, a dull red with white flowers. The hall leads to a corridor which runs the entire length of the building. This corridor, carpeted as the hall, is broken by glass doors, alcoves, and three sets of unimposing staircases.

In a snug and cheery room to the right I found Major de Winton, the most courteous and earnest of "awell" officials, who, after a brief but pleasant chat, proceeded to announce my arrival to His Excellency. Following the major along the gloomy corridor until we arrived at a door on the left, through which came pouring a flood of dayshine, I stepped into the presence of the Governor-General.

The Marquis of Lorne was seated at a cabinet-desk close to the window, a buffalo robe enshrouding his chair. He was attired in a blue shirt with a turned-down collar; a brown scarf, a blue coat with Astrachan collar and cuffs, and braided in black silk after the fashion of a hussar-jacket. His trousers were of light plaid, his boots laced, with yellow tops and india-rubber soles. He wore no ornament save a massive gold watch-chain of the curb pattern, and two plain, lumpy gold rings.

"Welcome to Canada!" he cheerily exclaimed, as, starting from his chair, he advanced to meet me with extended hand.

Let me describe the Governor-General's study. The apartment is evenly proportioned and lighted by two large windows, which give upon the skating-rink and the tobogganing gallery. The paper is gray; the carpet, Brussels—green, covered with ferns. The grate is English, and brass fitted; the mantel white marble, surmounted by a mirror. On either side of the mantel comes the gas through the heads of bronze Mousquetaires; on either side of the mirror the portraits of the late Duchess of Argyle, the Governor-General's mother, and the splendid Duchess of Sutherland, his lordship's aunt, and to whom the Queen was so devotedly attached. On the mantel is a clock "ticking the minutes with weird and skeleton hand." Two photographs of Her Royal Highness the Princess Louise stand on the mantelpiece, one in her wedding-dress, colored, the other a head only. A superb piece of Gobelin tapestry adorns the northern wall. His lordship's desk is very deep, very wide, and covered with scarlet cloth. A remarkable ink-bottle stands on the right hand—a horse-hoof shod in silver, the lid bearing the inscription, "The hoof of the charger that carried Lord Clyde through the Crimean War." Lord Clyde, it will be recollected, was the Sir Colin Campbell, who did such splendid service with the Ninety-third Highlanders at Balaclava. On the desk, confronting the Marquis, is a full-length photograph of the Princess Louise and another portrait of the illustrious lady set in a gold medallion. A miniature of the Queen in ivory, in a scarlet velvet open-case, also ornaments a desk laden with—oh, blessed sight!—quill pens, and with all the æsthetic impedimenta appertaining to scribbling in high latitudes.

A splendid photo of Inverary Castle, the seat of the Duke of Argyle, and an india-ink drawing by the Princess Louise of the "home-coming," occupy the southern wall; but the place of honor is relegated to a superbly executed portrait of the late Duchess of Argyle, the intense sweetness of expression which rendered her tranquil beauty so excessively winning being admirably rendered. Here, also, are pictures in oil, by the hand of the royal lady of the house, right masterfully executed, the subjects selected being scenes in bonnie Scotland. An open bookcase, painted white, runs along this wall like a dado, "Hansard's Parliamentary Debates" forming a menacing battery on the top. On a table in the centre of the apartment lay a large morocco-bound volume, inscribed, "Addresses, 1878," and, beside it, three of those scarlet morocco-bound, royal-armed, lion-and-unicorned dispatch-boxes, so dear to Ministers of State, and other high and mighty personages of Queen Victoria's Government.

On the eastern wall hangs a very large photo of the Princess Louise, and a bunch of red flowers, on a gray ground, painted by her Royal Highness. On a cabinet stands a colored portrait of the Princess in walking costume. A glass-case of salmon flies and "spoons," terra-cotta vases, a number of breech-loader cartridges, a pair of snow-shoes, an outstretched morocco frame, containing photographs of the Argyle family, also adorn the cabinet.

The Governor-General, after having expressed regret at the death of Mr. Frank Leslie, plunged in medias res, chatting with vigorous animation upon many subjects, from the Tecoalli of Mexico to the proposed Canadian Academy of Arts.

"I am very much interested in this proposed Academy," said the Marquis. "We have lots of talent in the country that requires to be developed and fostered. I want this Academy to be formed utterly independent of any Governmental or Departmental aid. It must make its own way, as did the Royal Academy of England. I have offered a medal for the best design in any art application of any Canadian plant, flower, or leaf for manufacturing purposes."

Apropos of Mr. Parnell's visit to the United States, the Marquis laughingly observed:

"If this sort of thing goes on, America will not only have to support the tenants, but the landlords as well."

After a brisk chat upon various topics, the Governor-General started to his feet, exclaiming:

"Come out and see how we manage to pull through the Winter here;" and, wrapping himself in a blue, blankety-hooded coat, lined and bound with scarlet, he strode along the corridor into the hall where the sentry presented arms, the sergeants saluted, and from thence out into the grounds to the curling rink.

"Curling is essentially a Scottish game," observed the Marquis. "We are very fond of it here, and we have some first-class curlers. I play the Viceregal Club to-day against the Aranprior, a local club. You'll see some good play."

The curling rink is situated in a long shed, lighted at either side by windows—when dayshine fades, by gas-jets. The floor is of ice, forty-two yards long, as smooth as ice may be, and level as a billiard-table. The ice is marked at both ends by circles of "sets." The "stones" to be spun along the ice range from fifty-six to sixty-two pounds in weight. The walls and roof of the rink at Rideau Hall are painted white, relieved by toboggins, their scarlet cushions breaking the white. The ante-rooms at both ends are fitted up for spectators, who can witness the play in heat and comfort through plate-glass windows. The ante-room through which we passed is fitted up in scarlet, with racks for skates, rubbers and boots. Against the wall is a handsomely framed printed notice, headed, "Viceregal Curling Club of Canada," with list of members and officers, the Princess Louise being patroness. The following doggerel, in chalk upon a black board, written by one of the staff, should not be omitted:

"In curling, there's one thing to be thoroughly known,
And that is, that the 'skip' always goes it alone;
Another thing is—save the 'skip'—in 'Tee'
Is a place where no man ought ever to be."

"Now, then," exclaimed the Marquis, "come out and have a look at our toboggins."

Standing at a height of seventy feet from the ground is a wooden structure, inclosed on three sides only, of about four feet square, supported on a framework of timber. This inclosure is approached by wooden steps, one side of the stairway being occupied by a flat board, thoroughly iced, along which the toboggin is trailed by the tobogginist, as he or she ascends to the slippery starting-point.

The Marquis led the way, dragging his toboggin after him.

To the uninitiated, it may as well be stated that the toboggin is a flat board of about five feet in length, eighteen inches in breadth, with the prow turned or rolled over. Upon the toboggin a cushion is placed, and upon the cushion the tobogginist either lies flat upon his stomach or assumes a sitting posture, with stiffened knee-joints, the feet being firmly pressed against the roll of the prow.

When we gained the summit of this wooden structure the Marquis observed:

"I'm awfully sorry you weren't here on New Year's Night. It was a vivid scene. I had the headlight of a locomotive just here," pointing to its empty frame, "and all along down there were Chinese lanterns."

The "down there" meant a strip of snow in a wooden groove about a quarter of a mile long, at an angle of forty-five.

"Now, then, I'll give you a toboggin experience."

The toboggin was placed on the floor of this tower, with its prow peeping over the icy steep.

"Just sit down, so," exclaimed the Marquis. "Put your feet against the prow there. Take hold of the rope. Lean back against me as much as ever you like;" and, turning to one of his staff, "Just tuck in that ulster for him, will you?"

My ulster, a real bit of Irish frieze, was duly wrapped around my legs, and I awaited my fate.

"All ready?" demanded the Marquis.

"All right, sir."

"Let her go!"

I have an indistinct recollection of darting through the air, of losing breath and vision, of a champagney feeling, glorious in its intoxication, of regaining mind and sight, of skimming like a bird along the pure white snow, of slowing, and—then I had had my first toboggining experience.

"We ought to have done better," observed the Marquis, in rueful tones. "If it wasn't for the thaw I could have spun you out beyond that durn."

I had done seven hundred yards in twenty seconds, and was perfectly contented. In the second slide the Marquis caught my hat which had blown off, while we were in full career, and waved it above his head. This was a wonderful catch, rivaling his cricket experiences at Eton College.

An aide-de-camp having announced the arrival of the Aranprior Club, we returned to the Curling Rink, but not until Lord Lorne had graciously shown me a log-hut he had erected beside a new skating-rink out in the middle of a grove of pines. The view of Ottawa from this coigne of espial is especially picturesque.

The Aranpriors proved themselves to be good men and true, and the Viceregals had to look closely to their laurels. Major de Winton, who is a capital curler, flung himself, con amore, as did also the Governor-General, into the game, and it was an exciting sight to behold the Marquis, in his turn, besom in hand, sweeping the ice with a rapidity that would put half a dozen spider-brushers to the blush, as his stone came curling slowly along to the "Tee."

Leaving the curlers to their game, by permission of the Governor-General I returned to the house, where his lordship subsequently joined me, and honored me by acting as cicerone.

Commencing with the billiard room, with its English table, pockets, balls and cues, we turned into the tennis-court, admirably devised for killing the dead hours of a rainy day; and from thence to the smoking-room, an egg-shaped apartment furnished with luxurious easy-chairs, the walls covered with colored prints of the uniforms of the British Service.

"Here is an old print I picked up, when I was over last year, in St. James Street," observed the Marquis, as he pointed to a quaint, out-of-drawing colored picture of the "Taking of Quebec." "This is rather good," nodding towards a water-color sketch of a fancy ball given at Buckingham Palace by the Queen, the costumes being of the period of the Restoration.

Crossing the hall we repaired to the ball-room, a very handsome, lofty, roomy and pale-green apartment, with a dais in scarlet at one end, the wall at the other being completely concealed by a magnificent piece of Gobelin tapestry in vivid preservation, although over two hundred years from the loom. Passing along the corridor, where the Montreal illuminated and emblazoned address shines from the wall, we entered the drawing-room. This apartment is papered in dead light-blue with gray leaves. It has three windows on the right giving upon a veranda. The cornices are blue and white. The carpet and curtains are of dark-blue. There are two English grates, with gray marble mantelpieces surmounted by mirrors. A grand piano occupies a post of honor, while bric-à-brac and countless and costly knick-knacks appear on gypsy tables and cabinets and brackets. The walls are rich in works of art. The Princess Louise, life-size, in her bridal dress, vail, orange blossoms and all; a Doré, illustrating a passage in Tennyson's "Elaine," the quotation in the artist's writing; a portrait of Prince Albert. Superb water-colors hang everywhere—Windsor Castle from Datchet Meade, Inverary Castle, Glen Shira, Venice, Como, Nuremberg. A charming photograph of the Princess Louise in walking attire, enshrined in a Gothic silver frame is especially noticeable, while the display of Sèvres is as rich as it is unique.

Between the drawing-room and the boudoir of the Princess Louise is the library, a bright, cheery retreat, the open bookcases being white. I found the floor piled with FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER and French pictorial papers neatly arranged preparatory to binding, while the table was littered with all the British and foreign quarterlies. The literary contents of the bookcases betrayed a varied and cultured taste, the French and German elements being strongly in force. On a writing-table near the window lay the Bible. Colored prints of religious subjects—from the old masters—cover the walls, and a bronze clock, crowned with a bust of the Queen, ornaments the mantelpiece. From the library we entered the boudoir of the Princess Louise. It is in this sanctum that the æsthetic tastes of Her Royal Highness reveal themselves. The apartment is all blue—walls, carpet, curtains. The white doors are exquisitely painted over with branches of apple-trees in full leaf and fruit, the handiwork of the Princess. Again we have two pieces of superb Gobelin, and between the windows, of which there are three, glowing flowers on dead-gold panels. A painting of a brick wall covered with peaches is also from the brush of the Princess, the picture having been finished but two days before the fire at Inverary Castle. A very enlarged photograph of the Queen occupies one corner of the room, an old silver casket of quaint design supporting it. Two canaries in gilded cages sing blithely in the windows, and immediately beneath the cage of the sweetest singer stands the escritoire of the Princess, laden with its gorgeous blotter and its gilt inkstand, bearing the royal arms, and facing the glass door leading into the conservatory, rich in the most luxuriant ferns. A Capo di Monti clock in ebony and blue tiles stands upon one mantelpiece, while the other groans under grotesques in Sèvres. The chandelier is of glass. A cabinet edition of Shakespeare and Tennyson, together with some French novels, lay scattered on the principal table, while on a small stand opposite the crackling fire are spread the latest French and English newspapers. A portrait of the Duchess of Kent, the mother of the Queen, holds a conspicuous position in the boudoir, as do also photographs of the Princess of Wales and the Princess Beatrice.

"These are very rare prints," observed Lord Lorne, pointing to three framed engravings. "They give one an admirable idea of Quebec prior and subsequent to the storming by Wolfe;" and the Marquis, as though he had been in command on that eventful occasion, went through the entire plan of attack.

"The frames are valuable," he observed, from the fact that up to three months ago they formed part of the timbers of a ship sunk during the siege."

I would recommend to the notice of our lady readers the antimacassars in this boudoir, which are of the roughest and whitest bath toweling, with pink and yellow and blue dog-daisies worked in upon them.

A gong announced luncheon, and presently the curlers filed into the dining-room. With Thackeray, I hold the mahogany to be inviolable, so I shall content myself by merely stating that His Excellency's cook is a cordon bleu, and his wine merchant worthy of being canonized.

The dining-room is a large oblong apartment. The walls and carpet are in dull red. Portraits, after Winterhalter, of the Queen and Prince Albert, adorn the end walls. The buffets, right and left of the entrance, are of black walnut, with game subjects in relief. Gold salvers stand en plaque, three on each buffet. Claret jugs of horn, mounted in silver, with the Argyle arms enblazoned thereon, support the salvers. A silver biscuit-box, in the shape of a drum, is a notable object, as it bears the inscription: "From the soldiers of the Ninety-first Argyleshire Highlanders, presented by the kind permission of Her Majesty to Her Royal Highness the Princess Louise, on the occasion of her marriage, March 21st, 1871." Two very fine specimens of Van Goyen, Village Scenes, overhang sideboards standing in recesses at either side of the fire-place, a wild duck shot by the Marquis, and stuffed, being suspended on the centre panel of each, with the date of its destruction. There are also two oil paintings of Highland scenery in the room, and a large and imposing landscape. The furniture is of black walnut, upholstered in claret-colored morocco leather, plain, heavy and useful.

The bracing air of Canada would seem to be on good terms with the Marquis. He has become both stalwart and stout. His yellow hair is less en evidence than when I last saw him in England, and health and contentment reign in his bright, intelligent face. There will be no Court at Rideau Hall, all reports to the contrary notwithstanding.

It was late in the evening when I took my leave of the blue-blooded Laird of Lorne.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

—SOUTH CAROLINA has 1,349 miles of railroad.

—THERE are 2,000 Indians living in Mississippi.

—ORANGE culture is increasing around Mobile, Ala.

—THE coal-fields of Alabama are estimated to contain 52,000,000,000 bushels of coal.

—TO PAY a debt, the vestry of Christ's Church, Alexandria, Va., are endeavoring to sell the Bible used by General Washington.

—THERE is hope that the severe weather in France has killed the phylloxera, but is mingled with a fear that it has also killed the vines.

—THERE are more colored pupils than white in the public schools in Columbia, S. C., but the white people pay three-fourths of the expenses.

—ONE thousand tons of granite has recently been sent from quarries, near Columbia, S. C., to Washington City, to be used in some of the public buildings.

—THE State debt of Mississippi is $2,618,900.47. During the past two years the debt has been reduced $220,030. The cash balance in the treasury December 31st, 1879, was $209,757.14.

—A PARIS dispatch says: "Eight ladies of the Order of the 'Little Sisters of the Poor' have been sent from the parent house at Rennes to establish a branch of the Order at Brooklyn, N. Y.

—THE British Royal Academy has resolved to admit women to membership subject to certain disabilities, including the deprivation of the right to vote at elections and attendance at the annual banquet.

—THE City of Paris has opened seven new central schools of design for girls only. Education in drawing has lately been made compulsory in France, and the means for acquiring it are therefore being extended in every direction.

—THE Commission of Cardinals at Rome recently gave judgment in the Princess of Monaco's divorce case, annulling the marriage, but pronouncing for the legitimacy of the child, and his education according to the wishes of the father.

—IT is stated that the young Maharaja of Udaipur, the acknowledged head of the Princes of Rajputana, has ordered all official business in his principality to be conducted in Sanscrit, which has hitherto been as much a dead language in India as Latin in Italy.

—THE new arsenal and dockyard to be founded at Mihara for the Japanese Navy will include dry and wet docks fit for the largest war ships, iron sheds in which iron and wooden war vessels may be built in any weather, foundries, engine shops, rolling mills, stores, etc.

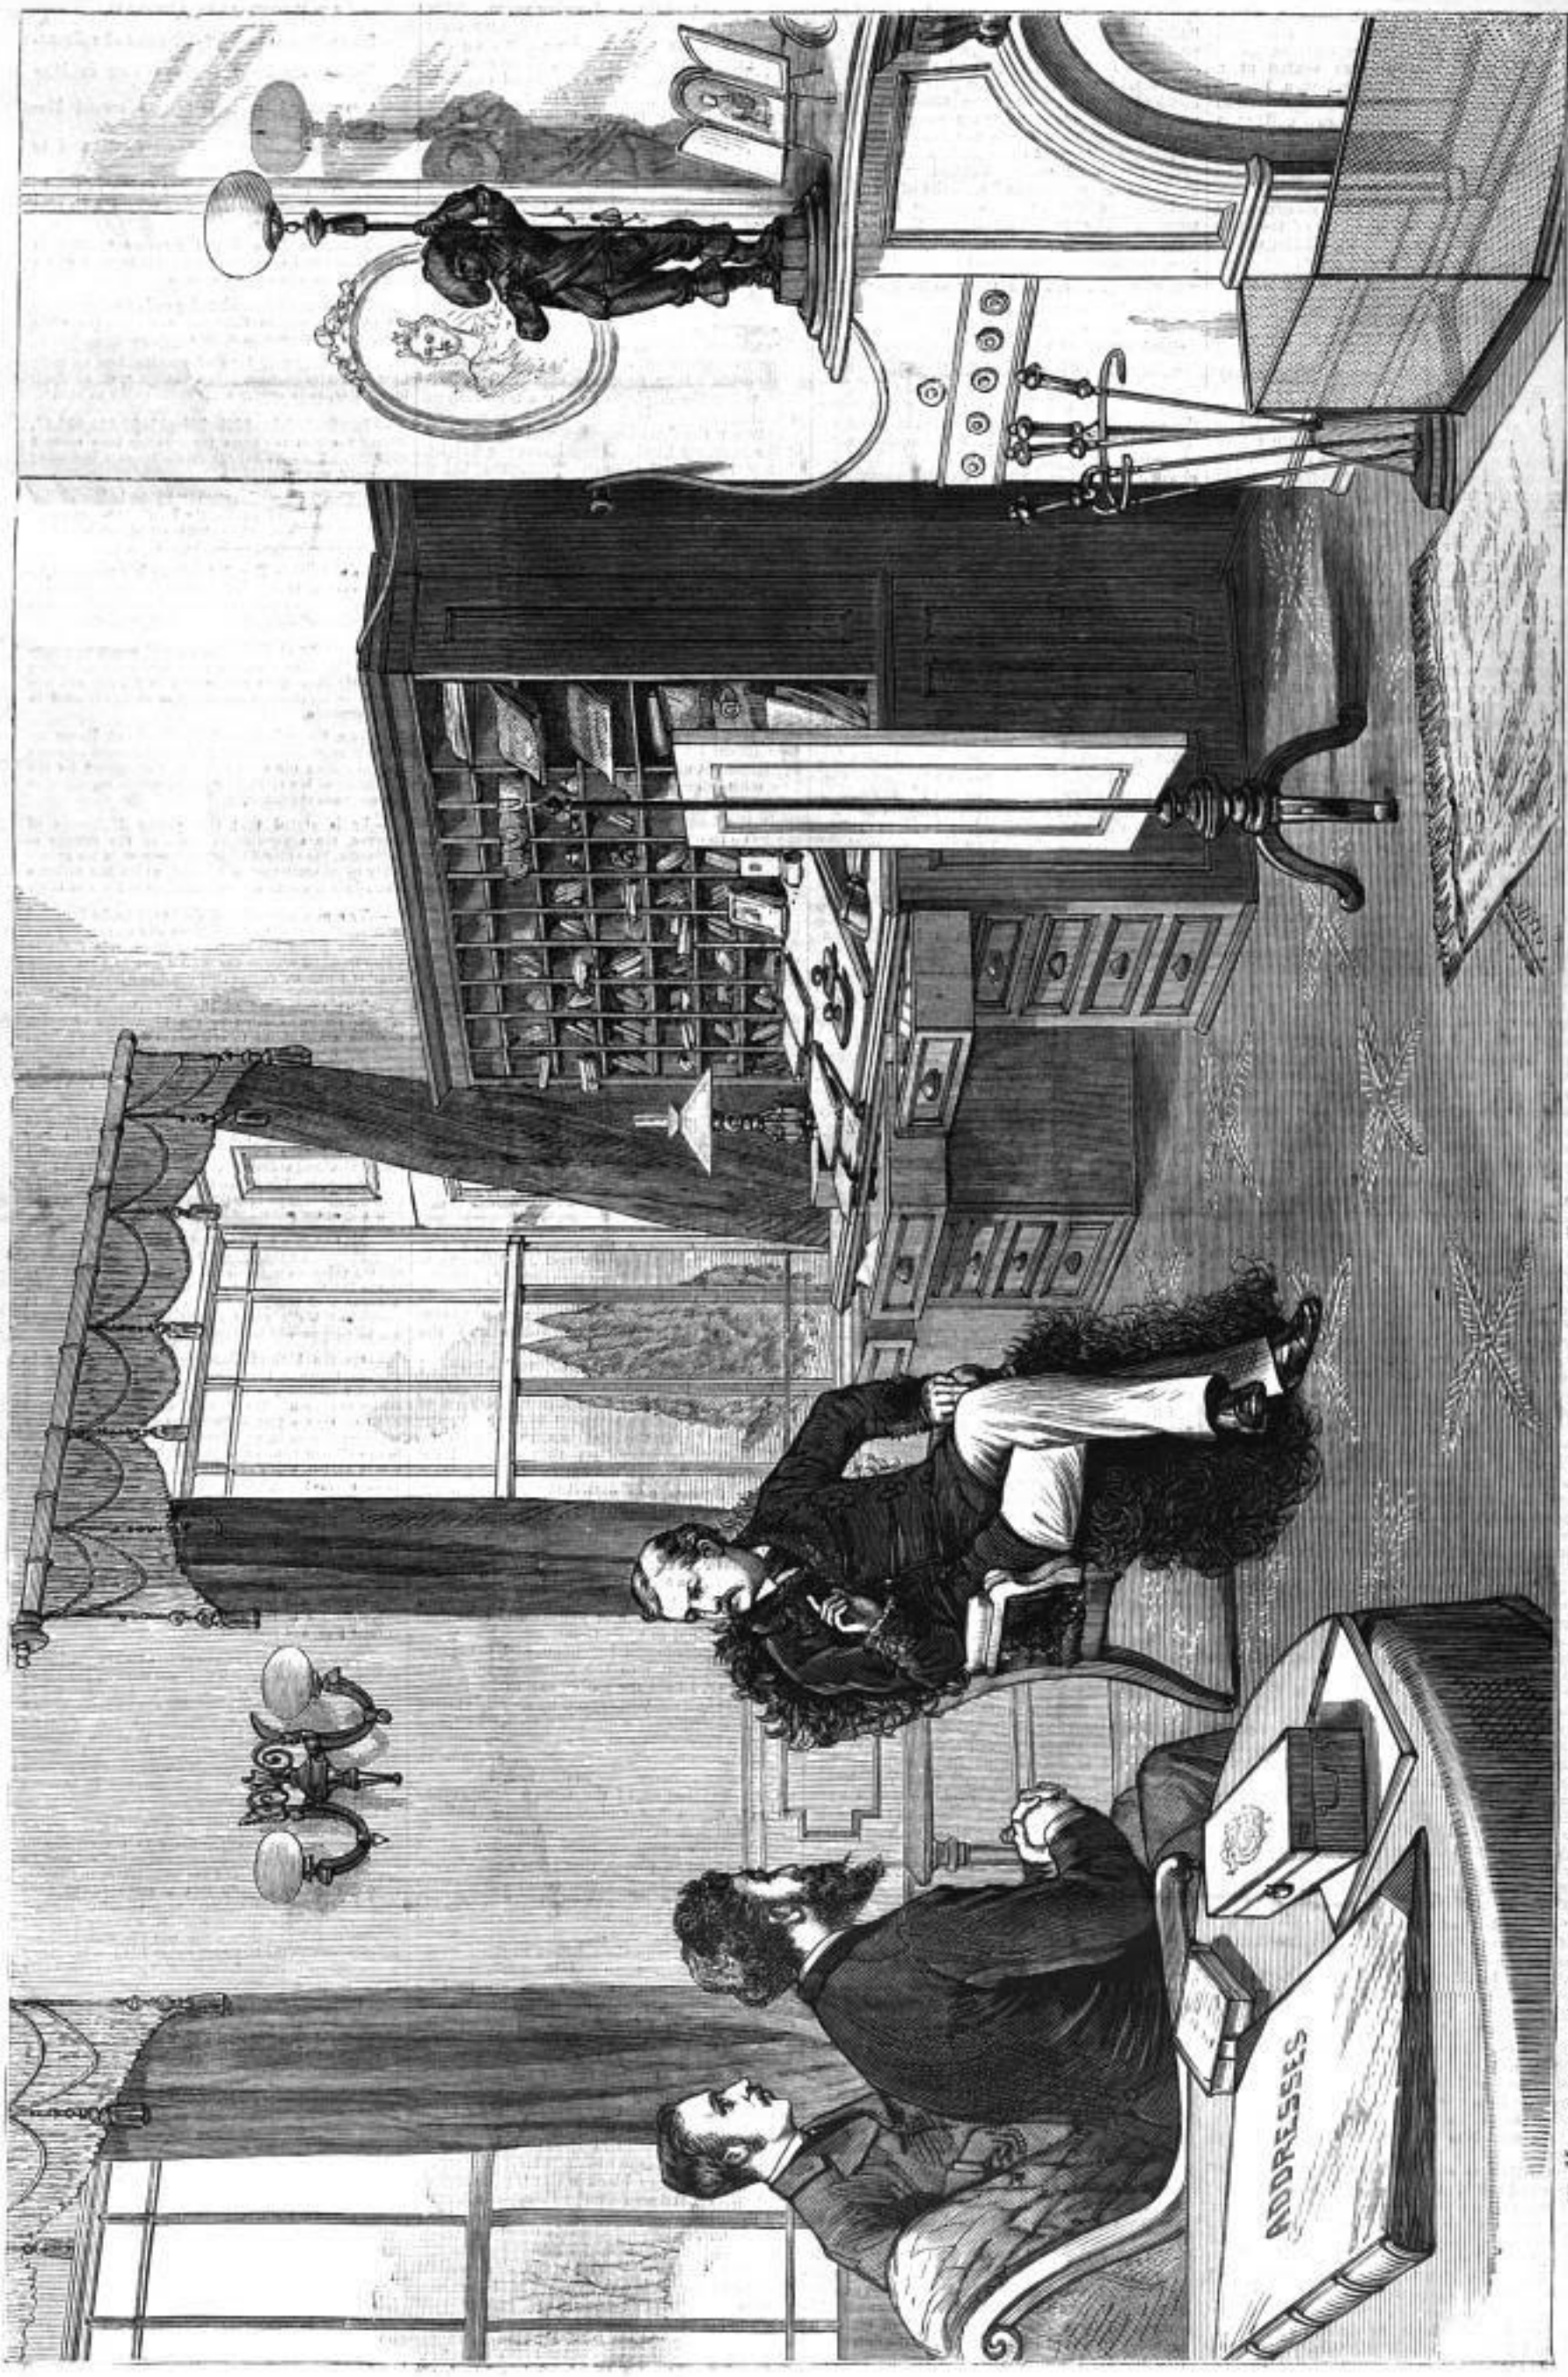
—THE operations of the Department of Agriculture, recently created by the Legislature of South Carolina, are expected to commence during the present month. Hon. A. P. Butler, present State Fish Commissioner, will be placed in charge of the new department, retaining at the same time his position as Fish Commissioner.

—ISMAIL AYOUB PASHA, the newly-appointed Governor-General of the Soudan, demands that half a million pounds sterling and twenty-four thousand troops be placed at his disposal, so that he shall have unlimited powers. The Council of Ministers, regarding the Soudan merely as an Egyptian province, has rejected the demands of the Governor-General.

—MARYLAND'S taxable property is valued at $509,213,891 for the current fiscal year. This is an increased valuation of nearly $40,000,000, due to the work of the Tax Commissioner in the process of assessment. A decision of the State Court of Appeals has brought stocks and bonds under assessment, and the taxables will be very greatly increased thereby.

—ON the 16th of December, in a small city in Eastern Bohemia, thirty-one persons were fined $2.50 each for attending a little service not connected with the State church. The leader of the meeting was fined $12.50. On the 14th of December the attempt of a few believers in Stopitz, near Prague, to hold a Bible service in one of their homes was frustrated by the police. All this in Austria, whose constitution grants religious liberty to all citizens!

—THE following incident of the severe weather in Paris is related: On Sunday evening more than 100 workmen appeared in a body at the police office of the Palace of Justice, most of them leading by the hand wife and children, and stated that, having neither work, food, nor shelter, they wished to be detained as vagabonds. The request was refused. They then proceeded to a Commissioner of Police, who acknowledged the justice of their plea, and granted their request.



—THE celebration of the centennial of the battle of King's Mountain, which will take place on the 7th of October, is to be an interesting affair. Forty companies of the North Carolina State Guards will be present. All of the Southern railroad companies will reduce their rates for this occasion, that old citizens of the Carolinas who have emigrated to Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana and Texas may be induced to attend. An American flag, twenty by thirty-six feet in size, will be unfurled from the top of the mountain.

—THE Madras (India) Government are going in for growing mahogany. Seeds to the amount of 24,000 have been imported from Jamaica and sown in the Nilambur plantations; and the Conservator of Forests, Colonel Beddome, reports that of these 12,000 have germinated. This is regarded as a complete success. From experiments already made, it is known that the climate of the plantations will suit the mahogany admirably, and as the tree grows very fast the enterprise of the Madras Government may be expected to soon bear valuable results.

—IN consequence of the public opposition to the levying of a tax of twenty reis (about one cent) a passenger on the street-car traffic, a mob at Rio de Janeiro destroyed, on the 3d of January, the cars and tracks of the company, attacked the conductors, and stoned and fired at the troops. The latter charged on and dispersed the mob. Three persons were killed and thirty wounded, including some soldiers and policemen. Order was finally restored, and the street-car traffic resumed. The Government, replying to a deputation, has refused to remove the impost.

—AUGUSTA, Ga., has six cotton factories in operation, one in the course of building, and capital is being raised for still another, the last to have 24,000 spindles and to cost $500,000. The six factories used last year 40,000 bales of cotton, their products being worth $4,000,000. Cotton-mill stocks are quoted there at $1.20 to $1.30. Last year the mills paid ten to twelve per cent. dividends, and put away handsome sums in their sinking funds for extensions. The new 24,000 spindle factory will add to the population of the city at least 5,000 souls, and will pay to employés $175,000 annually. These mills make, besides what they consume, a market for 175,000 bales of cotton, which require $8,000,000 annually to handle.

SOUVENIRS.

RETURN, sweet dream, to soothe my ceaseless pain,
I need the winning balm thy coming grants:
It speaks to me of the glad past again,
The golden days of youth in sunny France.

When the far future had no vague alarm,
And when my heart held resolute belief
In purity and love, sweet days of charm
Untainted by the bitterness of grief!

I see once more my cozy student's room,
The pipe and folio, the curious old chair,
Wherein, till twilight draped me in its gloom,
I smiled with Gautier, raved with Baudelaire.

I see myself again, when times were dull,
Wandering upon the glittering Boulevard,
Writing romantic sonnets to a skull,
Or dubious songs for some new Alcazar.

Sweet dream, thou canst revive that happy time
When for Art's sake my last old coat was pawned—
To see, within the Louvre's walls sublime,
The dazzling, peerless grace of La Joconde!

And when with absinthe and with cigarettes
I vainly strove to give the perfect form
Of towering statues to my statuettes,
And make my plays like "Marion Delorme!"

Alas, my dream, all is not kind with thee:
The Morgue's white, trickling slabs thou dost recall,
And, pale upon one, I for ever see,
That poor drowned friend I cherished above all!

And he,—ah! well, I cannot now reprove
The heartless girl that lured from art and fame
His fine, chivalrous soul to Death's sad grove—
I pity both; I might have done the same!

Oh! dream, bring back no visions such as these.
But lead me rather to fair Fontainebleau,
Where, with the warmest of warm Burgundies,
We drank to Hugo, Dumas, Gericault!

Echo the merry jests that all day long
Made life a joy in those ecstatic hours,
When youth trilled, birdlike, its great bliss in song,
When we existed but for Art and flowers!

And when in the deep, violet-haunted glade,
Two dusk-brown eyes of velvet and of flame,
Drooped their delicious light, while, half-afraid,
Pure lips first softly murmured, "Oui, je t'aime!"

Return, sweet dream, to soothe my ceaseless pain,
I need the winning balm thy coming grants;
It tells of the glad, mad past again,
The golden days of youth in sunny France!

THE HIDDEN WITNESS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THAT HUSBAND OF MINE."

CHAPTER XXV.—HUNTING A VOICE.

TWO months—three months have passed, and a glorious September robes the earth in florid beauty. In the country the woods are aflame, the air is crisp and frosty, the rivers creep more slowly, the skies show a fainter blue. In the city the streets are damp of mornings, and shop-boys take down the store shutters languidly, and fashionable ladies shiver in their wraps, because their edict says it is too soon for the artificial heat of stoves and furnaces.

Mrs. Forester, though fashionable, generally yields to the exigencies of the time. Rather than shiver, she has caused a glowing fire of Lehigh to be built in the grate in her sitting-room. The time is after breakfast. The pale, soft sunshine lays over the rich grays and crimsons of the carpet, and brightens the colors of the pretty woolen shawl that hangs over her shoulders. She is somewhat paler than her wont, and there is an anxious look in her eyes, as if she had not rested or were taking to heart the troubles of some one dear to her. She sits in a nobly-large easy-chair of light-green velvet, plentifully protected with linen tidies—the chair, of course—and a footstool, in crimson, adds to the luxury of her position. Opposite, in the fellow green chair, sits Flix, the morning paper in his hand. The two have evidently been in consultation not exactly harmonious, for there are two wrinkles between the young man's handsome eyes, and he is looking very hard at an advertisement, instead of reading the leader which he intended to do.

"I don't think it is either Christian or philosophical to trouble yourself as you do over this girl," he says, at last.

"I am very sure it is neither, Flix, dear. I suppose because I'm only a weak, silly woman; but I had grown to love her, really love her, Flix; and now, God knows where she is. I imagine so many things, some that are—oh, horrible!"

She covers her eyes with one hand.

"I'm sorry, I'm very sorry," says Flix; "it's altogether an embarrassing matter But we have done all we could. Every one of her schoolmates has been either interviewed or written to, and I confess, when I think of the trouble she has put us to, I feel more anger than anything else."

"My dear boy," said his mother, smiling and yet her lips quivered a little, "I know you never had much cause to like her, even when she was a child; but I am so sure you would if you had known her after she came from school. Why, at Mrs. Duprey's, last night, there wasn't a face to match hers, not one. And you don't think much of the girls one meets at these great crushes. I almost wish you did. I didn't use to think so, but it seems as if you ought to marry, Flix. Why won't you give me a daughter to love, now"—her voice falters a little—"she has gone!"

"There is a little lady who sits at my hearth whom I would not exchange for the handsomest flirt of them all," he said, demurely.

Her cheeks flushed—mothers like this sort of talk from their stalwart sons—and her eyes brightened.

"But Flix, dear, they are not all flirts," she says; "you are unjust. There's that dear, good girl, Grace Pulisa, and the general, her father, is very rich, too."

"Pooh! that baby? Don't you know I can't abide blondes? And then, too, goodey girls are my special abhorrence. I'll let you into a little secret, mother mine. The girls I fancy would not, I fear, make the right sort of a wife for me."

"Oh, Flix! what can you mean?"

"I mean that I rather prefer—well," after a little study and a short, low laugh at her anxious look, "a dash of the Bohemian."

"Oh, Flix! then I am sure you must have liked——"

"There, don't say it," and Flix rises from his chair and walks back and forth. "I know quite well who you mean, but we are rid of her at the present. I've no doubt she'll tire of her seclusion when her money has gone, and come back again."

"I wish she might," said Mrs. Forester with a sigh; "at least she made me happy."

"And for your sake, dear, I heartily wish she would come back, though I should start for a journey if she made her appearance, to-night."

"It's a shame how you hate that girl," said his mother, sharply, a spot of crimson on either cheek. "I heartily hope some day she may make you sorry."

"She has made me sorry ever since I knew her; but time presses, and I have a great deal to do to-day." He looked at his watch. "I must be off on my hunt again."

"Your hunt!" the dark eyes look wistfully up. "Then you have not given up the search. Oh, Flix, you will give me such deep, true joy if you find her"

"Her? ha! ha! I'm not looking for her, my darling, anxious little mother, but for something less substantial, without form or color."

"What can you mean, Flix?" She drops the book she had just taken up, and looks at him with wonder in her eyes.

"My dear mother," and he stops walking and stands looking down upon her, his hand on the back of a chair, "do you remember that woman in green singing last night? Oh, for a voice! Well, so say I; I am hunting a voice."

"My dear Flix, are you enthralled at last? Is it a woman's voice that has pleased you?"

"What a romantic little matron it is," he says, laughing, and looking very handsome. "No, indeed, it is not a woman's voice, it sounds from under a heavy black mustache. I would give, I dare not say how much, to find the owner of that voice."

"Why, what is he to you?" asks Mrs. Forester, much interested. "I really cannot understand you."

"Not much to me, but a good deal to justice," he says, growing grave again.

"But tell me about it, you are always so secretive. Your father was a judge, Flix, but he was not above communicating a good many little things that occurred in his practice to me."

"My dear mother, there's nothing to tell—at least now—nothing of much importance. You remember the night I escorted Miss Mercer home?"

"Yes, indeed; she is such a pretty girl! I like her so much," half-sighed the managing little mamma.

"Yes; she is uncommonly pretty and uncommonly tame," was his bearish answer. "Well, we had got to the corner, about two houses from our hostess, when it began to rain in big drops. There was no carriage near, but a well-lighted omnibus made its appearance just then. I asked her if she could endure that sort of thing, and she answered eagerly, having the probable fate of her light silk dress in her thoughts, that she didn't mind at all; so, thinking any port good in a storm, I put her on board and followed her. There were only two persons in the buss, one an uncommonly handsome young man, and the other a larger, older man, I should judge, muffled up to the chin, an enormous English traveling-cap drawn over his eyes, and evidently very sleepy, for he was leaning up in the corner, his head sunk forward on his breast. You know that Miss Mercer is pretty, yes, but then she is a female parrot—a female parrot I particularly detest. Now, do you know, something in the reclining, inert figure of that man interested me to that extent that I longed to hear him speak, but that chatterbox by my side—good heavens, how she did talk!—and fancied no doubt I was edified. At last we took in some other passengers, and I improved the opportunity to move into the corner opposite my sleeper, if sleeping he was. Miss Mercer, seeing that her face attracted the gaze of the very handsome stranger, was still for a few precious moments, during which the younger man touched the other one on the knee, saying: 'We are near our hotel, major!' The gentleman in the corner started up, and seemed alert and awake on the instant. 'Did you give the man the change?' he asked, only that—nodding to the other as he stepped outside—only that—and yet," the young man breathed hard and spoke with so much excitement that Mrs. Forester half-rose in her chair to look at him, "I don't know what kept my hand from his coat-collar, I really don't. I know I sprang from my seat, but he was gone, and I had not the ill-manners to leave Miss Mercer, who might have been a little startled by my action—I don't know, I didn't ask her But ever since I have been on the search for that voice, and if I find it——"

"Well?" responded his mother, excitedly

"I have something to say to that man, that's all?" Flix answered.

CHAPTER XXVI.—"OH, IT WAS AWFUL! AWFUL!"

NOTHING has been heard from Sylve. On the whole, Flix is rather glad. He does not, like his mother, imagine all manner of evil things, or fear that the girl is suffering. She has too much cunning for that, he thinks. Sometimes he recalls the vision that met him that night of his home-coming—the startled, dark-eyed creature, with clasped hands and hurried breath—the long red waves of her dress undulating over the shadowed carpet—the illumination of the hall gas casting transient glow on her bright, abundant hair, as she passed and repassed the door. Why, when he spoke, and spoke kindly, too, should she have turned from him with such a bitter cry? Had it hurt his vanity that he could not think of it without a frown, and something like a sneer curling his lips? At all events, it had enabled him to think more calmly of the flitting that followed so soon, to speculate upon the chances of the girl's recovery. Just now he had other work on his hand, however. Owing to some unavoidable detention, the Washaba case was laid over for a few weeks, and there was plenty of time to prosecute his search for the voice that, sleeping and waking, haunted him. Upon leaving his mother, after communicating what the reader knows concerning his singular errand, he left her to go to his office down-town. The air had sharpened, but the sky wore the sweet balmy color of Spring; the dead leaves eddied into every nook and recess, swept by the winds from the shuddering trees. The grocer at the corner bowed, and stuck his fat thumbs under the edge of his shop-apron as Flix passed, wondering if they had found that girl yet, for though the family had tried to keep Sylve's flitting a secret, all the world knew of it. A little ragged maid offered him a bunch of paper roses with a look of such entreaty in her sad, dark eyes, that he gave her twice the price she asked, and told her to keep her flowers for another customer. Seeing this, a frowsy-headed urchin ran after him a dozen squares, and told him a doletul story, which had no effect upon Flix, who never gave to boys.

Suddenly turning a corner, the young man came upon a crowd. A carriage stood near the curbstone, the panting, frightened horses held by a liveried coachman; a little further on, a smaller, lighter vehicle, broken at the shaft, lay in the road a complete wreck. From all quarters men and boys were running towards the scene of the disaster.

"Oh, Mr. Forester!"

The words, spoken in a familiar voice, caused him to turn his head. There, at his elbow, stood Grace Poulisa, dressed in black, her bonnet crushed back, and the vail fallen from her fair, sweet face. She was white as death, and her lips were drawn and blue. Her vail had fallen disarranged upon her shoulder, and the tears came crowding to her eyes.

"My dear Miss Grace!" ejaculated Flix, startled at her close proximity to the scene of confusion, "what is the matter? Have you been run away with? Are you hurt? Are any of your people hurt? I see now—this is your father's coachman."

"No, thank heaven, we are not hurt. Papa was in the carriage—he is further on. But, oh! I'm afraid somebody is dreadfully injured, if not killed. It was dreadful; the other horses were probably running when the two carriages came together with a crash. Oh, it was awful, awful!"

The tears were running down her cheeks now, notwithstanding a mob of boys, attracted by her excited manner, paused to listen before they had thoroughly investigated the catastrophe.

"This place is too public for you," said Flix, looking about; "allow me to conduct you to the drug-store opposite. It will be some time, I fear, before the horses are soothed."

"Thanks, I should like to go somewhere, and yet I am so anxious to know who is hurt, and if it is very serious."

"Let me get you a shelter first, and then I will return and inform you," said Flix, and passing a hand through his arm, she, nothing loath, for Flix Forester had long been her ideal hero, was led to the opposite side of the street, and consigned to the care of a boy who was pounding with all his might in a small stone mortar.

"I will report unless your father comes first," said Flix, and left her, soothed by the magic of his voice. Hurrying at once to the more immediate scene of the disaster, he forced his way through the crowd until he stood face to face with the injured man, who was lying on the walk, his head upheld by the druggist in whose store Flix had left his friend.

"They can't move him just yet," said some one at his elbow. Flix turned and met the saddened, handsome face of the man, the voice of whose friend in the omnibus the night before, had so startled him. Then he fastened his gaze upon the wounded man—a powerful, well-knit figure, whose features, though bronzed, were attractive, and over whose black, bushy beard a slender stream of life-blood trickled.

"Pardon me—you are this man's friend, I believe?" said Flix, to the gentleman at his elbow.

"I am," replied the other, with much emotion; "he is like a father to me," and he looked at Flix, his questioning eyes seeming to ask, "and who are you that seem to know I am his friend?"

"Is he very badly injured?" queried Flix.

"Very—I fear fatally," was the answer. "He was thrown with great force against the curb, and, being a heavy man, the shock was terrible!" The young man turned his head away, his lip quivered. "I wish I knew what to do," he continued, a moment after; "we are at present stopping at the M—— Hotel, but the man who went for a surgeon thinks we had better have him taken to the hospital, which is, I believe, quite near. That, however, I fear will be repugnant to him. He has a great horror of hospitals."

"He would get much the best care there, and you could, of course, have your own physician," said Flix. "I judge you are strangers to the city."

"Quite—at least I am. We have been living in California, but my friend had business here which he thought he could better prosecute on the ground." He shook his head despondingly as he added, "I fear he will never be able to attend to any business again."

"Oh, he will come round, no doubt," said Flix, as there was a stir in the crowd caused by the preparations made to move the wounded man. The other, who had been talking to Flix, instantly went round to the scene of action. In a moment or two he was back, however, a look of new interest in his face. Lifting his hat, he touched Flix lightly on the arm.

"Excuse me," he said; "is your name Forester?"

"My name is Forester," Flix answered.

"I heard your name spoken," said the young man, "and you were the person indicated. Are you a lawyer?"

"I am a lawyer," was the reply. Flix wondering at the solicitude of his manner. "There is my card."

The stranger took it and read the name, "Felix Forester."

"You must be the very man," he said, looking up with a half-smile. "My friend had some law business which he intended to intrust to you."

"Ah, indeed?" Flix felt a strange contraction of the muscles of his face, and then, for fear that the change would be noticed, gave a dubious lawyer-like smile. "May I inquire your friend's name."

"De Neal, sir. I think I have his card—ah, yes, here it is," taking a card from his pocket, on which the name E. de Neal was engraved, and also the name of the newspaper on which he was employed.

"Your friend is an editor, perhaps," said Flix, scanning the piece of pasteboard.

"That is his profession, sir; but I must be going—they have lifted him, I see."

"I should be happy to have a call from you, and to hear further of the welfare of your friend," Flix responded.

"I will communicate with you, sir, with pleasure. I scarcely dare hope that my poor friend may be able to make his visit in person, but you shall hear from him, sir, if he lives." He touched his hat and turned away.

"What a very handsome fellow," said Flix to himself, "and what a strange, terrible coincidence if nothing more. The name," he studied the card, "there's a 'De' in it, at all events—curious! I wonder how all this is going to end? It's not pleasant to hold the balance of life and death in one's hand. I hope most sincerely that I may be mistaken in my suspicions. What a fool I was not to ask him the nature of his business." He had crossed the street. Miss Grace Poulisa stood looking out of the glass half-door of the handsome shop where he had left her. Recalled to the fact that she was yet there, Flix entered. The anxious face brightened, though she asked in a voice scarcely above a whisper, "Was he killed?" The little boy suspended the automatic motion of his elbows to hear.

"No, not killed."

"Thank God for that; I have been suffering from the fear that he was."

"Why should you suffer; the accident probably could not have been prevented."

"I don't know; John is very reckless—yet in this case—as the other horses were running—I—I hope it was not his fault. Did you see papa?"

"Yes; he was superintending the removal."

"He has had some experience in such things. I was nearly killed once by a runaway horse."

"You, Miss Grace? Dear me, I never heard of it." His thoughts are with his business and the strange client, who by the providence of God he may be destined never to meet, but he is looking in the fair young face with that interest which absence of mind sometimes simulates, and the pretty cheeks redden and the conscious eyes are cast down.

"Oh, yes; it was two years ago. I was thrown just opposite the Opera House, and taken up for dead. I did then declare that I never would ride again after I got well, and I kept my word for a year; here is papa. Is he terribly hurt, papa?"

"I am afraid so, my dear. Ah, Forester, shall I set you down at your office? The grays are all right, my dear," turning to Grace, who breathlessly awaited Flix's answer, which evidently was of great importance to her. Flix took out his watch, reflected a moment and declined. He did not notice the look of disappointment that spread over the face opposite him. If he had I fear it would not have altered his decision. He bade them good-morning, shaking hands with both, and went out into the pale sunshine. The wounded man had by this time been taken away, and the crowd had lessened, a few street Arabs standing about the broken vehicle, which had been drawn to one side, and probably speculating upon the extent of the injury done to man and beast. As Flix left the store a tall, blue-coated, brass-buttoned policeman turned a corner a few blocks above. He descried Flix and hastened his steps, walking faster and faster, till Flix, stopping for a moment to look at something that arrested his attention in a shop-window, the guardian of the public honor came up with him. Flix turned as the shadow fell upon the huge crystal of plate-glass, through which shone resplendent the choicest paintings and engravings arranged with true artistic skill, and at once responded to the grim salutation, the respectful touch of the cap.

"You look as if you had something to say," he exclaimed, straightening his handsome figure.

"I have," was the laconic response.

"Well," his face expressed mingled pleasure and anxiety.

"We have found the young lady.

"Where?" queried Flix, drawing a long breath of relief, and thinking of his mother.

"In Virginia."

CHAPTER XXVII.—"THE DEAD MAN'S POOL?"

"I HAVE gained my point. I was determined that the advance should come from her, and now I do believe the little wretch likes me."

So wrote Sylve de Latude, who had made a practice of jotting down her thoughts, after a fashion, not by any means in a methodical, diary style, since she had taken up her abode at the Braddocks'. Her school was prospering famously, and save that the restraints of her new calling irked her somewhat at times, she rather liked the employment. She sat this morning, as she wrote, at the window, which was absolutely vine-clad, covered all over with the rich lush vine of the Virginia creeper, looking out over the road that stretched long and sinuously through the far distance, till it was lost at the summit of a steep hill. Never, in her bravest attire, had she looked so beautiful as now, in her plain cotton dress, that clung to her lithe figure as if it was molded to it; her hair thrown back and down in glorious abandon; her fearless eyes filled with a softly-luminous light.

The deep shadows, with twilight in their wake, that stretched solemnly from the trunks of the tall trees far across the yellow-green of the meadow-grass, lengthened perceptibly, and the fair, frail tints of the Autumn-leaves took a deeper glow from the setting sun that bathed all the west in a lovely golden tinge. The person about whom she had jotted down her thoughts so carelessly was Eve Lewin. The lonely girl had been so in need of companionship that, acting upon hints suggested by Raphael and backed by Nurse Desire, she had gradually narrowed the cold gulf of ordinary courtesy, and shaken hands across it, acknowledging to herself that the brilliant Northern beauty was worth cultivating, and graciously concluding to let bygones be bygones. To an unreflecting hate had succeeded, as is sometimes the case, a devoted friendship on the part of the Southern girl; but, though Sylve was always agreeable and sometimes affectionate in her presence, her earlier sentiments were but little changed, if any. She regarded Eve as a sort of rival, and never took the pains to undeceive herself in the estimate she had first formed, though she was not above sedulously striving to gain her regard. It was a proud moment for her when Eve first petitioned to enter her class as a pupil, and, since then, the friendless, single-hearted girl had conceived a strong affection for her whilom enemy, which Sylve returned indifferently.

While sitting at the window, Sylve heard footsteps, and hurriedly shut her book and put it out of the way. It was Salome's dark, bright face that looked in upon her.

"I have just had a letter," she said, "from a little second cousin of mine. The poor thing has lost her mother, and has really nowhere to go."

By this time she had come forward to where Sylve sat.

"Is she very poor?" asked Sylve.

"Very; her little note is almost tragic in its pathos. She had a mother, she is dead; she had a lover, he has forgotten her. Poor little soul! It was a marriage—that of her parents—that displeased everybody—in the family. I mean. She was a bright, capable little woman any man might be proud to call wife. He got his bread by his wits," continued Salome, "but he did everything for her. They say if he had lived, he would have made a fortune." She drew nearer. Her face assumed an expression of mystery. "You know that place down the road?" she added.

"The Dead Man's Pool?" queried Sylve.

"The same. I told you its history. The poor fellow who was murdered was this girl's father.

Sylve shuddered a little, and involuntarily cast a glance back into the deepening shadows of the room.

"She knows that, of course?"

"She knows that he was killed in Virginia. I have never told her the particulars as I know them."

"And was the murderer never found out?"

"Never. He, poor man—the peddler—had a large sum of money with him, which, as the banks were a little shaky at that time, he had just drawn out. For that money he was killed. I shall never forget that time. It was the year before I went North to school, and I was a girl of ten. A stranger, who had been thrown from his horse behind the fence, and paralyzed by the shock, testified afterwards to hearing the whole affair, though, of course, he could see nothing. He was carried up to Colonel Lewin's, and was there for weeks. I saw him several times—one of the finest-looking men I ever met, not so handsome as peculiar-looking; an exceptional face he had—a marked, expressive face—that once seen is never forgotten. By-the-way—why, yes, I remember, his name was Forester, though, I think, he must have been an older man than your guardian."

"But what are you going to do?" asked Sylve, turning her head aside at mention of the name, and speaking impetuously.

"Do? What would you do? Wouldn't you send for the poor little thing? She must have a home."

"Yes, I would," said Sylve, anxiously looking forward to some new excitement; "she and I will be sisters in misfortune. But what about her lover? Who is he?"

"There I'm in the dark," said Salome. "I only know that there was a young man who was very attentive to her; but he has gone off somewhere, and forgotten her, I suppose."

"Is she handsome?"

"I've been waiting for that question," laughed Salome. "Well, yes, a sort of flower-like beauty—a lily, her mother always called her. Poor lily, now that the stalk is broken, her head hangs down. Well?—rising—"I think I will write to her. No doubt, being a New England girl, she is thoroughly capable. When you are tracked to your lair, and go home and be good, like a sensible girl, she can step into your shoes and take the school."

"That goal of the disappointed and unloved," murmured Sylve. "Well, she will be welcome when that time comes."

"And the great fortune."

"I don't care for the great fortune," says Sylve, doggedly.

"Don't you? Wait till the outer coating of your romance has worn off, and see," Salome retorts.

"Do you want to get rid of me?"

"If you do I'll take her," cries a fresh young voice, and in the deepening dusk a bright face is visible. Eve Lewin trips in, her long muslin draperies making her look weird in the half-light as she comes forward. "Do say you're tired of her, Salome, please do," pleads the pretty bird voice, "Take pity on my seclusion and loneliness. Why, I am actually driven to talk to dumb, inanimate things, the pictures on the walls, the chairs and tables. Come and pay me a long visit, Miss Brown. Raphael will be here soon, and I can't possibly entertain him by myself. It's so stupid, just two and no more."

"You forget," laughed Sylve, "two is company—three is none."

"Oh, don't quote those musty old sayings. Why might it not be as well, two is company, three is more, or better."

"I've a great mind to go," says Sylve to herself, thinking of the paragon she has never seen, Raphael Wilde.

"You shall share my bed, and Dee is a lovely cook," pleads Eve, waxing eloquent. "She gets up such tiny, ravishing dinners, and there is always more than enough. I'm continually fretting that there isn't some one to help me eat them. Think of my sitting down alone at dinner! It's absolutely terrible."

"Why don't you have Dee sit with you?"

Eve opened her great blue eyes to their widest extent, and then said, in a colder voice:

"Dee knows her place too well."

"I'm afraid we should quarrel, our notions about things are so different," said Sylve, shrugging her shoulders.

"Oh, no, we'd both concede a little—that is, I would, I think. Suppose we try it for a while. Come and stay with me—as long as you can. Take pity on my forlorn state."

It all ended in Sylve's effects being carried over to Lewin House in a little brown trunk, which Salome lent her; so the once despised teacher became an inmate of the old mansion that but a few years before had made such a brilliant show. She carried thither her Northern energy and ingenuity to bear upon household matters, and new comforts and elegancies sprang upon them. Sometimes she acknowledged to herself that it was a little tiresome, hearing so perpetually the praise of the coming man, for Eve, restricted from other topics by her utterly secluded life, could talk of little else, and if she dropped the theme it was taken up by Dee, who, gathering all the virtues she had ever seen or heard of, concentrated them in one name, Raphael Wilde.

PICTORIAL SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN ILLUSTRATED PRESS.

The Severe Winter in Paris.

Since 1830 Paris has not been so enshrouded in snow as this Winter. December 5th there was an average fall of from forty to fifty centimetres. In some unprotected places it lay from three to four feet deep. Cabs, street-cars and omnibuses, with four and five horses hitched to them, moved as slowly as hearses; hundreds of wagons remained blocked in the snow; the horses were removed from them and led home to their stables; no one ventured into the streets unless compelled to. Never since the Commune has Paris looked so gloomy; the railroads leading out of the city were all blocked, so that travel and exportation were at a stand-still. It cost the city 1,500,000 francs to clear the streets from snow. It cost 100,000 francs the first two days to clear the sidewalks. Besides the usual 3,000 street-cleaners, thousands of others were pressed into service. Workmen were paid thirty centimes an hour by day and sixty by night for their work. The Seine River was frozen over, which has only occurred during the last century five times.

The Tay Bridge Disaster.

The exploration of the bed of the river, in which lie the wreck of the train and the fallen girders, has been carried on with as much vigor as the state of the weather would permit, six divers being employed besides a large number of trawlers, who, with ropes and hooks, have been dragging different parts of the water from boats. The divers find that the train divided itself into two portions, of which only the foremost portion, with the engine and tender, has yet been discovered, lying inside the girders. The shells of carriages remaining were almost empty; not only the passengers' bodies, but the cushions, seats and partitions had been forced out by the current of the river or the tide. The wreckage brought up consists mostly of planks and beams from the permanent way of the railroad, or floor of the bridge, and even these thick timbers are very much broken up. As they floated towards the shores crowds of men, women and children grappled for them, forming scenes, particularly at Broughty Ferry, of a very active and picturesque character.

The New Year's Water Festival, Burmah.

On the first day of the New Year begins the "Water Festival," which lasts for four days. At daybreak the people proceed to the pagodas, which they sprinkle with water, offering up at the same time prayers for a plentiful season. They also present jars of water to the priests, and ask forgiveness for the sins of the past year. After this a kind of Burmese carnival begins, only, instead of sweetmeats and nosegays, water is thrown, sometimes scented, or with flowers in it. The fronts of the houses are decorated with green leaves and flowers, and the inmates send showers of water on the passers-by; or bands of young men and women parade the streets armed with earthen jars of water and silver cups, ducking every one they meet amid peals of laughter. Sometimes these bands meet, and have regular contests, drenching each other. No one, whatever his rank, escapes the liquid salutation; indeed, bad luck is sure to befall those who are not wet at least once during the day, and the license gives rise to much harmless merriment. The original idea of the festival is that of washing away the sins, impurities and ill feelings of the past year.

The Zulu King in Captivity.

The ex Zulu King bears his captivity well, his anxiety about the presence and "sympathy" of his numerous wives, and the regulate quality of food, having been relieved. He is proud of his European clothes, and his advancement in learning to read and write. With the British officers at the Castle, at Cape Town, South Africa, he has become a great favorite. No restraints are placed upon him, and he gives no trouble whatever to his custodians.

Distribution of Dowries to Poor Girls in Rome.

A mode of beneficence common in Europe and not without its attractive features is shown in this illustration. It is on the continent a very common thing for a person of wealth to create a fund the income of which is annually given among a certain number of meritorious and virtuous young girls, in order to enable them to marry advantageously. The artist Ferrari depicts in our illustration a scene of such a distribution, which occurred on the Feast of the Immaculate Conception, December 8th, in the church of Montserrat at Rome, which is the national church of the Spaniards. Some charitable persons from the peninsula established the fund in the sixteenth century, and, invested in town and country property, it has continued three centuries to do its meritorious work. The distribution is made under the direction of the Spanish Benedictines, and was attended by the Spanish Ambassadors to the Pope and the King, by the Spanish artists in Rome and many of their countrypeople of both sexes, who form the Spanish colony in the Eternal City.

Another Attempt on the Life of Alfonso XII.

It is sad to see that the young King of Spain is decidedly unpopular with his people. The overthrow of the Carlists, in which he took part, ought to have won him the attachment of a people not insensible to military glory. The charming character of Mercedes and her early death seemed to gather around him a nation's sympathy, but there seems a lack of personal magnetism about him, he has not the charm of popularity. He had been driving out in a phaeton with the Queen, attended only by two lackeys and a courier, and was just returning to the palace, when an attempt was made upon his life. As the light vehicle passed under the shadow of the Puerta del Principe, which opens on the Plaza del Oriente, a man fired twice with a Lefaucheux double-barreled pistol. The first ball almost grazed the neck of the King and the forehead of Queen Christine, who, uttering a cry of alarm, flung her arms around Alfonso. The assassin, Francisco Otero Gonzalez, a native of Gustin, in the province of Lugo, aged nineteen, was at once arrested. When the Queen recovered from the shock, reassured by the King as to his safety, ministers and grandees crowded around them to protest their devotedness to the royal family and their horror of the shameful attempt. The Queen was greatly prostrated by the fearful ordeal through which she had just passed and which shadows with gloom the life on which she has just entered, and which Spain may be said to have promised to invest with loyalty and chivalrous devotion.

SCIENTIFIC INTELLIGENCE

At the Last Sitting of the Paris Society of Geography a letter from M. Sibiriakoff, one of the promoters of Nordenskjöld's North Asiatic Expedition, was read. This generous gentleman proposes to the Society to send a handsome subscription, in case a French expedition is sent to those parts.

A Committee has been appointed to receive subscriptions for the purpose of commemorating the retirement of Dr. Andrews from the Vice-Presidency of the Queen's College, Belfast, by a bust or portrait to be placed in the College, and a prize or scholarship to be founded in the same institution in connection with chemical science.

The Excavations at Olympia under the auspices of the German Government have been resumed this Winter with a force of 100 workmen. A statue of Nemesis, and heads of Titus, of a kneeling infant, and of Faionio's Nike have already been unearthed this season. The total number of works of art thus far excavated is sixty-seven, consisting of forty-one figures and twenty-six heads.

Some Curious Statistics of gas-lighting in Paris have been published recently. The greatest duration of public lighting is 14 hours 30 minutes, and smallest 5 hours 25 minutes. The cost of gas for public and private establishments is $10,000,000, about $5 per head for each inhabitant of Paris. The total consumption of gas is 6,500,000,000 cubic feet. In 1880 the Paris Municipality intends to enlarge its lighting expenses by $80,000, and $40,000 for establishing new gas-lamps. No provision appears to be made for electricity.

Decomposition of Chlorine.—The elementary character of chlorine has been contested from the very start, and it was only the weighty authority of Sir Humphrey Davy that put a stop to the discussion in the journals. The late Professor Schoenbein, of Switzerland, always maintained that chlorine contained oxygen, and his arguments and proofs were difficult to overcome. We now hear that another Swiss chemist, Victor Meyer, of Zurich, has been experimenting in a new direction, and that he claims to have dissociated chlorine, and to have separated the oxygen from it. He accomplished this by exposing pure chlorine gas to a very high temperature in a vapor-density apparatus invented by himself. The dissociated gas issuing out of the apparatus was passed through iodide of potassium to free it of the chlorine, and the unabsorbed oxygen was collected and tested as usual. Thus chlorine appears to be a compound body made up of a new element to be called murium, and of oxygen, possibly confirming the views of Schoenbein and other chemists.

Mind and Matter.—Professor Allman in his address before the British Association says we are not forced to the conclusion that there is nothing in the universe but matter and force. The simplest physical law is absolutely inconceivable by the highest of the brutes, and no one would be justified in assuming that man had already attained the limit of his powers. Whatever may be the mysterious bond which connects organization with psychical endowments, the one great fact—a fact of inestimable importance—stands out clear and freed from all obscurity and doubt, that from the first dawn of intelligence there is with every advance in organization a corresponding advance in mind. Mind as well as body is thus traveling onwards through higher and still higher phases; the great law of evolution is shaping the destiny of our race; and though now we may at most but indicate some weak point in the generalization which would refer consciousness as well as life to a common material source, who can say that in the far-off future there may not yet be evolved other and higher faculties from which light may stream in upon the darkness and reveal to man the great mystery of thought.

QUEEN VICTORIA is said to have a long memory for persons and faces. Her whole thoughts now seem centred in her soldiers, especially in those who have been wounded in her service; and in looking over paintings of subjects in the recent wars, she knows and remembers the names of all those soldiers—even privates—on whom she has conferred the Victoria Cross or other honors, at once picking them out in the painting and asking after them by name.

GENERAL LUCIUS FAIRCHILD, to succeed Minister Lowell at Madrid, is promoted from the consul generalship at Paris. He was in Liverpool in 1872, and was transferred to the Paris office in 1879, which he still holds. General Fairchild was born in Ohio in 1831, removed to Wisconsin at an early age, and went to the war from that State as captain in a three months' regiment, and was afterwards commissioned as captain in the Regular Army. He saw much service in the field, lost an arm at Gettysburg, and was commissioned brigadier general from that date for gallantry. He then entered the civil service, first as Secretary of State and, later, as Governor, holding the latter office for three terms.

COLONEL JOHN W. FOSTER, the new envoy to Russia, was born in Evansville, Ind., about 1834, was educated at Bloomington University and at Harvard Law School, and commenced the practice of law at his native city as a partner of ex-Governor Conrad Baker. At the outbreak of the war he was commissioned an officer of Indiana volunteers, and saw an unusual amount of hard service. After the war he became editor and proprietor of the Daily Evansville Journal, was chairman of the Republican executive committee in 1872, and was largely instrumental in the success of his party in that year. He has been Minister to Mexico since 1873, has recently traveled through most of the States of Mexico, and is credited with great diplomatic ability.

ABDER RAHMAN KHAN, who may soon be the strongest claimant for the Afghan throne, is the son of Afzul Khan, elder brother of Shere Ali, and, according to English ideas of primogeniture, natural successor to Dost Mohammed. In 1865 he rebelled and seized Balkh, and in 1866 seized Cabul and proclaimed his father Ameer. Afzul was recognized by the Indian Government, and obeyed by the greater part of the country, but took to drinking and became unpopular, and, on his death, Abder Rahman found himself obliged to recognize his uncle, Shere Ali, as Ameer. He rebelled, however, his uncle, Shere Ali, as Ameer. He rebelled, however, his uncle, Shere Ali, as Ameer. He rebelled, however, OBVERSE OF THE MEDAL PRESENTED TO THE LATE FRANK LESLIE BY THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT IN 1867.

REVERSE OF THE MEDAL PRESENTED TO THE LATE FRANK LESLIE BY THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT IN 1867.

FRANK LESLIE'S DESK AND CHAIR.

IN the southeastern corner of the immense editorial room, commanding a view of the editorial desks, the library, and his loved Art Department, Mr. Leslie used to work. From this corner were issued the instructions, with electric rapidity, the carrying out of which was destined to enlighten, educate and delight the people of this vast continent — destined to render the name of Frank Leslie a veritable household word. Seating himself at his desk, he would, in the short, sharp, incisive tone of one accustomed to be obeyed, summon such editor, or artist, or engraver, or chief of department, as the occasion demanded, and, in a few pithy and well-chosen words, convey his idea, always, however, asking for ideas in exchange, and with a gentle and courteous humility that emboldened the most timid of his staff to suggest, argue and urge. Immediately behind his chair was the door of his private office, whither he would occasionally retire to confer with author or artist, or to consult with Mrs. Leslie, whose editorial sanctum stands still further back, and upon whose opinion in business matters he set so high a value.

In his time, Frank Leslie had many honors conferred upon him, ever unsought for, ever unsolicited. He was appointed a Commissioner to represent the United States at the Exhibition in Paris in 1867, and his Report on the Fine Arts in connection with his mission was an exhaustive and masterful résumé of the entire subject, and handled with the dexterity of an expert. Mr. Leslie was presented by the Emperor Napoleon III., in person, with commemorative medals of which we give obverse and reverse illustrations. The medals are of bronze, and on the obverse of each, in bas-relief, is the profile of the Emperor. The large medal was presented by the French Government "Pour services rendus," or services rendered, and inscribed with the name of the Commissioner on a tablet borne by two cherubs, a laurel crown above, the Imperial eagle beneath; the medal for services on the International Jury was exceptional, and only presented to the members of the Jury, of which Mr. Leslie was one; while the Imperial Commission Medal was presented as a souvenir of the Exposition. As the boy is father to the man, at the age of thirteen years Frank Leslie sketched and engraved the coat-of-arms of the town of Ipswich, his place of birth, a notable work for one so young — notable from its treatment, fidelity and workmanship. As the boy was intensely proud of this his first step on the path he was destined to cleave for himself in the after-time, so in that after-time did the man look fondly back upon that first step in the art which brought him name and fame and fortune. Ipswich, too, was justly proud of this effort of her youthful son, and when, after an absence of seventeen years, Mr. Leslie revisited his native city, the engraving, which we illustrate, was proudly produced and exhibited.

THE ANNUAL FLOWER PARTY.

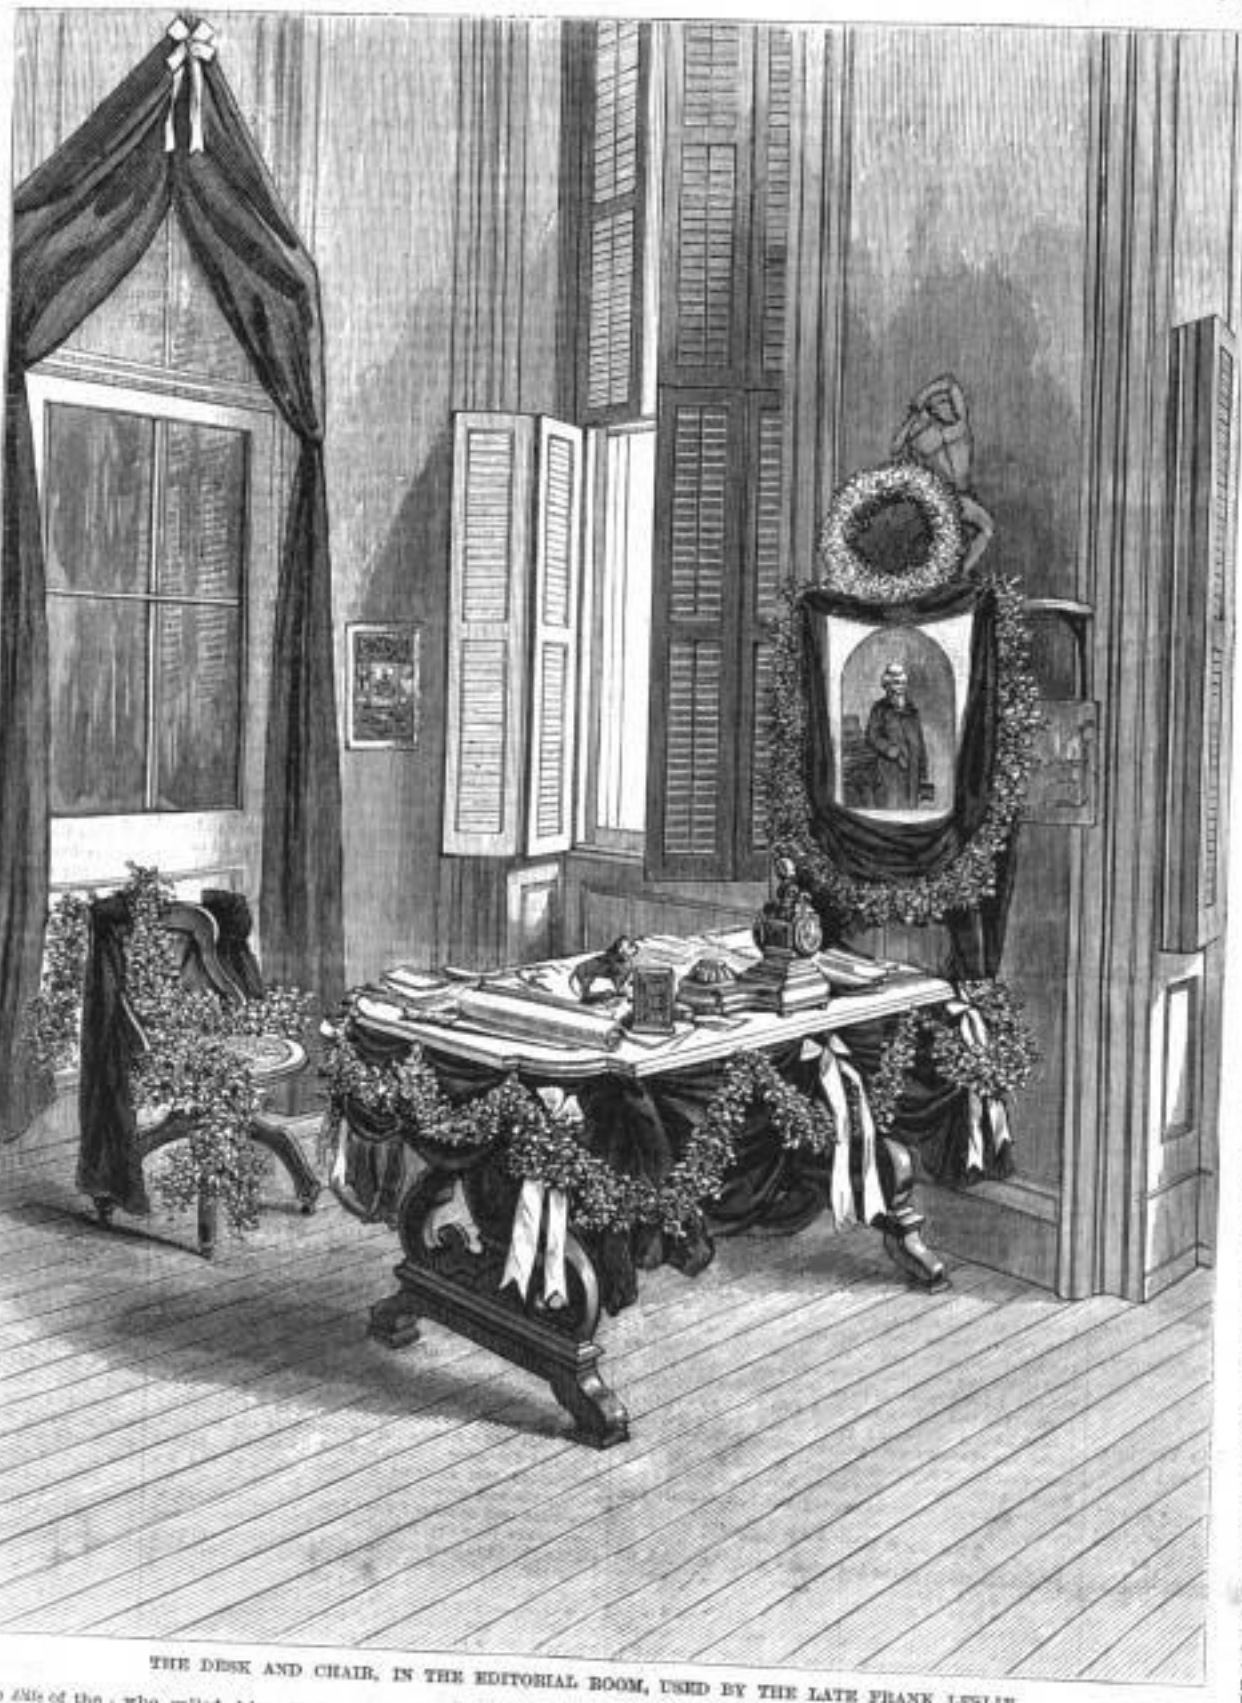
FOR several years the Young Men's Charity Association of New York have been in the habit of giving a flower party for the benefit of the Northeastern Homeopathic Dispensary. These parties have always drawn together the élite of the city for an evening of pleasurable entertainment. This season the party was given at Delmonico's, on Monday evening, January 19th. The ballroom was decorated with vast flowering plants on brackets about the walls, and large pieces on the corners, while from the crystal chandeliers hung delicate vines. In the parlor was placed a large bower of flowers, from which all the guests were presented with bouquets, those for the gentlemen being boutonnières, while each lady received her bouquet in a fancy basket, surrounded by a gilt horseshoe, inscribed with "Good luck." Miss Eugenie Mortimer Earle presided in the floral temple, and wore a dress of brocaded white satin in Persian colors, with princesse back, decollété, and short sleeves. No flowers were sold as on previous occasions of the kind, but the tickets were this year sold at a higher price than usual, and covered all the incidentals of the evening. After 9 P.M. no tickets were sold.

After an hour's promenade concert by Lander's orchestra, the ball was opened at 10 o'clock by the Floor Committee, followed by the guests. Supper was served at 11 o'clock, after which dancing was resumed and kept up until a late hour.

RESCUED FROM THE SHEPHERD'S FOLD.

THE most important rescue that has signalized the New York Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children since its organization, was that made on Saturday, January 17th, at the building known as the "Shepherd's Fold," No. 157 East Sixtieth Street. It was conducted at the time by the Rev. Edward Cowley, who called himself Secretary of the Shepherd's Fold, and his wife. Complaints had been made frequently to the Society against the way poor children sent to the Fold were treated, and the raid of the 17th was authorized by warrants issued by Judge Donohue of the Supreme Court, on the application of the Society's officer. The house, externally an imposing four-story, brown-stone structure, was visited early on Saturday morning by Superintendent Jenkins, and a number of the officers of the Society and the Police Department. Admission was denied, but the officers gained access, and made a thorough search of the premises. Twenty-four children, poorly dressed, sick, emaciated and nearly starved to death, were found. Hastily gathering them together, the officers had them dressed in their out-of-door clothing, and then hurried them into six coaches that were in waiting. From the house they were driven directly to the Supreme Court-room, where, after arranging them before Judge Donohue, Mr. Delafield reported the action that had been taken. Although the warrants called for twenty-eight children, but twenty-four were found, and one of them, little Louis Victor, was hunted up in St. Luke's Hospital, whither he had been sent by "Secretary" Cowley in a dying condition, the result of starvation.

Wishing to give Mr. Cowley, or some representative of the Fold, an opportunity to be heard, Judge Donohue adjourned the examination to Saturday, 24th inst. Before doing so he issued an order consigning the children to the care of the Society pending the investigation. As soon as the legal forms were settled the children were taken by Mr. Elbridge T. Gerry, President of the Society, to a restaurant, and given the first good meal they had had for months, and in the case of some, for years.



It is said by Superintendent Jenkins that "several complaints have been made to this Society heretofore against this institution, but they have been based in some instances in such a way that the Society did not feel justified in proceeding against the Shepherd's Fold. I have heard that Mr. Cowley was formerly employed on the Island, and when the Shepherd's Fold was organized in 1868 he remained with it some time and then withdrew. Soon after he organized the Children's Fold. Two years ago he resigned from the latter, on account of the complaints made against him for having starved children under his care, taking with him some children whom he placed in the Shepherd's Fold. The Children's Fold removed to Tenth Avenue and Ninety-third Street from the house in East Sixtieth Street. Upon its removal Mr. Cowley took possession of the Sixtieth Street house." Besides the complaints of interested parties, there have been many made to the Society by the neighbors, who said that the children were crying continually; also, that children were locked in the rooms, as was shown by the fact that other children had to pass food to them through the windows.

The children since their rescue have received the best of medical attention, of which they were in sore need. Food has been given them sparingly, and when the case comes up in court for thorough investigation, they will bear little resemblance to the woebegone unfortunates of a week ago.

Louis Victor, the miserable child who was taken to St. Luke's Hospital, and the discovery of whose starvation and ill-treatment resulted in breaking up of the Fold, is still in a precarious condition. At times he starts up with a morbidly-ravenous appetite, calling for "Meat! meat!" and clawing and tearing it when he gets it with a ravenous appetite. The house-physicians declare that the boy's sufferings are directly caused by the lack of proper food and nourishment. They say that if the child had remained in the Fold five days longer he would have been a corpse.

DEATH OF AN AMERICAN EMPEROR.

THE late Joshua A. Norton, better known as "Norton I. Emperor of California and Protector of Mexico," was one of the most familiar characters of San Francisco. He was born in London, Eng., February 4th, 1817, of Jewish parentage, and settled in San Francisco in November, 1848, hailing from Valparaiso, Chile, where he arrived but a short time before from Cape Town, South Africa. He is remembered by the early pioneers as having been a shrewd, safe and prosperous man, possessing more than ordinary intelligence, fertile of resource and enterprise. His business pursuits were varied. At one time he was buying-partner for three or four mercantile houses in the interior of the State, and in this capacity manifested great business ability. Then he engaged in the real estate business, in which he continued, with apparent prosperity, a number of years. While in this business he became possessor of much valuable real estate, and, judging by the frequent occurrence of his name on the city and county records, and the monetary value represented, he was in those early times one of the largest land speculators. His hallucination was that he was Emperor of California and Protector of Mexico. In accordance with this belief, his sole purpose in life was to properly administer to his subjects, and do everything possible for the promotion of prosperity and the advancement of his dominions. His diplomatic relations with other countries were not lost sight of, and he profited by closely observing the progress or downfall of other nations, using their experience in his home policy. He claimed to have reconciled the French and Prussians, and to have brought about the peace that was established between them at the close of the Franco-Prussian War. He also claimed that the Rebellion was terminated through his intercession, and that the success attending the reconstruction of the Union was due, in a great part, to his wise counsel. California's great resources were his pride. San Francisco, his favorite city, he called "The Queen of the Pacific." By proclamations (which sometimes, to humor his whim, were published in the city press) he communicated to his subjects his ideas of progress and justice. His belief that he ruled most royally was strengthened by the homage that all showed him. He could readily be recognized by his dress, as he paid no attention whatever to the varying fashion. His coat was navy-blue, cut in military style, and lavishly trimmed with brass buttons. On the shoulders were heavy epaulets, usually tarnished with exposure to the weather. In his hat there always waved a plume of feathers. He always wore a buttonhole flower. His scientific knowledge, though some times mixed, was considerable. He was on familiar terms with all officials, high and low, feeling that they were merely his favored subjects. He was temperate in his habits. When he wished money he would sign one of the Imperial drafts, and, presenting it to an acquaintance who humored his delusion, get it cashed.

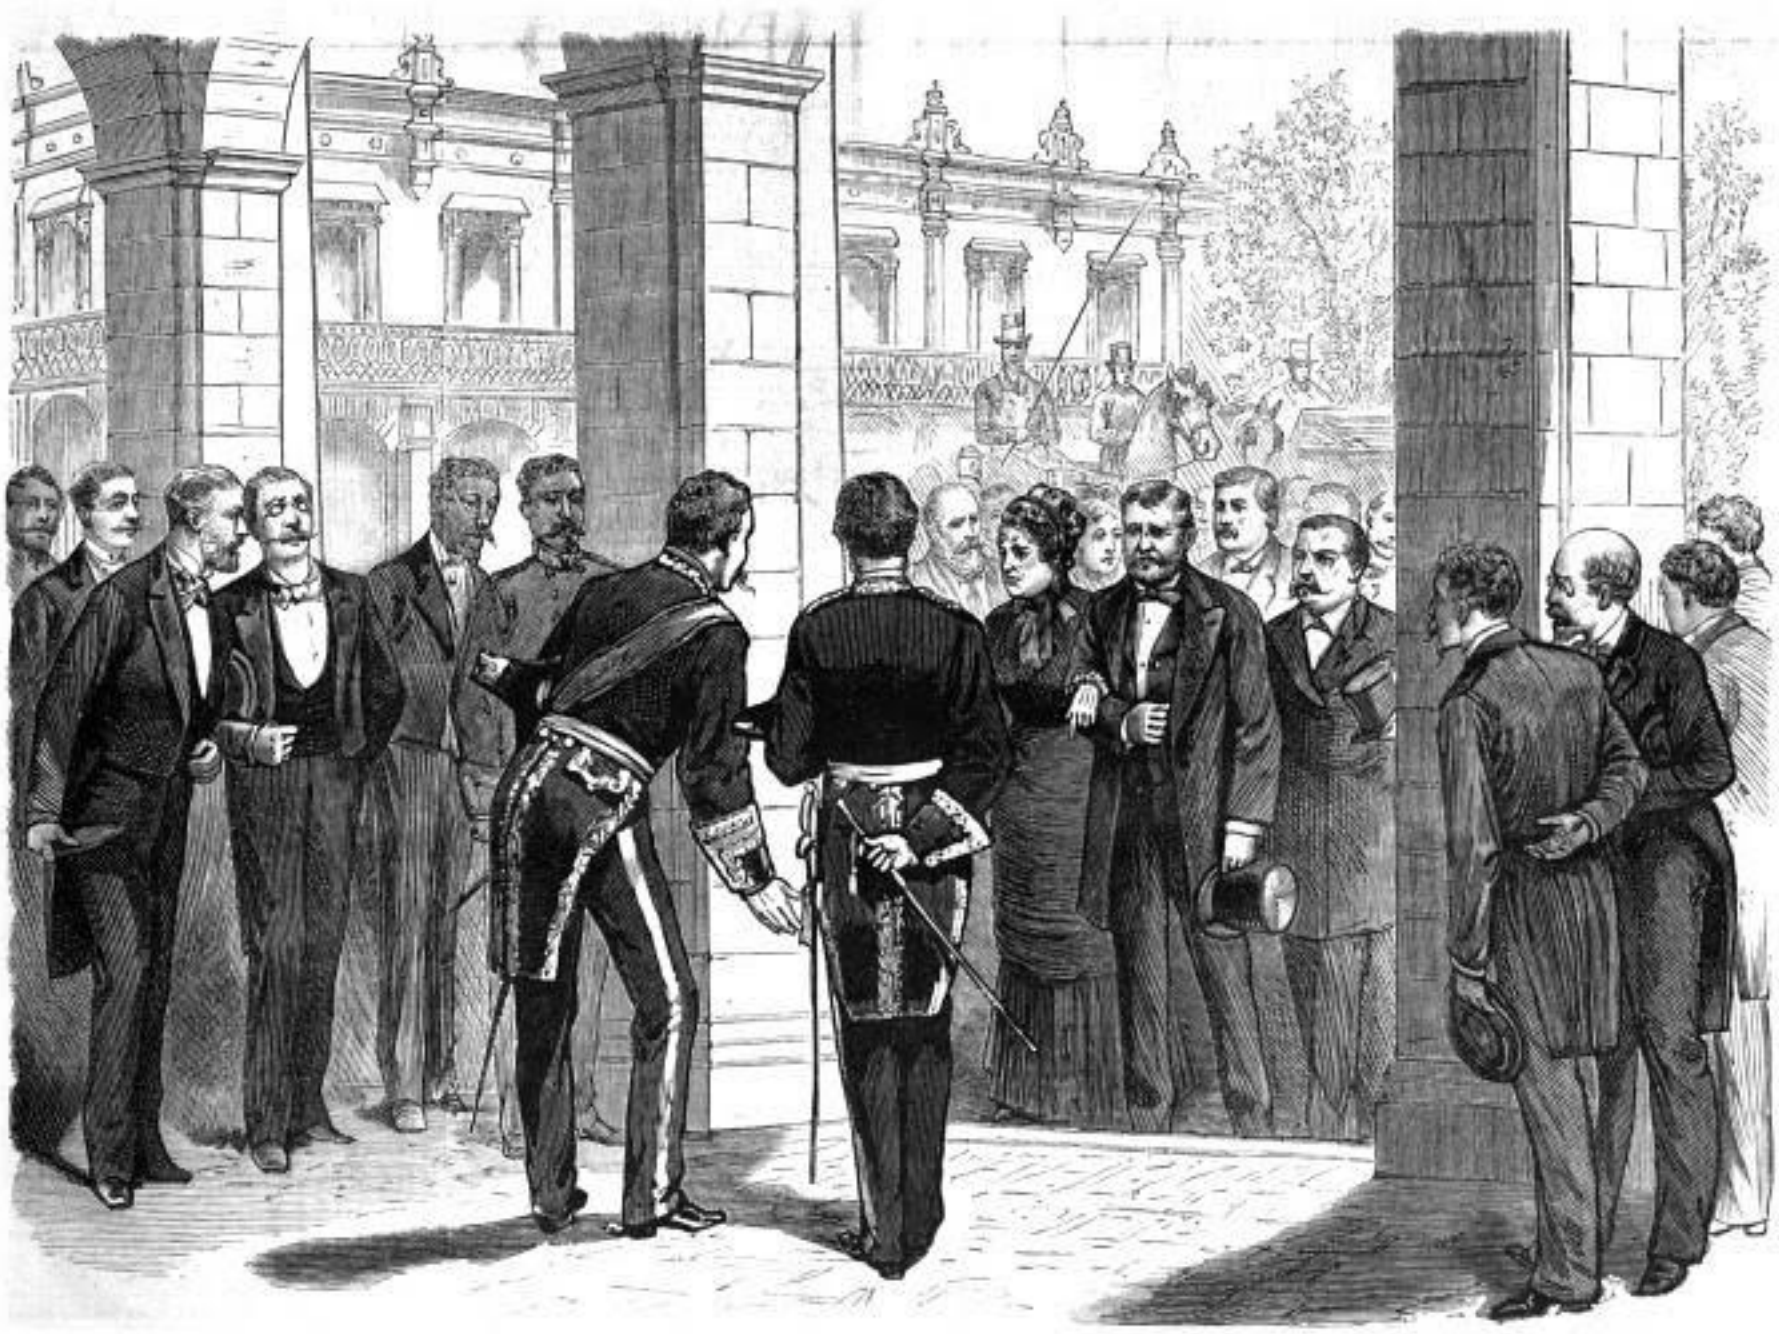
Norton was a member of the Masonic Order, belonging to Occidental Lodge, F. and A. M., San Francisco. As he was in good standing up to the time of the appearance of his malady, his brethren have since then contributed a regular stipend to his support. He is dead, and no citizen of San Francisco could have been taken away who would be more generally missed than Joshua A. Norton, alias Norton I., Emperor.

HON. JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL.

JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL, who has been nominated by the President for Minister to England, is at present representing our Government at the Spanish Court. His nomination is in the line of a promotion to the highest diplomatic position with which it is in the power of the Republic to honor any of its citizens. In political matters he has never taken any prominent part; in public life he has simply filled for a pleasant season the post of Ambassador at Madrid, but in the great world of letters he has been long and most favorably known. He was born in Cambridge, Mass., February 22d, 1819, graduated at Harvard University in 1839, and studied law, but never practiced, preferring the walks of authorship, which he had entered before leaving college. In 1855 Mr. Longfellow resigned his position as Professor of Modern Languages and Belles Lettres in Harvard, and Mr. Lowell was appointed his successor; but instead of entering at once upon his new duties, he visited Europe and spent a year in study, chiefly at Dresden. From 1857 to 1862 he edited the Atlantic Monthly. When the alumni of Harvard University held the memorial services for those of its members who had fallen during the war, he wrote the poem for the sad occasion. In 1872 he made a second visit to Europe, spending two years in traveland study, and returning with the degree of LL.D. conferred upon him by the English University of Cambridge. In the Fall of 1874 President Grant tendered him the Mission to Russia, but he declined, and George H. Boker, of Philadelphia, was appointed. In July, 1877, President Hayes appointed him to the Spanish Mission, which he accepted, when the Faculty of the University refused to receive the resignation of his professorship and granted him instead an indefinite furlough. On the 16th of July he sailed from New York, and was accompanied down the harbor by a large company of distinguished people, and warm farewells were extended in the cabin of the steamship. His first published work was a volume of miscellaneous poems, entitled "A Year's Life," in 1841. Three years later he published a second volume of poems, in which the famous "Legend of Brittany" and "Prometheus" appeared. His remarkable work "The Bigelow Papers," a collection of humorous poems on political subjects, written in the Yankee dialect, was given to the public in 1848, and a second series was published in 1864.

RECEPTION OF EX-PRESIDENT GRANT IN HAVANA.

WITH the impression of the late cordial reception in Florida, General Grant has proceeded to Havana, thence to take steamer to that republic where as a young officer he first evinced the brilliant and soldier-like qualities which were at a later period of life to raise him to the command of one of the greatest armies in history. The General's party, consisting of Mrs. Grant, his son, Colonel Fred Grant and his wife, General P. H. Sheridan and his wife, and two young ladies, embarked on the steamer Admiral which left Key West at two o'clock on the morning of January 22d. A five hours' run was expected from that outlying port of our republic and the capital of the "Ever Faithful Isle," as Spaniards delight to call Cuba, but the weather disappointed the expectation. It was not till half-past eleven that the Admiral steamed past Moro Castle. As the Admiral entered this port, a small steamer belonging to the Navy Department, and carrying General Arias, Civil Governor of the Province of Havana, and Confidential Adjutant of Captain-General Blanco, several staff officers, Henry C. Hall, the United States Consul, and a number of American citizens, among them General Webb, met the steamer. General Arias then tendered General Grant the hospitalities of the city, and an abode in the Palace, and said that Captain-General Blanco expressed regret at not being in the city to welcome General Grant, but that he hoped to arrive before the party went away. General Grant replied that he would be happy to meet General Blanco. The whole party, immediately after the exchange of courtesies, boarded the small steamer, and went ashore. Large crowds had assembled on the wharves and houses to witness the landing. The party entered carriages belonging to the Captain-General, and were driven to the Palace. Here the distinguished visitor was received at the foot of the staircase of the State Residence by General Callejas, Vice Governor-General, and by Joaquin Carbonell, Secretary of the Government. The scene engraved in this number from a photograph transports the reader to the spot and gives an idea of the interest felt in all classes to scrutinize in life the features of a great general whose fame is world-wide. After the official reception, which was conducted with all the grave and stately Spanish courtesy, General Grant took a drive in the afternoon and received a few intimate friends who happened to be in the city. Colonel of Engineers Cerero, Commander Rivera, Chief of Staff, and Cavalry Commander Sandoval, Adjutant of Captain-General Blanco, were commissioned to attend General Grant and party during their stay. As General Grant wishes to see the island, he will accept invitations to visit a few plantations during his brief sojourn, and as the wishes of his party will coincide with his own, they will enjoy a sight of the great sugar and tobacco plains that give Cuba her great wealth.



FESTIVE MONARCHS OF THE DARK CONTINENT.

COUNT DE SÉMELLÉ who has just returned to Europe from a long and eventful journey in the interior of Africa, underwent, according to his own account, some uncommonly disagreeable experiences during his sojourn on the banks of the Niger. Among other startling episodes narrated in his account of his wanderings is that of his entertainment by the monarch of the Midgi country, against whom he had been warned by that sovereign's neighbors. By no means expectant of a cordial welcome, but resolved to visit Midgiland at any risk, the count crossed the frontiers of that state, and demanded an audience of its King. This request was granted, and he was ushered into the presence of his Majesty, who, before returning his courteous salutations, or, indeed, taking any notice of him, caused 100 full-grown men, collected at court for that purpose, to be decapitated, and then condescended to investigate their remains with his own royal hands and eyes, in order to discover whether or not, on the whole, the omens deducible from them were auspicious to his reception of the intrusive stranger. Fortunately for De Sémellé most of the bodily evidence thus collected proved favorable to him, whereupon the careful monarch greeted him with genial cordiality, and made him a present of twenty "ministering angels" on the spot. The bodies of the colored gentlemen which had been consulted with respect to the count's admission to court were cut up into small portions, and distributed among the inhabitants of the capital for culinary purposes. De Sémellé, who had the honor of supping with the King the same evening, was called upon to partake of the morning's sacrifice. This summons was addressed to him in so emphatic a manner that he did not think fit to decline the horrible invitation.

A less ghastly entertainment awaited him in the Empire of Lokogda, although his reception there by the supreme local authorities was also of a somewhat startling character. When introduced to the presence of the Sultan he politely offered to the latter certain presents of gay cotton goods he had brought with him for that purpose, whereupon his Majesty fell into a violent passion, and roared out: "I am a great Sultan, not a dog! I don't want your paltry presents! But give me brandy or rum, or——!" The rest of the imperial remarks were couched in terms too vigorous for reproduction here. Count de Sémeillé thought his last hour was come, but, summoning up courage, he charged his interpreter to tell the irate Sultan that he (Sémeillé) was a Frenchman, who feared neither poison nor fire: and, what was more, that, during all his travels, he had never before come across so unmitigated a ruffian as the imperial ruler of Lokogda. This bold utterance exercised a tranquillizing effect upon the Sultan's outraged feelings, and his Majesty subsequently deigned to accept a flask of Hollands from his audacious visitor, and to empty it at a draught! Shortly after he had swallowed this potent potion he subsided into a condition of quiet ecstasy, in which the count left him. It appears that the jovial Sultan's steadfast addiction to strong liquor has considerably weakened his prestige with his own subjects, who govern the country by a sort of Parliament, over which he nominally presides. But his Majesty's irrepressible conviviality has infected the Legislature, which—so Count de Sémeillé states—transacts public business from misty morn to dewy eve over the flowing bowl.

A Society Reform.

UNDER the pretty title of the "Cinderella" dance, a sort of semi-ball, rigorously pledged to exhibit its final galop on the healthy, wealthy and wise side of midnight, gives good augury of a return to sober hours in the habits and customs of the English. Another hopeful sign in the practice of abbreviating dinners, both by the reduction of the menu and by the abolition of a male sederant running into much time and many magnums. The fashion of thus curtailing and lightening the once solemn and often dreary meal has indeed been steadily growing for a long time. Those heavy feasts, with their monstrous epergnes and other conventionalities as pompous and depressing as the tray of feathers that used to be carried in front of a funeral, are swept away to the last crumb. There remained, however, much to be done in the way of prandial reform, even at a recent period; and, to the joy of opera and theatre managers, against whose interest the late and long dinners of the past decades carried on a ruthless war, the work of consumed amendment has been taken vigorously in hand by many leaders of society, foremost being the Prince of Wales. As for the quadrille parties named so prettily after the heroine of the Countess d'Aunois's fairy tale, all sensible people must wish them success; and their introduction at the Mansion House is one of the proofs already given by Sir Francis Truscott of a determination to make his Mayoralty memorable for wholesome and graceful improvements.

Robbers of Taste.

EVERY visitor to Egypt (says a correspondent of the London Times), knows the Boulak Museum. It is the best history that exists of the Pharaohs, with their twenty-five dynasties, and the Persians and Greeks who followed them. Statues, pictures, ornaments and writings are all there to tell the story. But the locale is small and damp, and changes were projected this Summer which required the closing of the museum for a time, and the packing away of all the valuables in cases until the alterations were completed. They were all deposited in a neighboring warehouse, under what seemed proper guardianship; but robbers the other day broke in through the roof, and they must have been robbers of a certain rank of intellect, for some eighty or a hundred scarabæi of great value pecuniarily, and impossible to replace, as they related to the early dynasties, were abstracted, although they were things of no apparent worth to an ignorant person.

IT was a brace of communists who met in a secluded hosiery. "Lugsy watch you've got on," said one; "what's she worth?" "Don't know," the other horny-handed replied; "the jeweler was asleep."

"YOU are my treasure, after all," said an old reprobate striving to placate his wife after abusing her for an hour or two. "Oh, yes," she sarcastically answered, "that's the reason, I suppose, you wish me dead so often: you are seeking to lay your treasure up in heaven."

A LITTLE Oil City girl observed her mother measuring cloth by holding it up to her nose with one hand and reaching out to arm's length with the other. She assumed a thoughtful aspect and, after cogitating a few moments, asked, "How can you measure cloth that way? Can you smell a yard?"

THE waiter brings a dish of mushrooms to two diners in whom the sentiment of State pride is well developed. "Call these mushrooms?" says one, contemptuously. "You ought to see the mushrooms that grow where I come from—the great big fellows, as big as dinner-plates, that grow at the feet of the trees." "In my part of the country," says his companion, proudly, "the trees grow at the feet of the mushrooms."

PRINCE MILAN of Servia, who entertains, as is well known, the most extravagant notions about the divine right of kings, became recently greatly excited at a reunion at his palace, while advocating the unlimited prerogatives of his order; and, addressing his prime minister, Dr. Ristick, who ventured to differ with him, exclaimed with much heat of manner, "Ristick, if I order you to jump into the sea, you will certainly jump in headforemost." Dr. Ristick bowed respectfully, and moved toward the door. "Whither are you going, Ristick?" inquired his Highness, bending his brows in displeasure. "Your Highness will pardon me," replied the astute statesman, "I am going to learn to swim."

A QUAKER shopkeeper once met a Quaker customer of his going home with her bundles. He had been absent from his place, and had a notion in his wise head that she had been trading with a rival whom he did not much love. "How much did thee give a yard for this, Mary?" "One dollar." "Why, I am surprised at thee! I could let thee have it for seventy-five cents. And how much for this?" "Two dollars!" "Why, that was unreasonable. I could have let thee have it for one dollar and fifty cents. Why will thee go away trading with strangers and world's people, Mary?" "I don't know what thee is talking about, friend John," she said: "but I did buy all these things at thy store, and, if thee says the truth, thee must owe me considerable money."

PEOPLE WHO ARE NEITHER SICK NOR WELL.

THE number of people who are "neither sick nor well," as the saying is, makes up a large proportion of nearly every community. If you ask what ails them, you get no clear answer; for they do not know themselves. They are not sick enough to be classed with invalids, and yet they are not well enough to enjoy life nor to do any physical or mental work without a wearisome and exhaustive effort. For most of the time they feel miserable and forlorn; every task is a burden; they have no zest in life, and little hope in the future. These unhappy people get little or no relief from physicians, but are rather made worse by the tonics which are too often prescribed, and which leave the vital forces at a lower range after the temporary stimulation has subsided. What they need is a new development of force at the centre of life. If the mainspring of a watch be too weak to drive the movement with energy, the whole machinery drops out of order, and all efforts at repair become useless. Now, an agent that can restore this vital activity must in the very nature of things, give back health to the suffering invalid. It must act as a new and stronger mainspring would act on the machinery of the watch. That such an agent has been discovered is no longer a matter of doubt. It is to be found in what is known as "Compound Oxygen." Some of the remarkable results which have followed its use during the past twelve years will be found recorded in our "Treatise on Compound Oxygen," which will be sent free. Address, DRS. STARKEY & PALEN, 1112 Girard Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

CUTICURA REMEDIES.

FOUR reasons why they are so successful. First, they are original and revolutionary in their composition and mode of treatment. Second, they undoubtedly possess great curative properties. Third, there are thousands upon thousands of sick and suffering who have tried and found wanting the usual remedies and modes of treatment, and who are ready to welcome a really great and successful medicine. Fourth, the price of them is within the means of every invalid.

As each season renews the demand for this pure American wine steadily increases, and, as has been repeatedly demonstrated, has placed it in a position second to none in the market. Friends of high prices, doubtful goods and ultimate evil effects will cling to the imported brands of champagne; those who believe in purity, economy and permanent satisfaction will adopt A. Price $5.00 HALF PRICE TO AGENTS

$5 for $2.50. Ivory Stock. Finely Rifled. 7 Shot.

THE NEW ESSEX 7 SHOT REPEATING DERRINGER is exactly represented by this picture. It is warranted the equal of any $10 Colt or Smith & Wesson in both design and workmanship. It possesses every characteristic of a first-class weapon,—firm, solid-looking locks, superior finish, and Fine Ivory Stocks, even like sights. It shoots well up to 100 yards, and it is the first weapon made in America having the famous Swiss Model Grip as stock,—the utmost holding handle ever put on a Revolver. The regular price of the Essex Derringer is $5, but we propose to make it the means of securing good Agents by selling samples to Agents at half price. To those who will agree to judiciously distribute our catalogues and show our Revolver to those picking to order, we will send one of our Essex Developers, with IVORY STOCK, &c., as described above, for $2.50, or just half price. We know that hundreds will accept this offer who have no idea of becoming our Agents, but simply to get the weapon at half price. THE MARVELLOUS ORGUINETTE.

An Automatic Cabinet Organ for $8.

Playing every tune that has ever been written, with all the melody and expression of a first-class organist. THE PRINCIPLE of an Orguinette is the passing of perforated paper over organ reeds, the perforations being of different lengths and regulating the duration of the notes accordingly. The perforations sounding opposite the note or reed allows the wind to pass through, causing it to "speak" exactly as pressing the key of an organ does; but, with the Orguinette a false note or imperfect time is impossible, and such a tune as "Listen to the Mocking Bird" is played in a manner that few organists could approach. The reeds are exactly the same as in a $500 cabinet organ, and consequently the quality of the music is A No. 1. Three powerful exhaust bellows furnish the wind, and propel the music of perforated paper at the same time. Turning the little knob on the side, in all the exercise required, and a child can produce the sublime music of the great masters at a sparkling waltz, with all the skill of a professional organist, and the labors of time is sufficient for accompaniments to their singing or dancing music in a large hall. Or ask dancing music is PRINTED THE PROPER "cadia" AT THE RIGHT INTERVALS, and a boy or girl can furnish the music and properly conduct any figure dances, quadrilles, lancers, or the German; all that is necessary is to note the knob and call the directions as your agents plainly printed on the paper as it passes along. It will take the place, perfectly, of a 4 piece orchestra, and will save the cost in one night for that purpose, and RACING MUSIC is rendered to a no less PERFECT MANNER. The Orguinette is the most marvellous musical instrument that has ever been made, and should be found in every home in the land. It will give more GENUINE ENJOYMENT than hundreds of dollars expended in any other direction. The music is very inexpensive, costing only 6 cts. per foot, and a tune averages from 3 to 4 feet. PRICES: Style A, represented by above cut but without rollers, only $8; Style C, with rollers, $14. The rollers allow the tunes to be attached to each other, and played in a continuous manner, giving any break. The instruments are solid black walnut and maple, with panels, &c., elevated, and gilt trimmings, and are very handsome and elegant in appearance. These styles sent to any address by express or freight (boxed free) on receipt of price. Several popular tunes (your own selection if desired) and the price of hundreds of others goes with each instrument. Address The Massachusetts Organ Co., 48 Washington St., Boston, Mass., U. S. A. Over five thousand testimonials have been received.

A REPEAL OF THE ELECTORAL LAW.

THOUGHTFUL people do not favor violent methods for obtaining desired results. They admire courage in political leaders; but when disastrous reaction is likely to follow the attainment of an object by revolutionary means, the prudent members of a party shrink from the employment of such appliances to place a particular candidate in office. The sober masses of a political organization, who neither hold or seek office, but simply desire the triumph of its principles by modes that meet the public approval, do not like to win a single battle by tactics that put to hazard a whole campaign.

These plain truths should operate as a warning to those Republicans in New York who are said to be meditating an immediate change in the established manner of appointing the Electors of President and Vice-President in this State. History sheds valuable light upon this subject. From the foundation of the Government down to the year 1828, the Electors were appointed by the Legislature. This method, which had existed in all the States, was constitutional. The Federal Constitution provides that each State shall appoint its Electors in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct. By the Constitution of New York, adopted in 1822, the powers of the people were greatly enlarged. This fact aroused general attention to the question of giving to the people the privilege of choosing the Presidential Electors. Other States were then adopting this course, and a strong sentiment was springing up in New York in favor of copying their liberal examples. To secure this end no change in the State Constitution was needed. It was only requisite to enact a law taking the appointment from the Legislature and conferring it upon the people at the polls. This subject mingled somewhat in the election of 1823. The liberal side of the issue gathered strength by discussion, and several distinguished gentlemen who espoused the cause were chosen to the Assembly of 1824.

The country was just entering upon the Presidential campaign of that year. Four candidates were running—Adams, Jackson, Clay and Crawford. Though all were Jeffersonians in politics, Crawford was the regular Democratic nominee. At that time the Democracy was in power in New York, and the party was controlled by the famous Albany Regency, of which Martin Van Buren was the central figure. The radical wing of the Democracy were called Bucktails. The other factions in the State were the Clintonians, who followed the lead of De Witt Clinton, and the remnants of the Federal organization, whose chief was Rufus King. The ardent advocates of a change in the Electoral law took to themselves the name of the People's Party, which was made up of portions of the two latter factions, with a sprinkling of recruits from the regular Democracy. Mr. Crawford was the favorite Presidential candidate of the Albany Regency. With the Governor, the Lieutenant-Governor and all the other important State officers on their side, the Regency were not disposed to relinquish the existing mode of appointing Presidential Electors by the Legislature, if they could prevent it. They felt sure of a steadfast majority in the Senate, and were confident of their ability to mold a majority of the Assembly to their purposes, and thus secure the thirty-six Electors of New York for Crawford.

The great battle of 1824 over the Electoral law is memorable in the annals of New York. It was fought first in the Legislature during the Winter, and, finally, at the polls in the following November. The contest began in the Assembly. It early appeared that a majority of that body were in favor of giving the choice of electors to the people, but differed about the details. The well disciplined Bucktail minority took advantage of this weak point in the lines of their adversaries and manœuvred for delay. But the outside pressure finally compelled the passage of a Bill in February, which was sent to the Senate and referred to a committee, a majority of whom were Bucktails and supporters of Mr. Crawford. In spite of the rising tide among the people, and of frequent debates in the Senate, the committee contrived to smother the measure for many weeks. At length, after a violent discussion, a leading Bucktail moved to postpone the whole subject till the subsequent November. On a call of the roll, seventeen Bucktail Senators, a bare majority, voted in the affirmative. This disposed of the matter for the session.

The popular storm now burst upon the seventeen Senators and their allies in the Assembly. The fury wherewith they were assailed had no precedent in the history of the State. The obnoxious Senators were hung in effigy, and their names, with the caption, "The Infamous Seventeen," were paraded all through the following campaign in the columns of scores of newspapers. Mr. Yates, the Democratic Governor, bent to the tempest, and called the Legislature together in August to pass an Electoral law. The extra session lasted only four days, and then adjourned in an angry mood. The next month the Democrats held a State Convention and nominated Samuel Young for Governor and Erastus Root for Lieutenant-Governor. The People's men and Clintonians presented DeWitt Clinton and James Tallmadge for those offices. The people now rose up against those who had deprived them of the right to choose their Presidential Electors. The contest ended in a rout of the Democracy, which has no parallel in the records of New York. Clinton and Tallmadge were chosen by stupendous majorities. Six of the eight Senate districts went overwhelmingly against the Regency candidates, and the Democrats elected less than one-fourth of the Assembly.

Viewed in all its aspects, the election of 1824 was the most terrible rebuke ever administered to a party in this State. When the Legislature met in November, 1824, to appoint the Electors, the Bucktails quailed before the tornado they had provoked. Mr. Crawford received only five of the thirty-six electoral votes. The Democrats of New York did not recover from the blow for four years. In the meantime they aided in passing a law which gave the choice of Electors to the people, adopted General Jackson as their rallying chief, opened their lines to the admission of a large body of Clintonians and Federalists, and, finally, helped to place Jackson in the Presidential chair, thus completely reorganizing their party.

The last time the Electors of President and Vice-President were appointed by the Legislature in this State was in November, 1824. The Act under which they are now chosen by the people was passed in April, 1829. Through all the political convulsions that have shaken New York within the last fifty years, no party and no faction has ever dreamed of repealing that law. Is there any emergency in public affairs which requires that it should now be erased from the statute-book?

WEAVER'S INFLATION SCHEME.

THE latest scheme to cripple the reviving energies of the country and to impair the national credit is that of Representative Weaver, of Iowa. This scheme, in the shape of a Bill, was introduced in the House prior to the holiday recess of Congress, and proposes to authorize the issuance of $500,000,000 in the shape of United States Treasury notes, the same to be used in paying to the soldiers and sailors of the late war, or their heirs, the difference which existed between the value of gold and greenbacks during the several periods of their service. The peculiar construction of the Bill betrays the demagogical character of its author. Its ostensible purpose is to equalize the pay of soldiers and sailors. Its real drift and intent is to add $500,000,000 of irredeemable paper currency to the present volume of paper circulation, the soldiers and sailors being used as a means to popularize the scheme. It is this feature which brings the success of the Bill within the range of possibility, and makes it dangerous to resumption and its attendant prosperity.

But will Congress pass a Bill so foolishly extravagant and so highly detrimental to the public interest? Who can tell? Since the holiday adjournment the Weaver type of demagogues have been extremely busy among the class which ostensibly is to benefit by the Bill, and Congress will, doubtless, be overwhelmed with petitions urging the passage of the measure. Unfortunately for the country, too few of its national legislators have backbone enough to withstand a clamorous demonstration, however unwise and erroneous it may be. Congress contains so many moral cowards, men who are ready to sacrifice principle to place by pandering to popular prejudice and error, that Weaver's Bill, or some similar measure to secure the soldier vote this year, may be carried through, just as the Equalization Bounty scheme was put through the Forty-third Congress, and as the Pension Arrears Bill was carried through the Forty-fifth Congress. This last Act, which has taken thus far $10,000,000 from the Treasury, was passed as a partisan expedient, and received the President's signature in the face of an earnest protest from the Secretary of the Treasury. In the midst of confusion, and under a suspension of the rules, it passed the House on the last night of the first session. Many members, anxious to stand well with the soldier element, voted for it, hoping and believing that the Bill would be lost in the Senate. At the second session of the same Congress the Bill came up in the latter body, the majority then being Republican. It was privately urged that it would be dangerous to the future of that party to defeat a Bill in the interest of soldiers which a Democratic House had passed by a two-thirds majority, and, as a measure of political expediency, the Senate concurred.

Under ordinary circumstances, the Weaver Bill might be treated as too ridiculous to receive consideration. But, like the Bills above referred to, it appeals to the soldier element for support, and this feature was, doubtless, introduced with the deliberate purpose of securing that influence to aid its passage, and of galvanizing the almost extinct Greenback Party into new life. Meanwhile petitions are pouring in with real or forged signatures, and an active canvass is made to interest, in the Weaver Bill, the numerous voters who will benefit by its provisions. It is therefore the duty of every State to watch its representatives in Congress, and see that neither by negligence nor stratagem such an enormous load of debt should be laid on the reviving industries of the country.

IT is again the turn of the Monroe doctrine to enter into general conversation.

THE Legislature of Kentucky has just voted $5,000 to the widow of Judge Elliott, who was murdered by Colonel Buford last Summer.

AFTER so many millions of dollars have been spent on our army and navy and our coast fortifications, it is decidedly unpleasant to read from the official reports just how weak we are in the materials of defense against a foreign foe.

IT is but proper that we should be handsomely represented at the forthcoming International Fishery Exhibition in Berlin, in April next; for our pisciculturists have taught the world many valuable lessons in breeding, hatching and acclimating fish during the past five years.

GENERAL BELKNAP, when discovered in irregular official conduct in the War Department, was allowed to resign to escape the disgrace of impeachment; but Mr. Hayt, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, is bounced from his position without any chance of resignation. Verily, the times have changed!

THE Germans bid fair soon to become an over-taxed people. Having levied upon almost everything that is used or eaten, the Government now proposes to tax the advertisements in the newspapers that are allowed to exist, and also to impose a tax upon all persons who are exempt from military service.

EVERYBODY believes that the country met with unusual prosperity last year, or, at least, during the latter part of it. Still it is more comforting to know exactly to what extent, as a people, we were prosperous. The report of Mr. Nimmo on the commerce of the United States for the month of December last and the calendar year of 1879 will, therefore, prove interesting reading. During December the imports reached a value of $59,800,000; the exports, $80,200,000, leaving an excess of $21,100,000 of exports for that month. The balance of trade for the year in favor of the United States was $251,350,477. There was an excess of imports of specie amounting to $67,400,000 during the year, leaving a net balance of trade amounting to $183,950,000.

IF, in the attempt to introduce tea culture in this country, the Commissioner of Agriculture is permitted to expend $1,200 in the purchase of seeds worth $37, money will be saved by intrusting the enterprise to private contractors. Even friends of New York aldermen would scarcely have dared absorb $1,200 as the expense of making a $37 purchase.

SECRETARY SCHURZ having made a satisfactory treaty with Winnemucca, chief of the Pintes, on the basis of assisting his people to become educated and self-supporting, it is to be hoped that no official red tape will longer withhold from the Poncas the privileges long ago promised them. Bright Eyes has pleaded eloquently for her people, and they, like the Piutes, should receive the liberal and civilizing treatment they demand.

A SINGULAR lawsuit has been instituted in Paris. M. Grandsangne has sued M. Vaucorbeil, the director of the Paris Grand Opera House, to recover $100 damages because a performance of "La Favorita," which the plaintiff had paid money to hear, had not been given in its entirety. M. Vaucorbeil's attorney has requested time in order to procure information as to the terms on which the director of the opera is authorized to alter standard works. The result of the suit will be of interest to managers, stars, and that particular element of society.

"WHEN people become educated up to our plane, they will see and think differently." A new phraseology is given this old time saw by Count Von Moltke, who, in reply to a correspondent who requested him to use his influence with the Emperor for a reduction of the army, said: "The power of the Emperor cannot impress all nations with the conviction that even victorious war is a national misfortune. That conviction can only be the result of the moral education of nations, the fruit of which we shall neither of us live to see."

UNDER the new reciprocity treaty between the United States and the Sandwich Islands, favorable results are accruing to both countries. About 46,000,000 pounds of sugar were exported last year, an increase of 10,000,000 pounds over the preceding year. It goes almost entirely to the refineries of San Francisco. The crop this year is large. The great want of the Islands is railroads for the transportation of sugar. Of the 201 vessels entering the port of Honolulu, 131 bore the United States flag. The influx of Chinese laborers continues, and other immigrants are desired to aid in the expansion of the sugar, rice and coffee production.

M. FERRY finds time, besides watching the attacks upon his famous Educational Bill, to give practical attention to the intellectual wants of the rising French generation. He evidently believes that all objects worthy of study should be studied, for he has taken an important resolution obliging students to make use of the magnificent opportunities afforded by the Jardin des Plantes. The professors of botany and natural history of the schools of medicine and pharmacy have been authorized to deliver their lectures in the amphitheatre of that establishment. A special commission has been created, consisting of these professors and the professors of the museum. A new chair has been instituted of vegetable physiology, and M. Dehairain has been appointed professor.

THE immense territory possessed by the Argentine Republic, about 1,152,000 square miles, with a population of only 1,200,000 inhabitants, forcibly recalls a remarkable feature in ancient Spanish colonization. The Spaniards, in their expeditions, were usually not contented with safely establishing one point only on the sea-coast, but they pressed forward to the interior, making new conquests, and often leaving behind them small garrisons which the Indians required but little provocation to attack. This system frequently led to serious disasters, as is instanced by their chief seaport settlement of Buenos Ayres, which, on account of persistent Indian attacks, was twice abandoned, previous to its final settlement in 1580. The courage of the Spanish settlers was sorely tried, and the history of the country shows that the wide extent over which the Indians have ranged, from the "Gran Chaco," or Indian territory of the north, to Patagonia in the south, has been one of the principal causes of the slow development of the interior provinces along the eastern slope of the Andes.

FEARS of bloodshed in Maine are no longer entertained. General-Protector Chamberlain has returned to the classic labyrinths of Bowdoin. The Fusionists, denied access to a public hall to transact State business, have formally adjourned until April, while the individual members of that short-lived party are endeavoring to creep one by one into the regular Republican fold. A great insurrection having been happily averted in Maine, the public may now turn its attention to Illinois, where a formidable disturbance has been brewing for days, all unknown to an otherwise absorbed world. All the officers of the battalion in the State University at Champaign have left the command and refuse compliance with orders, owing to the fact that the faculty only recommend four or five for commissions as officers; also because the rule of the institution requires an average of ninety grade in order to get officers' commissions. Great excitement prevails among the students. It is thought that several will be suspended, and about twenty threaten to leave. Meetings have been held to induce all the students to take up arms. If the faculty do not back down, nothing will save the public buildings of the State from the wrath of these twelve-year-old obstructionists but an assumption of a protectorate by General Logan and an appeal to the Supreme Court of the State.

THE Pope never demanded an explanation of Cardinal McCloskey. On the contrary, he says he entertains a high opinion of the American Prince of the Church, but takes no interest in Mr. Parnell, as his demonstrations are political and not religious.

THE Bolivian army ought certainly to be the best led army in the world. The peace footing is eight generals and 1,013 officers, great and small, with 2,000 rank and file. Every file, therefore, has an officer of some sort to superintend its direction. Surely this must be the army composed of all officers and no soldiers.

AS THE mining fever is again raging, inexperienced people should be wary of heavy investments. A professional chemist in Colorado certifies that a mass of matter submitted to him for analysis would yield silver at the rate of $40 per ton. But the mass examined was merely two potatoes thoroughly dried and pulverized. The trick was played by the other party that time.

IT is stated that a very strong feeling has of late arisen in Germany against the Jews, and that in Berlin a regular "Juden-Hetz" is now being organized against the chosen people by Ober Hof Prediger Stöcker and Dr. Freitschke, who have formed an association called the "Anti-Semiten Liga," the object of which is to give lectures and to hold meetings to protest against the growing preponderance of the Jews and to devise means for checking it.

A CURIOUS characteristic of English country life, according to the London World, has taken place in the tight little island. The wedding of a very popular young lady of sporting proclivities was so arranged as not to clash with the hunt. At eleven o'clock the hounds met at the church-door, enabling the master and many others to attend the ceremony, which their red coats enlivened considerably. It is unnecessary to add that the bridesmaids also wore "pink."

RUSSIAN ladies of high degree, struck by the extreme divergencies of wealth and misery, now mix with the working classes and partake their labors. Thus daughters of some of the first nobility go to the washtub and work there with the peasant woman, accomplish their daily task and share the meagre fare and heavy fatigue with their poor sisters, renouncing all the luxuries and privileges of rank. Is not this Communism to all intents and purposes?

LITTLE by little we are learning the secrets of the vast interior of Africa. An interesting piece of exploration has just been successfully accomplished by the Church Missionary Society's agents in Western Africa. In a small steamer they have ascended the River Binue from its confluence with the Niger to a point probably about 800 miles from the sea. The party penetrated 150 miles beyond Hamaruwa, which was reached by Dr. Baikie when in search of Dr. Barth in 1854, and a careful survey of the river has been executed.

IF imitation be the sincerest form of flattery, we owe a nod of encouragement to one Mr. Pansmure Gordon for having a Pullman car constructed for himself, to run betwixt Brighton and London. A first-rate cook is to be attached to it, and Mr. Gordon contemplates having breakfast—Scotch, of course—if not dinner, "on board" daily. For this luxury the railway company is to charge him £1,200 per annum; but then he is allowed to carry a certain number of passengers, and these will, no doubt, combine with him in dividing the expense.

A HAIR of the Prophet! The heirs to the hair have been airing the question at Madras, where there has been a sensational trial respecting the guardianship of the sacred hair of Mahomet. This hair is inclosed in a case called the "Ansaree Shareef," and the possession of the relic carries with it a small pension. Four persons claimed it, two by succession and two by right of a will. One was a woman, and the judge decided that she could not hold it, because she could not fulfill the ceremonies connected with it, and finally intrusted this valuable hair to one of the male litigants.

THE rumor that the Pope has decided to publish the divers catalogues of the Vatican library brings glad tidings of great joy to savans and to students of history. It is also stated that his Holiness intends that a portion of the archives of the Papal palace shall be hereafter accessible to the public. Should this report be true, the great importance of it can scarcely be over-estimated, as the collection of manuscripts preserved in the library and archives of the Vatican is, beyond doubt, the most precious now in existence, and will tend to shed light on many a dark and obscure spot in history. It is said that there are over 24,000 manuscripts of great value in the Papal archives, Nicholas V. having begun the collection, and Sixtus IV. and Sixtus V. having greatly added to it.

IT is very much the habit in the Mother Country to rail at the Bench of Bishops, styling them as drones in the hive. The following statistics from an English bishop's work-book for 1879, in what is described as by no means an exceptionally heavy year, show that the episcopal chair is not one of ease: Sermons preached, 89; clergy ordained, 50; churches consecrated, 4; churchyards consecrated, 2; churches opened, 23; confirmations held, 63; candidates confirmed, 7,211; speeches at public meetings, 40; other addresses given, 152; committee meetings attended, 46; interviews, 474; letters received, 6,744; letters answered with his own hand, 4,529.

OFTEN as wit is manufactured at the expense of the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Thompson is by no means destitute of grit or of practical humor. A navy officer of some prominence, who felt himself aggrieved that he had been passed over in the selection of Dr. Wales as Surgeon-General of the Navy, made a personal remonstrance to the Secretary, and said very pointedly that the Secretary was morally wrong, and had no legal right to appoint Dr. Wales over the heads of a dozen or twenty other worthy men. Mr. Thompson emphatically retorted: "You dispute my authority? I will give you a practical test. I will order you off to sea;" and the next day an order was given that the officer, who had been on duty in Washington for several years, should proceed at once to duty in Chinese waters.

LAST week was a quiet one in both branches of Congress. In the Senate a Bill to punish persons stealing from Indians was debated; Mr. Bayard spoke at considerable length on his financial resolution; a Bill was reported to allow the President to decide on Fitz John Porter's case; eulogies were pronounced on the life of the late Senator Chandler; Mr. Kernan introduced a Bill to provide for holding a World's Fair in New York City, and the appointment of an interoceanic canal committee was authorized. In the House a Bill was introduced to reorganize the Supreme Court; a resolution declaring the negotiation by the President of a commercial treaty fixing rates of duty as unconstitutional was adopted, also resolutions to appropriate $100,000 for a monument at Yorktown, Va., and to reserve the "Big Tree" district in California for a public park, and all public roads were declared post routes.

DO THE Bulgarians require a prince? Things are not going on well in that country, and, on dit, the fault lies at the door of His Royal Highness. The Bulgarians have no grandee ideas; they are peasants, and their ambition does not soar beyond cultivating their fields in peace and quiet. The Assembly which was recently dissolved consisted of plain, sensible men, who naturally supposed that the Executive was to be intrusted to those in whom they had confidence. The Prince is a lad of two or three-and-twenty, and he was determined, if possible, to upset the Constitution. Therefore he chose as his Ministers men who had no following in the Chamber, and then dissolved it because it refused to pass a vote of confidence in his nominees. Will the Russian Government kindly make answer to the following question? Is it not true that Russian documents have been sent to and are in the hands of the Prince of Bulgaria, and that, if he acts upon them, it would simply mean a resort to a coup d'état?

THE stolidity of the Indian was never more graphically expressed than by Swift Runner, who was hanged for murder in Canada a few days ago. The thermometer marked forty degrees below zero. A gallows had been built out of doors, so that the Indians could see the execution; but when the officers and prisoners arrived at the spot it was found that part of the scaffold had been used for firewood by the half-frozen crowd. Swift Runner complacently warmed himself at the fire while the gallows was repaired. When everything else was ready the nervous hangman said he had forgotten to bring a strap to fasten the prisoner's arms and legs. The prisoner offered to save further trouble by killing himself with a tomahawk, but his proposition was rejected, and he ate a hearty meal of pemmican, with the noose around his neck, while a messenger was fetching a strap. A priest attempted to give him spiritual consolation, but he preferred a death-dance by his own people, and while they were performing it he was hanged.

EDMUND YATES'S magazine, Time, anticipates Lord Beaconsfield's demise. With what mingled feelings Dizzy must have perused the article. "It was mid-November: the hour was half-past eleven P.M., and though the crowds returning home from theatre, concert, or dinner-parties were not yet aware of the fact, a week of panic and suspense had closed in an event which was calculated to send a shock from one end of Europe to the other. It had been known for some days past that Lord Beaconsfield lay seriously ill at Hughenden. The malady was his old enemy the gout, but on this occasion it menaced his heart. . . . Before noon on Sunday the announcement of Lord Beaconsfield's death was made in every town and in almost every village of England. Allusions to the national bereavement and the great man dead at Hughenden were introduced into a majority of the sermons preached from the pulpits of every denomination. . . . A sense of collapse and frustration followed the impression of dazzled surprise produced by the Prime Minister's death, and the English people began to be aware, for the first time, of the energizing and deteriorating influences of the régime under which they had so long lived. What consolation was it for them to hear, as they were told in a second edition of the Times, that Lord Beaconsfield was to have a State funeral, and that immediately afterwards Her Majesty would exercise her prerogative of dissolving Parliament? The article possesses a morbid interest."

THE sanctity of trust funds is what Mr. Astor's Bill in the New York Legislature now seeks to establish. It is high time, not in that State alone, but in all. Every mail brings tidings of misappropriation, irregular investment or wasteful handling of trust funds. A law like the one proposed requires every person holding money in a fiduciary capacity to keep it separate from his own funds. Under it the depositing of trust funds in a bank to a private account will be punishable. Extended to public officers, it will save millions of public money. If moneys received must be deposited daily to the account to which they belong, defalcations will be far more difficult and dangerous. If in every town the different appropriations have different bank accounts, to which moneys accruing shall be deposited and not drawn out for any other purpose under a heavy penalty, there will be less extravagance, as one account cannot be drawn upon to make up for the wastefulness in another. People will not then be taxed over and over again for the same object, as too frequently happens now.

OUR Constitution was framed with no such prophetic forecast as could discern what the United States were to become in a hundred years. That it has been found to adapt itself to the wonderful change in the country is a proof of its great wisdom. But questions constantly arise. Railroads have become a mighty power, binding the whole country together and enabling one to whisk not only from State to State, but through four or five States in a day. The laws of the separate commonwealths are ineffectual to modify the action of these great corporations. Statesmen raise their warning voice, and Congress is called upon to exercise its power of regulating trade between the trades and to bring the railway kings back to the condition of subjects. There are several Bills before Congress, the Sapp Bill and the Reagan Bill. Boards of Trade are taking the matter up, and railroads naturally wish to be controlled as little as possible. It is to be hoped that some action will be taken, and that it will not be crude or hasty legislation that will bring its own condemnation, and call for a repeal, leaving things in a worse condition than it found them.

THE refusal of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to dine with the Lord Mayor of Dublin has caused no end of disappointment in the dinner-loving capital of the Emerald Isle. The Lord Mayor is bound to give what is termed his "Inaugural Banquet," to which is bidden the representative of royalty and all the high and mighty in the land, and, in addition thereunto, a goodly representation of "ye burgesses of ye ancient Citie of Eblana." At this little dinner Her Majesty's Viceroy lets off a neat little speech prepared for him by the Registrar-General, in which statistics are so artfully elaborated as to show that the condition of Ireland is such as her most warm-hearted and devoted sons could by any possibility desire. Now, it has happened before now that the statements of the Lord Lieutenant have been openly challenged in the King's Rooms, while his utterances have been drowned in sibilation or by the waggle of disaffected tongues. It is quite possible, then, that the Duke of Marlborough has advisedly picked a quarrel with Lord Mayor Gray, and thus avoid the humiliation of being defiantly hooted by the happiest and most contented subjects of Her Most Gracious Majesty Queen Victoria.

TWO TEXTS commend themselves to the attention of the good men and women who are earnestly working in behalf of prison reform. The first is found in the statement of a convicted boarding-house thief, that he had learned this special kind of criminal effort while serving out, in Sing Sing prison, a sentence for another offense. The second is taken from a conversation between Judge Cowing and a prisoner who was charged with stealing from an express wagon. To the judge's inquiry, "Why do you persist in a criminal life?" the man replied: "I'll tell your Honor. A man comes out of State Prison with a five-dollar note in his pocket. He almost always wants to lead a better life. He comes here, and begins to look for work. He can't go back to his old place, because everybody knows that he is an ex convict; and everybody shuns the ex-convict, your Honor. If he finds employment in a new place, the police are apt to give the hint that he is an ex-convict, and out he goes. His money goes, and he has no friends to go to—I haven't a friend in all the world, judge—for more, and so he turns in desperation back to the old life, and steals again." We have Prison Inspectors, Prison Reform Associations and Prisoners' Relief Societies in nearly every State; and still, despite their united work to ameliorate the condition of the offender while in prison and to lend him a helping hand when released, the very evils they try to avert are steadily gaining in variety, extent and deplorable results. Warm hearts and philanthropic souls, the enlightened and the just, are ready to assist released convicts in making an honest living and obtaining wholesome surroundings; but a strong head is lacking to decide how this true reform may be accomplished. Where is the modern John Howard?

THE CUSTOM HOUSE AND STEAMSHIP LANDING AT VERA CRUZ, MEXICO.—FROM A SKETCH BY H. A. OGDEN.

GENERAL GRANT'S MEXICAN TRIP.

MEXICAN soil is no terra incognita to General Grant, and the sight of the ancient City of Vera Cruz cannot fail to awaken recollections of early campaigning, ere the "hero of hundred fights" had yet won his spurs.

If a norte does not keep the good ship at sea, she will glide into cozy anchorage between the City of Vera Cruz and the fort of San Juan de Ulloa. This fort, which is also used as a prison, is built upon a small island situated at the distance of about half a mile from the mainland, and here, upon the 21st day of April, 1519, the mailed heel of Hernando Cortez first imprinted itself on Mexican soil. Every eye becomes focused upon the low-lying City of the True Cross, bathed to a dull pink by the rays of a glaring, dazzling and glittering sunlight. Out from behind a tawny sandbank, clear-cut against the keen, full, blue sky, stand the white church-towers, surmounted by burnished crucifixes, the domes and the adobe houses relieved here and there by the crests of stately palms en silhouette. On the right, a white, feathery column tells the seaweary traveler that the ferro carril, or railway, lies in that quarter, while on the left stretches a dull, dead plain of sand eventually and without a break meeting the sky-line. Dim and shadowy spectres fill in the background, gigantic mountains jealously veiled in serapes of cloud.

Around the steamer, shore-boats swarm, blue-painted, with snowy awnings, and occupied by rowers who, in general picturesqueness, leave the Venetian gondoliers in the—Rialto. Coffee-colored fellows, in dazzling white drawers cut away at the knee, in blood-red sashes, in vests bleached as the cap of Orizaba, in straw sombreros the hue of amber. Such glittering teeth and black eyes and raven hair! They howl, they skip from seat to seat, they gesticulate frantically, and it is only when you have consigned your impedimenta to their keeping that they relapse into anything like ordinary quiescence.

The muelle swarms with picturesque humanity. Caballeros jostle aguadores, or water-carriers, scantily draped. Indian flower-girls offer bouquets to señoras, enshrouded in graceful mantillas. Officers, in showy military uniforms, chat gayly with civilian swells, who affect the shiniest silk hats, the shortest-tailed coats, the tightest pantaloons and the daintiest high-heeled, cushion-toed boots. Hawkers of strange-looking confectionery and still stranger-looking fruit cry their wares in shrill, startling voices. Porters, black as ebony, reel beneath appalling loads, and gayly accoutred mules and donkeys add to the general glitter of color and motion.

Passing under a massive archway, you are gravely scrutinized by the Zapilotes, or street-scavengers, who gaze at you from door-steps, balconies, house-tops and church-towers. The Zopilote is a buzzard, and to his buzzardship is relegated the cleansing of the streets. What if the vomito does appear every year and destroy a few hundred Veracruzians with its pestilential breath? The Zapilotes have had the scavenging lease since the time of Cortez, and why change the system? I found these birds perfectly tame, but full of a quaint dignity that forbade all attempts at freedom. I might joke with a Zapilote, but I wouldn't care to slap him on the back.

Vera Cruz was founded at the end of the sixteenth century. Originally a fortress, it is entirely surrounded by massive walls and ramparts, the latter stretching a quarter of a mile along the seashore, flanked on both sides by ancient forts, whilst on the land side the ramparts are curved in the form of an arc, and entered by a number of quaint gateways. The city contains 12,000 inhabitants, its floating population being about 40,000. It is the capital of the State of Vera Cruz, and through it passes two-thirds of all the Mexican exports and imports. It was from this city and along a superb road 300 miles in length that Montezuma had his red mullet borne to him by runners to the City of Mexico. Vera Cruz is infested by land-sharks in the shape of custom-house officials, and I have heard more than one enlightened Mexican declare that this port was the principal cause of Mexico's retrogression.

The streets of Vera Cruz are full of color, full of bizarre and picturesque sights. Strings of mules laden with every conceivable commodity, the leader ridden by the heavy villain of the cheap tragedy: rude, quaint carts, the sides composed of netting, drawn by three mules—one in the shafts, the others outsiders—the mule on the left hand bestridden by a jaunty fellow in charro—that is, a gray felt sombrero, bound with silver lace, a skin jacket braided with silver cord, high buff boots, and a blood-red rebozo or scarf. Dark-eyed señoritas peep at you from gayly-striped awnings, stretched over stone balconies, puffing blue-white smoke from their coquettish cigarettes, their low, gentle, musical laughter rippling on the Summer air, for it is 80° in the shade in the month of February. Dueñas, haggard and hideous as ever Doré painted them, glare at you as you saunter along. Milkmen, their cans incased in skins, three on each side, jog lazily beside their donkeys; aguadores cry their wares; Indians, in dazzling white, speed rapidly by in a sort of compromise between a run, a trot and a walk. The market-place is a glory of red and gray and yellow. Such tropical fruits and flowers! such golds and purples and blues! Indian women lie stretched on mats indolently watching their stock of red and green pepper pods, of tortillas, of granadillas, of cocoanuts, of strange sweetmeats, and uninviting-looking tarts of peculiar shapes; vaqueros dismount from their dapper little horses to bargain for this, that or the other; men in zarapes and ponchos stand listlessly around—in a word, the scene is one that, for color and quaintness, surpasses anything I have ever seen in France, Italy, or Spain.

The Castle of Chapultepec, which is being fitted up for the residence of General Grant, stands at a distance of three miles from the City of Mexico, at the extremity of the fashionable drive, the Calzada de la Reforma. A few slovenly-looking soldiers lounged round the gates once embellished with the imperial monogram "M. C," and rebozo-clad women were preparing the ubiquitous tortilla in red earthen vessels, as I entered the ahuehuete-shadowed grounds, so loved by the luckless Aztec monarch—grounds the marvelous beauties of which far exceed their fame. High above me, clear-cut as a silhouette against the keen blue sky, rose the white towers, and galleries, and terraces, and colonnades, and balconies of the palace, seated on its lofty bed of porphyry, tinted by the setting sun with lines of living fire. Gorgeous flowers glowed upon all sides, on the sloping eaves of the picturesque guard-houses, on terrace walks, on slopes and buttresses and crags and balconies. In the many-tinted foliage appeared parasites resembling red and yellow and purple butterflies, while at the base of the beetling rock upon which the fortress is perched stand the guard of cypresses, whose arching boughs have cast protecting shade over the head of the ill-fated Montezuma, whose habit it was, arrayed in garments covered with the feathers of birds, to wander here for hours, musing on the destiny of his beautiful and then happy country. Chapultepec is full of checkered historical associations. It is, in fact, and not in name alone, a royal spot, the residence during revolutionary and eventful centuries of the leaders of the nation. The castle is a long and narrow building, spreading along the summit of the porphyritic rock, and necessarily following in form the outlines of its foundation. It stands on the exact site of the royal Aztec palaces. The approach is by a zigzag and, at times, a winding roadway, broad and tree-lined. As you ascend, the view becomes every moment more enchanting, until you are compelled to pause at every turn of the path to linger over the entrancing panorama that gradually unfolds itself to your enraptured senses: The City of Mexico set like a glittering gem in its fertile valley; the lakes Texcoco, Chalco and Xochimilco stretching away in dimy-blue; the hill shrine of Guadalupe, with its magnificent church; the quaint and many-arched aqueducts of Belem and San Cosme, and, towering above all, in appalling, yet watchful, silence, the snow-peaked volcanoes of Ixtaccihuatl and Popocatepetl. The approach to the castle is beneath a white marble archway, which, at the date of my visit last year, was in a miserable condition of disrepair. Again did I notice, and with sadness, that the imperial monogram had been chiseled from the bronze gates, upon which the traces of gilding still faintly lingered. Banks of flowers border the approach to the main doorway, and a terrace-walk of colored tiles runs round the entire edifice. The statues have disappeared; the frescoes are obliterated; cheap paper, selected in the vilest taste, covers the walls, hideous in its contrast to the gloriously fretted ceilings and the few remaining evidences of the cultured and æsthetic taste of the unhappy Empress Carlotta, whose keenest pleasure lay in decorating and embellishing this the favorite residence of both herself and her misguided consort. The stairways are crazy and broken, the balusters falling to pieces, and the whole place bears an air of despondency and desolation, so much so that I felt as though the castle were the tomb of the unhappy man and woman whom the Fates called to a throne that hurled one into a blood-stained grave, the other into the living death of insanity.

For some years previous to the brief reign of Maximilian, Chapultepec was used as a military school, until the Emperor ordered its thorough repair. The castle is now used for the purposes of the National Observatory, and the apartments that once echoed the frou frou of imperial trains are now given up to telescopes and the dry impedimenta of astronomers. But by far the most interesting and beautiful part of Chapultepec is the forest of ahuehuete or cypresses by which it is embowered. These cypresses are mighty trees of extraordinary age, which can count their years by centuries. The witnesses of Montezuma's daring and his ancestors' adventures, they were regarded already by his contemporaries as objects of wonder and renown, and are at present, perhaps, the most curious memorials in the world of trees. The gnarled trunk of the oldest and largest cypress, called "Montezuma's Tree," measures 48 feet in circumference and 165 feet in height. I have never seen anything grander than the twisted stem of the ahuehuete, with its majestic pavilion of lofty branches and its garlands of Spanish moss hanging down in delicate ribbons from every twig, with the grace of the drooping pennants of the weeping willow. This moss, barba Española, Spanish beard, is one of the strangest parasites imaginable. It is a tangle of pale green tendrils, in thickness like an ordinary string, and while one end is closely wound round the branch of the tree the remainder drops in long straight festoons. It is called Acso, or hay, by the natives, and at a distance it imparts the idea that a hay shower has fallen on the trees, leaving its traces in this singular and remarkable manner.

The good citizens of Mexico are fond of picnicking under these cypresses, and at every turn you find little al fresco parties. I surprised one group engaged in dancing the fandango, and another enjoying the exciting pastime of having their fortunes told by a very beautiful gitana. The snow-white attire of the Indians, as they glide silently in the embowered avenues, imparts a ghostly atmosphere to the whole scene, and I called to my mind's eye the spirit of Malitzin's Daughter, moving like vapor through the drooping cypresses until it vanished in the transparent waters of the Albuch, in accordance with the pathetic Aztec legend. Will not the Indians of the Anahuac Valley in the future time believe that the ghost of Carlotta will haunt the shades she loved with so clinging a tenderness?

At the time of the war with the United States Chapultepec was heavily armed. Its frontage of nine hundred feet and its causeway bristled with cannon. In its rear stood the old powder-mill known as Molino del Rey. Santa Anna, with the greater portion of his army, occupied the City of Mexico, and was in communication with Chapultepec. On September 12th, 1847, General Scott first stormed Molino del Rey; then, under cover of a demonstration against the city, brought four batteries to bear upon the castle from an opposite ridge, and, after a heavy fire of a day and a half, made the attack in two columns. The day after the fall of the castle the City of Mexico was occupied by the American forces.

President Diaz rides every morning to Chapultepec for the purpose of enjoying a bath, the baths at the foot of the hill being far famed, and La Señora Diaz informed me that, as a Summer residence, the castle could brook no rival. That General Grant will enjoy his sojourn goes without saying.

FROM DESPAIR TO ST. JUDE'S.

"There's nothing either good or bad
But thinking makes it so."

IN a shabby upper room of a shabby house in one of the less pretentious cross-streets of upper New York there sat a woman, young and singularly attractive in a certain pale, proud, subtle way.

Everything within this room indicated poverty of the most freezing, pinching description, and with this poverty its occupant was strangely at variance, although her black dress was old and threadbare, and only that grace of face and figure to which we instinctively relegate the purple and fine linen of wealth and circumstance gave the contradiction so strongly impressed upon the intelligences.

Upon the little table beside which this woman sat, supporting her small and finely modeled head between her two hands, fair as a dream of Canova in color and shapeliness, lay an open letter, and across this a crisp, new banknote of considerable value rustled softly to and fro with the gust of wind penetrating the room from time to time through the ill-fitting window-casings and around the warped and shrunken door.

It would have seemed that some basilisk eye gleamed from the green shadows of this swaying bit of paper, transfixing the soul of the woman who gazed upon it so fixed and unnatural was the glaring light gleaming sightlessly under the brown, curling lashes that lent a bistre shadow to the white flesh beneath their fall. A banknote in such a place should have brought with it joy and blessing. Want is such a bitter master and money frees us from his lash; but money is also a power that lifts us over the grind of necessity, making us the arbiters of that which we will do, be it good or evil, and surely this banknote had brought neither gratitude nor peace to the heart of the woman, who lifted up her head with its weight of thought at last, and, pushing the money a little to one side as if to break the spell it had worked upon her, unfolded the letter and slowly read it aloud.

Sometimes it is the glance of an eye, the touch of a hand, a memory, that touches the soul mutely in passing; at others the vibrant chords of feeling, being numbed and stilled by passions overwrought, require the prick of the steel—the active contact of humanity—the hard earnest of the voice to reach the understanding and to quicken the brain; and this lonely woman, half-bewildered by some inward struggle, read thus her letter, that the sound of it might beat the light in upon her, either to confirm or destroy utterly the purpose its coming had shaped and formed.

A voice sweet and tenderly modulated as the note of the cuckoo it was that disturbed the silence of the poor, mean place, yet neither in the curves of the full, red, human lips from which the words came, nor in the slumberous warmth of the golden-brown eyes, was there anything that gave response, or glad or sad, to the story the writer told:

"My precious wife," the letter began—and how many women in this heartsick age would have gladly given gold and jewels for the true heart speaking thus, and the love and trust breathing in each after line!—"at last I have found work, and the money I inclose is the earnest of what I can and will do to keep the wolf from the door, and to surround you, my wife, with such comfort as my faithful love can encompass.

"It is true, my darling, that I must learn to labor with my hands, and my associates must be the rough, hardy fellows among whom I have found a place; but these are trifling matters compared with the happiness of supplying, by my own efforts, the means of support for the home to which I shall soon be able to bring you.

"Some privations we shall indeed be forced to bear with, my beloved. It is not the kind of life I had pictured for my bride in the days when I, the idle, careless nephew of a rich and doting uncle, courted you, and longed for the time to come when I might take you away from the drudgery of a nursery-governess and establish you in the beautiful home which I regarded as mine.

"That dream is over. For all that I have lost, I have you, sweet love; and, though our home be small and poor, and my unskilled hands learn sad lessons in their grapple with the world, I am still rich in my pride and happiness, and am content in the condition which enables me to vindicate and maintain that independence of soul which bids a man to sacrifice everything before the true love that gives to man and woman the actual blessing of marriage.

"It is the loss of my uncle's approval that I regret, beside which his wealth is as nothing; but he is a hard man, and I have grievously offended him in preferring my own happiness and honor to his most cherished plan; we must, therefore, my dear wife, accept without murmur the harsh inevitable, and when once again I have you by my side, we shall challenge the world in our content, and you shall learn that poverty with love is sweeter than wealth could ever have been and we two separated.

"Within the month I shall come for you. Pay all our little debts and make yourself as comfortable as possible until the time rolls round; and until I shall again hold you in my arms and feel again the caress of your sweet lips upon my own, repose your lonely heart in the true and constant love of "Your faithful husband and lover,

"ROBERT."

Surely this was a letter to have strengthened the soul of the weakest woman for bitterer battles than seemed to lie before this one; but heaven alone measures the heart, and as the last word of fondness and faith, even her husband's name, fell from the lips of the young creature to whom it was addressed, she threw the paper from her as if it had been some poisoned, venomous thing, and pushing her chair hurriedly from the table, arose to her feet and, pacing the floor with a sinuous and noiseless step, the cry short and sharp of a wounded animal echoed through the barren room.

"And this is the end of it all!" at last she said, in a low, terse whisper—"a life of poverty in some dingy hovel, surrounded by the dirt and grime of labor, the companionship of the low and illiterate, and youth sacrificed in the struggle for bread. This is the thing to which love has condemned me—the bitter end of all my hopes and ambitions. My God, it is beyond my strength! Were I but out of the way, the hard old man, who read my soul as if it were an open book, would take Robert once more to his heart and home. Had I loved him, could I have borne to look on and smile to see him, with all his elegance and culture, dragged down to the level of the boors that break the stones on the highway? As it is, can I sacrifice him to the love of ease and luxury which drove me on to become his wife, having nothing to give him in return save the rue of a spirit embittered by its disappointment and the eternal chafings of a discontent that will tear each grace of mind and body from me in the narrowing years to come? No; a thousand times, no! Poverty has been the curse and terror of my existence. I cannot accept it at this price. If now I hide me from this fate, there is only one man's love to be destroyed, and men are quick to recover from such wounds. Once settled in this home of which he writes, once grounded in the muddy slough a laborer digs for the wife who pines for a better fate, and the ties now fragile and easily broken will knit themselves so firmly about my life that to escape were a dream of madness. The money lying there will carry me far, far beyond the reach of the misery that holds me in its grip, and women with half my brain and will have wrought out for themselves a career such as I covet. At least, no fate more terrible than this confronting me can come, and Robert, grieving a little at first perhaps, will one day thank me for his freedom and the life to which I have restored him. We have been children in our folly, and I will neither break him nor myself upon the wheel to which our recklessness has bound us."

Then there came the strange, sad sight of a woman, young, delicate and fair, tearing remorselessly asunder the most sacred of all God's covenants and making waste the altar of a true man's love.

When the morning dawned the shabby upper room in the shabby house, wherein a treasure had been deposited, was deserted and robbed, and yet it were bitter hard to judge the deeds done in the body, since they are all the outcome of such frailties as by nature we inherit, and for each wrong the price must be paid.

* * * * *

The Reverend Justin Jordan had just laid aside his clerical robes and seated himself for a quiet hour of meditation, before leaving his Church of St. Jude's and returning to the more worldly air of the rectory, when a timid knock upon the vestry-door brought a smothered sigh of vexation to his lips and a momentary hesitation in response intervening between his solitude and its would-be disturber.

This rector of St. Jude's was a young man, newly entered upon his charge, and filled with an enthusiasm for his church and faith; and the high-wrought asceticism which he had brought to bear upon his work had early developed itself in the rigorous observance of all the ancient signs and ritual of the early church, its feasts, fasts and saints' days, together with a more than suspected devotion to priestly celibacy, and to other monkish mortifications of the flesh now not greatly in favor with the devotees to a Protestant form of religion; therefore, the feelings of the reverend gentleman may be better surmised than described, when, in response to his slow invitation, there entered into this churchly cell, devoted to such prayer and penance as its holy occupant might deem good for the safety of his soul, a woman, young, fair and slender, who raised two pleading, gold-brown eyes to his, and, in a voice of almost heavenly sweetness, asked his priestly blessing and counsel. An unwonted tremor pervaded the frame of the young priest as this simple and natural appeal fell upon his ears, and he was dimly conscious that, in a shadowy corner of St. Jude's, this same sad, Madonna face had been lifted breathlessly to his day after day, in moments of divinest ardor and inspiration; but, while the stirring of a vague danger animates his spirit to a faint shrinking from the present exercise of his priestly office, yet never had Justin Jordan refused help or consolation to those in affliction or sorrow, so now he gave this trembling, timid woman kindly welcome, and gently led her to the unburdening of her heart.

It was only a commonplace story she had to tell—the story of a lonely orphaned life, provided in its few modest wants by a teacher's earnest toil, and it was surely little she asked of one of God's ministers—only his permission to do such work among the children of his parish and the poor as in his wisdom he might think her equal to; but no holy woman of the olden time could have sued more humbly for those opportunities of suffering and self-denial that gave them saintly places in the annals of Christianity than did this pure-faced child for this privilege of serving her religion under the wing of St. Jude's.

A sadness that was not sorrow chastened each word that fell from her lips, and lurked in each drooping line of the fair, young face, and, yearning over this pleading devotee, as he might have yearned to give ghostly solace to the mourning Marys at the door of the Sepulchre, the rector of St. Jude's gave her all she asked, and gentle, saint-like Euthasia Ray became one of the lay-sisters of St. Jude's. Well and piously did she serve its altar—so well and so piously indeed, that when the Easter-lilies blossomed in the stone font and wreathed the chancel-rails, the Reverend Justin Jordan had so far lapsed from the rigors of his creed as to confess the glory of an earthly love, and to place his name and cloth at the tender mercy of Sister Euthasia, while the Easter songs were waking the morning in the groined arches of St. Jude's, who gave him grace and her vestal kiss of promise later when the glad sun set on their church's high festival and the gathering shadows veiled the workings of her pale, pure face from the searching eyes of faith.

Perhaps the Parish of St. Jude's would have liked to know something more than it did about its rector's wife; but there was her pious, blameless life amongst them to refute any suspicion of evil in which the worldly-wise and narrow-minded might choose to indulge themselves, and for the rest, St. Jude's rather gained by this "touch of nature making all the world akin" that had served to soften a little the austerity that had given a trifle more of penance to its flock than was comfortable, much though the holy character of its shepherd had been respected. Soft cushions found their way, by gentle insinuation, between the bended knees of supplicants and the penitential boards. The church decorations responded to the touch of an æsthetic hand, and became the passion of artistic worship throughout the small city. The asceticism of the confessional draped itself in silken curtains, and the choral services at matins and vespers lured the souls of the slothful and cold to the renewal of old vows, and carried those of the faithful on waves of angelic sound high over all small questions of doctrine up to the gates of the heavenly city.

After two months of married life, in which the Reverend Justin Jordan found nothing incompatible with his duties to God and the Church, as he now apprehended them, this good man was called one night from the calm enjoyment of his study and the sweet communion which the twilight hour gave to him each day with the wife whom he loved and trusted as one pure in heart and righteous in life above most other woman.

Only once before had he felt the soul within him shrink from the holy offices of his cloth as it did upon this occasion, and in that hour of faint-heartedness a blessing had fallen upon him; therefore he lifted himself now above the weakness that beset him, and, kissing his wife, he followed the messenger away to the city hospital.

A man, from whose poor brain the light of reason had for ever fled, lay dying there, and by his side an aged relative, bowed with grief, poured the story of his sorrows into the ready ear of the Rector of St. Jude's.

The dying man had been a brave, true boy, not over strong. In an evil hour he had met and loved a woman who lured him on to a secret marriage, and the uncle, maddened at the fate which condemned a beloved nephew to such misery as the woman could bring him who had only won his heart for the sake of the money that was in his hand, avenged the wrong on both by casting the young pair, penniless, out upon the world.

Bravely the young man had worked to make a home for the fair, false creature who had beguiled him of his love, exiling himself from her side until success had crowned his efforts; then returning for the wife, for whose sake no sacrifice had seemed great, no toil severe, he found the place in which he had left her deserted and all trace of her as surely blotted out as if a deluge had passed over and swept her bodily from off the face of the earth.

Wandering the streets, a crazed and shattered wreck of manhood, the uncle had at last found and cared for him, and as the months went by he gradually fell into a state of utter quiet and mindless gloom. Then the vigilance of the uncle had relaxed, and in a moment of unlooked-for frenzy the poor maniac had fled the friendly shelter of his home. They had tracked him to this distant city by that heart-rending cry for his lost wife which was the only intelligible word that had passed his lips since the blow had fallen that had crushed his heart, and here he now lay dying.

Tears rolled from the eyes of the rector of St. Jude's as he listened to this tale of sin and sorrow. Reverently he read the prayers for the dying, and reverently he bowed his head as the poor wild eyes closed in their last sleep and the poor quivering lips settled at last into the quiet of infinite peace with the name of Ray upon them; then, in his own meek and holy way, he gave such comfort as his religion and the church afforded to that aged stricken mourner, and went his way home to the rectory.

Sitting with his wife in the moonlight, he told her the sad story of the dead man at the hospital, thanking God meantime in his heart for the sweet, devoted saint whom heaven had vouchsafed to him as a helpmeet.

Something white and deadlike fell at his feet ere the tale was told, and then the rector blamed himself in his own pure mind that he should have poured such a story of horror into a woman's sensitive ears, and, carrying his wife to her bed, watched by her side in love and tenderness, until she slept the deep sleep of nervous exhaustion.

The man dead of a broken heart was buried, and the wife of the rector of St. Jude's silently hates with a bitter hate the hard old man who loved his vengeance better than the boy whom he had reared to be a man, with a man's will and heart; but she is none the less a saint in the Parish of St. Jude's, and there is nothing its rector will deny her, even to the gratifying of her pretty whim to have their marriage ceremony repeated on the anniversary of that Easter Monday when they two were joined together in the love of the Most High and the service of the church.

ANNUAL RECEPTION OF PALESTINE COMMANDERY, K. T.

THE Palestine Commandery, No. 18, was in "high feather" on Wednesday night, January 28th, the occasion being nominally a drill, but actually a ball, and, from the thousands who attended both, the gentle knights may be fairly congratulated upon a supreme success. I stood in the main lobby of the Academy of Music and disported myself by gazing at the eager, anxious, joyous and excited crowd of both sexes that poured into the building like some mighty river of humanity that had burst its banks. How they did press and jostle and hustle, and "Beg pardon" and "Excuse me," in their excessive anxiety to obtain vantage-ground within the spacious auditorium of the Academy. The Knights, resplendent in cocked hats and white feathers and swords, proved themselves devoted succorers of the fair sex, and many a distressed damsel did they rescue during this eventful rush to the front. The Academy was brilliantly lighted, bedagged and beflowered, while the glittering cross suspended at the back of the stage, composed as it was of beads of the whitest gas, shone like the bright particular star that it proved to be. The toilets of "ye faire ladyes" showed wondrous well, and the ensemble was glow and color and glitter. The ceremony of receiving the grand officers of the State of New York having been gracefully gone through, the delegation from St. John's Commandery, No. 4, of Philadelphia, followed, and then the drill of the Palestine Commandery. The Knights acquitted themselves not only to the satisfaction of their commanding officer, but to the especial delight of the vast audience, who applauded each intricate manœuvre with no niggard hands. After the drill came the ball. With twenty-four dances on the programme, with first-class music, a well-tempered floor, with supper at demand, and gentle knights thick as leaves in Vallambrosa, why should not the ball of the Palestine Commandery have proved so signal a success?

FLOOD ROCK.

THE sun shone brightly on Flood Rock in the East River, and on its engine-houses dipping into the seething, whirling, eddying tide that flashes from Hell Gate, as the artist and I crossed from Astoria in the Government steam-launch for the purpose of visiting the nine acres of rock which General Newton, bold dynamitic mouse that he is, is engaged in eating away like so much very hard cheese. Captain Murcer, of the United States Engineers, who has the supervision of the works, met us at the slippery landing-stage, and after a brief but very much to the point parley with this scientific official, we were handed over to Chief Engineer Boyle.

"Look out for the cars when you get below," cautioned Captain Murcer. "They travel very rapidly, and in the dark the mules will not be likely to pay much respect to strangers. Keep off the track!"

A great square hole in the rock kept vomiting an endless line of boxes, containing self-dumping buckets, which discharged the débris of the blasts into a barge moored to the dock, with a roar of thunder, while the beat of machinery almost caused the whole rock to throb as though endowed with life.

Mr. Boyle, taking us to his den, arrayed us in oilskin overalls, boots and caps, providing us with a tiny oil-lamp, and, having received a few cautionary instructions, we followed him to the top of a steep wooden stairway which almost immediately lost itself in deep and cavernous darkness.

Down, down, down! our lamps but serving to render darkness more visible. Down, flight after flight, groping our way by clammy rocks, while water from leaks plashed mercilessly over us, and noise as from a park of mitrailleuses rattled in our ears, until we were stopped by our guide to be informed that we had reached the deepest level of the working. We were now sixty feet in the bowels of the earth, with but a shell of ten feet of rock between us and the maddened currents of Hell Gate. Over our devoted heads passed the found steamers, and, for aught we knew to the contrary, the shining ore deposited by the late and much-lamented Captain Kidd might be lying directly above our oilskin shakos.

"Follow me," said Mr. Boyle, plunging through broken rock, through pools of water, across beams of timber, across drills and drivers and iron rails. How horribly grim the light of our lamps caused the walls to appear, while the idea of being buried alive in this ghostly prison-house kept forcing itself forward with a ghastly and hideous persistency. Presently a rumbling sound smote our ears, and out of the darkness came a pair of sickly-yellow balls.

"Look out for the car!" shouted Mr. Boyle; and we instantly stepped off the track, crouching as closely to the rock as the unyielding nature of the wall permitted. In a second the semblance of a mule, accompanied by twin effigies of Guy Fawkes, flashed past us, to be almost instantly lost in Erebus.

"Step this way and you will see the height and extent of our hoisting shaft," exclaimed Mr. Boyle, leading us to a glimmer of daylight, where we gladly tarried, gazing upwards as the great, square box, laden with the secrets of the rock, glided creakingly upwards.

"There is an average depth of twenty-six feet of water over us," explained our cicerone, as he led the way still further into the bowels of the rock. "We have one hundred men, two mules and seven drills, at work day and night; that is, we work from twelve o'clock Sunday night until twelve o'clock Saturday night all through without stopping. We use diamond drills on some descriptions of rocks. We take out a thousand cubic yards of rock a month, or about one hundred tons a day. The district excavated is over a thousand feet long and five hundred feet wide. I have had only one leak of any account, and I have it partially choked off. We pay our drillers $2.35 a day, our drill-helpers $2.08, and our general hands $1.76. Our shift is only eight hours, and even eight hours in this atmosphere is killing work. The men mostly go into consumption."

We could hear no more, for we had approached a heading, the face of which was being drilled, the noise of the machine absolutely deafening. Here in this niche stood a lynx-eyed man, lamp on hat, regulating the velocity of his drill, the helper standing close to the rock which was being slowly but surely pierced.

"The blasters," said Mr. Boyle, "come on at four o'clock in the afternoon, and work till seven in the morning. We have two blasters, and pay them $2.50 a day. We drill on an average one hundred holes a day. The blaster takes his dynamite cartridges, and, having cleared the heading of all hands, sticks his cartridges into the holes. He arranges the fuse—each fuse burns two minutes—so as to cause the blasts to go off in regular succession. He wraps a bit of cotton wick round the fuse, which is from two to three feet long, and lights it with his lamp. Then he goes out of the heading and counts his explosions as they go off. He allows thirty minutes for a dead cartridge before he goes into the heading again."

As we stood watching Mr. Boyle as, in pantomime, he went through the process of loading and firing, a great outcry made itself heard in the darkness. Rather startled, we instituted inquiry, and learned that as it was 12 o'clock the dinner hour was thus announced throughout the mine. Considerably relieved, we followed our guide to the dining-hall, where over a hundred men sat upon narrow benches against the damp walls, in a long, narrow vault-like apartment lighted by two small lamps only, as the outbreak of fire is to be guarded against in every possible way. In the rocky ante-chamber the miners' oilskin hats, many of them with the lamps lighting, lay in weird-like confusion. We also visited the stabling, where we were duly warned against a kicking mule. Two double pipes of eight inches in diameter convey compressed air from five powerful pumps. Were we sorry when told there was no more to see? Once again in dayshine, how dazzling it was to be sure! We were taken to the dynamite-room, where a man was calmly engaged in adjusting caps of fulminating mercury to fuses—and within reach of his right hand 300 pounds of dynamite in cartridges, thirteen ounces to each cartridge. On board the Government launch we began to breathe more freely as the fierce current of Hell Gate wafted us onwards towards the New York shore.

THE YELLOWSTONE MAIL ROUTE IN WINTER.

THE present Winter has been an unusually severe one on the Plains, the snow falling to a remarkable depth and the thermometer indicating intense cold. Along the mail route of the Yellowstone the heavy snows have greatly interfered with the prompt delivery of mail matter, and imparted to the service a taste of the days of the "Forty-niners." From Bismarck to a distance of nearly three hundred miles the country is very barren. Scattered along the route, at regular intervals, are mail ranches, where the stock of the mail-coaches is cared for and where letters are received and delivered. The drivers of the coaches are by no means gentlemen of ease. They are on the "go" constantly; the severity of the weather guarantees no days of leisure for them. At any moment they are liable to be "jumped" by hostile Indians, or halted by "road agents" for the valuables intrusted to them. Scarcely a week passes without details of the robbery of a mail-coach, by Indians or other thieves, appearing in the papers. It not unfrequently happens that the drivers lose their way in the storms of wind and snow, and are in consequence compelled to camp out until the storm abates or they are able to discover their true route by the landmarks, with which they are as familiar as the sailor with the North Star.

To those of our readers who have opportunities for acquiring an insight of the manner of transporting the mails on the railroads and steamships our illustrations of the route of the Yellowstone will form an interesting study for comparison. Hard as is the work of the army of men employed in the fast railway mail service, few of them would exchange places with the drivers of the mail-coaches on the plains of the extreme West.

M. DE LESSEPS IN PANAMA.

IN April of 1879 M. Lucien Bonaparte-Wyse, of the French Navy, obtained from the Government of the United States of Colombia a concession for the opening of an interoceanic canal at the Isthmus of Panama. M. Wyse afterwards sold this contract to Viscount Ferdinand de Lesseps and the company he may organize. In May of last year a congress of scientific men of all nations was summoned to Paris by M. de Lesseps, ostensibly to study and decide the best route, but really to indorse the Panama route. After much discussion, in which two representatives of the United States, Admiral Ammen and Engineer Menocal, took a prominent part, the congress, as it was anticipated, recommended the Panama route. M. de Lesseps then issued his circular and called for five per cent. on each share of 500 francs out of the 80,000 shares which were to form the capital stock of the proposed company. In the meantime a strong opposition to the scheme had developed among influential French bankers and in the United States. General Burnside's resolution in the United States Senate was extensively used against the proposed company. The result of the opposition was that M. de Lesseps received only about $150,000 when he expected $4,000,000. He resolved, then, to return the money to the subscribers, and announced that as the opposition was based, first, on the assumption that the difficulties of the proposed canal route were unsurmountable on account of the sudden rises of the Chagres River, and, second, on the supposed opposition to the scheme on the part of the people of the United States, he would leave France for Panama in December, accompanied by competent engineers, and would then pay a visit to the United States.

Faithful to his promise, M. de Lesseps left Europe on December 8th, and arrived at Aspinwall on the 30th of the same month. On January 1st, 1880, he formally began the work of verifying the Wyse-Reclus survey of the proposed route in three points which still leave in doubt the possibility of the work from an engineering standpoint. He expects to have a clear idea of these points about the 1st of February, and was expected to leave Panama for New York on the 6th, and, therefore, may be expected here on the 15th or 16th.

The engraving on our front page, from a photograph taken expressly for us, represents M. de Lesseps, surrounded by his engineers and suite. He is sitting in the middle of the group, and it is not too much to say that his is the most striking countenance of all. M. de Lesseps is now in his seventy-fifth year, and yet he is more active than any of the young men of his suite. He barely sleeps five hours and is much more indefatigable than the Emperor of Brazil, who is twenty years younger and whose activity in sight-seeing attracted here so much attention in 1876. His principal engineer is M. J. Dirks, who is sitting at his left. He built the celebrated North Sea Canal of Amsterdam, one of the principal hydraulic works of Europe. M. Dirks is the president of the Committee of Studies. On M. de Lesseps right is Colonel Geo. M. Totten, the veteran builder of the Panama Railroad, who is honorary president of the Studies. Next to him is M. Henry Blonde, who is a D. C. L., and was a lieutenant in the French Navy. He acts as general superintendent of the expedition. On M. Dirks's left is General W. W. Wright, the only American member of the committee. He is followed by Lieutenant Bonaparte Wyse, who really promulgated this canal scheme. Señor Sosa, a graduate of Troy, N. Y., is the representative of Colombia in the expedition. M. Wiener has traveled considerably in South America and is Vice Consul of France at Guayaquil. M. Gaston Blanchet is in charge of the details and finances. M. Boutan, a mining engineer of the French Government, is the geologist. M. Iguazate was formerly inspector of the Suez Canal and is one of the ablest men with M. de Lesseps. M. Jagon has been exploring Africa, and is also a very valuable man. M. Albers is a friend of M. Dirks, and like him came from Holland. M. Couvreux is son of a very rich contractor who has been doing the important work of improving the port of Antwerp and straightening the course of the Danube. Messrs. Dauprat and Gallay are secretaries of the expedition. M. Sabla represents in New York M. Wyse's interests. Messrs. Tonian, the two brothers, Marolle and Duffos, are bright engineers. The other persons in the group, not yet mentioned, are M. Verbrugghe, a very able explorer who, with M. Wyse, traced the proposed route, and Mr. J. C. Rodrigues, of this city, who was in Panama as special correspondent of the New York World.

The fourteen engineers who are with M. de Lesseps divided themselves into five sections. Some of them will remain at the Isthmus for several months. M. de Lesseps will come to New York, accompanied by Mme. de Lesseps and three of their children, and by Messrs. J. Dirks, Blonde, Dauprat and Gallay. Whatever may be the feeling of our people towards this Frenchman's attempt to build a canal through our continent, it is certain that he will be heartily welcome by them.

The International Trials at Florence.

The recent trial of Internationalists at Florence, which lasted from December 9th to January 14th, excited general attention in Europe, where all the old established governments are quaking with fear, in view of the extra revolutionary doctrines and overt acts of the Socialists from Spain to Russia and from Naples to Sweden. The most important of the prisoners was Francesco Natta, a Piedmontese mechanic, living in Florence, an industrious man, earning good wages, but the most active and influential of the Internationalists in Tuscany. Another, Florido Matteucci, a student of twenty, a young fanatic, already several times brought to the bar, but winning acquittal by his youth. Another was a mason, another a varnisher, while the female conspirator was a young Russian girl, imbued with the Nihilism which permeates all classes in her native country, clear-headed, bold, devoid of all scruple, avowing her principles boldly and spreading them with the eloquence and fascination of a woman. The knout might menace her fair form in Russia, but no Italian jury would convict her.

The Taking of Pisagua.

Pisagua is on the Peruvian coast, in about nineteen degrees south latitude, and its capture by the Chilians is one of the most notable events in the war. The first shot was fired about 7:15 A. M. on November 2d, 1879, and the bombardment was kept up briskly till the town was in flames and two earthworks demolished. Between nine and ten o'clock some 300 Chilians landed in boats, and, in spite of the determined resistance of the enemy, clambered up the steep rocks. They took advantage of every irregularity of the ground, and slowly but surely drove the Bolivians before them to the summit of the hill, which is about 1,000 feet high. The Bolivians were driven from their last resting-place by a few well-directed shells from the Chuncanga. At 2 P. M. the fighting was practically over, and the Chilian ensign was hoisted on the hill.

Hunting the Hippopotamus.

In hunting this huge beast in the Central African rivers, the Nile or the Congo, anywhere from Natal to Angola, the first endeavor of the chief hunter is to separate one hippopotamus from the herd, and then he gets a shot at it with his large elephant-rifle, using an explosive shell instead of a bullet. His native servants and followers are rendered supremely happy by his killing one of the herd, as they secure from it plenty of strips of fat meat.

The First Rails Laid in Syria.

The interest felt in the proposed Euphrates Valley Railway has already borne fruit by the construction of a tramway from the Marina, or port of Tripoli, to the town, a distance of two miles, and then further on, skirting the houses a distance of one mile, to join the great road from Aleppo, Homes and Hamah. The company is entirely formed among the natives, though they have had to call in the assistance of English engineers to decide the route and superintend the laying of the rails. The natives employed on the work vary in costume and character even more than those traveling on the dare hard by. There are also a large number of Circassians employed for the ordinary work; and with their fur caps and frock-coats and long trousers, they present a strong contrast to the other laborers.

American Grain Elevators in England.

The appearance of the first American grain elevator in the Thames, near Woolwich, and its work of unloading the Georgia of her grain cargo, caused much excitement among the water population. The system of loading and unloading grain ships is, of course, well understood in this country, but in Europe it is still a novelty. Wishing to test the practicability of utilizing this great commercial machinery, the representatives of the Mark Lane or Corn Trade interest had the entire materials of a capacious elevator shipped from the United States and put together at North Woolwich, and when applied to the first grain-ship that reached the port the whole machinery worked straight off without any hitch, beating or breakdown. It cannot be long before this great American labor-saving apparatus will be in operation at every grain port in Europe.

Running the True Meridian Line from Spain to Africa.

Our coast surveys, which, with its accurate triangulation, established with mathematical certainty the lines of our territory and their latitude and longitude, is not the only work of the kind, although older governments move more slowly. As long ago as 1795 Biot and Arago, French scientists, prolonged the meridian line from Perpignan to Barcelona and the Balearic Islands. Arago wished to run it to Algeria, but the nature of the Government there at the time prevented the attempt. Arago was soon after taken prisoner by a rover and carried to Algiers, but he could not carry out his plan under these conditions. In 1868 Mr Perrier, engaged in the survey of Algeria, perceived that the Sierra Nevada was visible to the naked eye from Mount Atlas between Oran and the Morocco frontier. Ten years later by an arrangement between the Spanish and French Governments, he, with General Ibañez, was appointed to execute the necessary observations. For the summits of the triangle they selected Mulhacen in Murcia, a culminating point in the Sierra Nevada, Filhaoussen in Algeria, and M'Sabiha, near Oran. Our illustration shows the observatory at this last point with the mountains on the Spanish side seen dimly in the distance. All the resources of modern science, the finest instruments, and even electric lights, were employed, and on the 26th of August, 1879, everything was ready, and each man was at his post, Mr. Perrier being stationed at M'Sabiha. The solar signals first tried failed, and twenty days were lost in fruitless attempts. Then the electric lights were tried, and to the exultation of all, the electric signal at Tetica, two hundred miles off across the Mediterranean, was distinctly seen by the telescope, and occasionally with the naked eye. "Spain, Spain!" cried the Arabs around him, entering at last into a comprehension of the work and a scientific enthusiasm. The electric light of Malhacen was next tried successfully, and at that point the Spanish observers saw clearly the light in Algeria. The French meridian is now accurately laid down from the Shetland Isles to Sahara, a great arc of 27°, the greatest length yet measured on the globe. M'Sabiha is now to be connected by measurement with Madrid, Paris and Tetica. So close is the calculation that the approximation of time is estimated at the hundredth part of a second.

—IT is announced that the German Government intends to levy a tax on advertisements in newspapers.

—IN France it is estimated that about 18,000,000 of the population live by agriculture and 9,000,000 by manufactures.

—THE school population of Tennessee is 514,643; the value of public school property in the State is $1,162,884.76.

—THE gross funded debt of Boston on the 31st of December last was $43,922,816. Of this amount $4,328,910 matures this year.

—THE Board of Trade has awarded a piece of plate to the captain of the American schooner Fred A. Carle for saving a shipwrecked crew.

—A BOND of $50,000 for the safety of the official diamonds, and of $100,000 for the safety of the official plate, is required of the Lord Mayor of London.

—OUR potato crop in 1879 exceeded 181,000,000 bushels, and its value is about $79,000,000, an increase of $6,000,000, as compared with the value of that of 1878.

—THE Provincial Council of Venice will shortly sanction the engineer Biello's scheme for a bridge, three miles long, from Venice to the mainland, to serve for a tramway, as well as for pedestrians and vehicles.

—DR. J. H. HENRY is preparing an elaborate and exhaustive pamphlet on the gold fields of Alabama. He says he has the data to clearly establish that there is more gold in Alabama than there is in California.

—THE report of the Supervising Inspector at New Orleans for the past year shows that no deaths have occurred from steamboat boiler explosions on the Mississippi River—a fact unprecedented in river navigation.

—THE cotton-seed oil factories of New Orleans are reaping a rich harvest this season, as oil and oilcake have risen largely in value, while the manufacturers have been paying only the old price for the raw material.

—THE first messages of the new telegraph line to South Africa were sent by Queen Victoria to the Sultan of Zanzibar, Sir Bartle Frere and Sir Garnet Wolseley, on the 25th of December. They were received on the 27th, and the replies arrived in London on the 29th.

—THE Italian Senate, after several days of debate, has resolved, by a vote of 135 to 73, to postpone the discussion of the Government Bill for the abolition of the grist tax until the enactment of such a measure is feasible without prejudice to the finances of the country.

—IT is a fact which is not generally realized that America widens at the north until it juts out into the ocean so as to be within thirty-six miles of Asia. In severe seasons Behring's Straits are frozen over, and animals have passed on the ice from one continent to the other.

—JUDGMENT in the Garibaldi divorce case has been published. The Court of Appeal, reversing the decision of the Court of First Instance, declares Giuseppe Garibaldi and Giuseppina Raimondi free from the marriage celebrated at Como on the 24th of January, 1860.

—INDIA is having a small exodus, 14,000 of its Hindoos leaving for other British colonies last year. Many of them go to the Fiji Islands, and others to Trinidad, Jamaica, Mauritius, Natal and Demerara, and everywhere they have the reputation of docile, industrious and thrifty settlers.

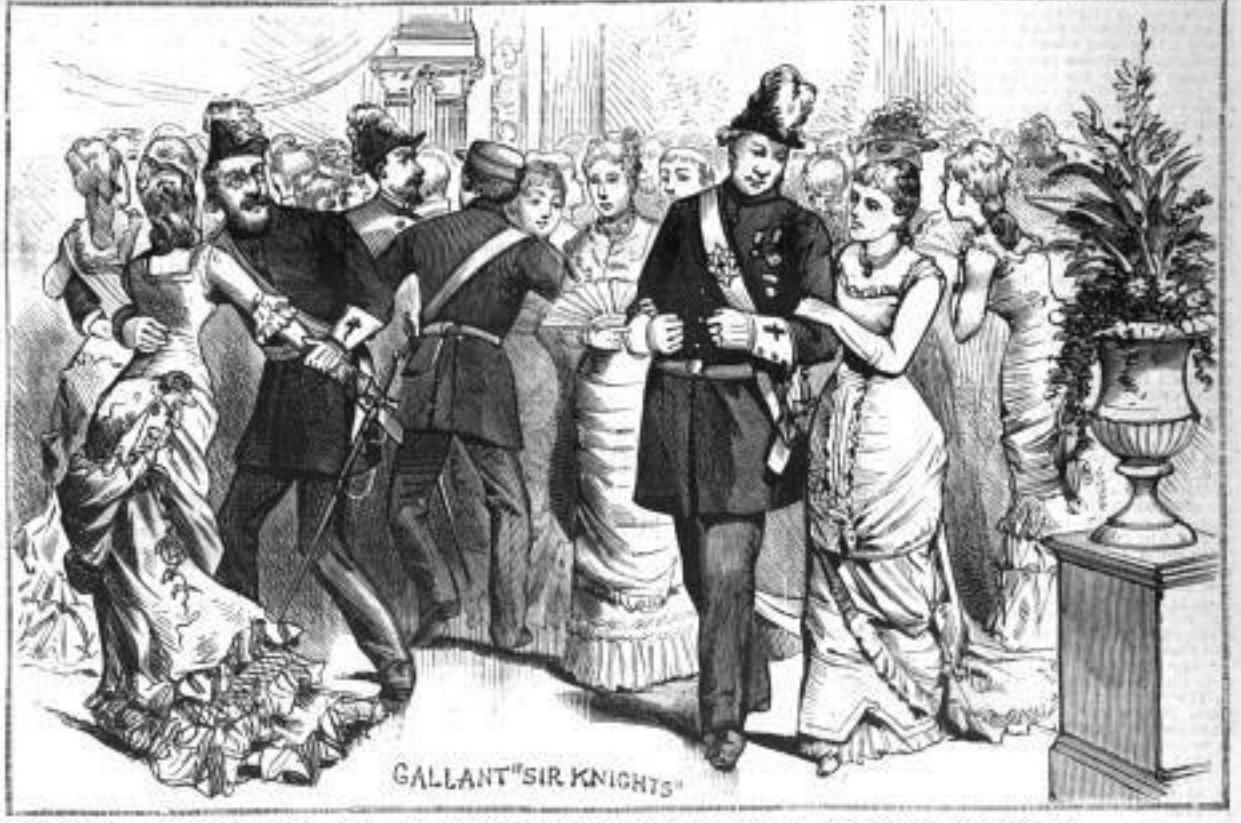
—FROM statistics just published it appears that there are about 75,000 houses in Paris, exclusive of public buildings. Their total value is estimated at about 23,000,000 pounds sterling. The superficies of the capital is put down at 20,000 acres. There are 600,000 yards of sewers. The population numbers 1,990,000, or about 102 inhabitants per acre.

—THE Russian condensed cake for feeding horses in the field being thought to have proved a failure, the boxes of this food were sold in Paris soon after the war in great quantities for two and a half francs per box. After thorough trial in the tramway stables and elsewhere, the food has been found so valuable that the price has risen to eight francs per box.

—IN imitation of the perilous ventures of crossing the Atlantic in small craft, an Italian boat-builder at Montevideo is constructing a boat twenty-seven feet long by seven feet wide, for the purpose of making a voyage from the river Platt to Italy, landing at Caprera, to visit General Garibaldi. He will be accompanied by a friend, and both are old companions in arms of the general.

—FROM the calculations of M. Paul Leroy Beaulieu in the Economiste Français, it appears that the public debt of France exceeds 26,000,000,000 francs, on which 1,265,000,000 are paid annually as interest. Divided among 37,000,000 of Frenchmen, this debt, the most colossal in history, gives an average of 700 francs, as principal, for each inhabitant, and 34 francs interest per annum.

—THE monster Italian double-turreted ironclad Duilio, the most powerful war vessel in the world, in a trial of her speed on January 24th, gave fourteen miles per hour, working at six-sevenths of her full capacity. It is expected that she will eventually attain a speed of fifteen miles per hour. The armament of the Duilio consists of four 100-ton Armstrong guns 33 feet long, firing projectiles 2,500 pounds in weight, with powder charges of 350 pounds.



—AN open competition was to be held in London on Tuesday, February 3d, and following days, for eight situations as student interpreter. Seven of these situations are in China, and one is in Japan. The successful candidates will be allowed to choose between the two posts according to their place in order of seniority. The regulations for the examination lately issued prescribe that candidates must be natural born subjects of Her Majesty, and must be over eighteen and not more than twenty-four years of age.

—THE east coast of Hudson's Bay is reported to be undergoing very considerable changes in its level. Since the posts of the Hudson's Bay Company were established at the mouths of the various rivers, there has been an increasing difficulty in approaching them with large craft; and this elevation is estimated to amount to between five feet and ten feet within the last 100 years. The same changes have been observed on the west coast of the bay, at the mouth of the Nelson and Hayes Rivers, near which is an island called Mile Lands, now several feet above high water, which, within the memory of man, was always submerged at flood tide.

THE ANDALUSIAN SERENO.

WITH oaken staff and swinging lantern bright,
He strolls at midnight, when the world is still,
Through dismal lanes and plazas plumed with light,
Guarding the drowsy thousands in Seville.

Gazing upon his ever star-thronged sky,
With careless step he wanders to and fro,
The gloomy streets re-echo with his cry,
His slow, low, sad and dreary "Sere-no!"

He sees the blonde moon fleck the rosy towers
Of old Giralda with its opal sheen,
And in broad alamedas warm with flowers,
He sees the Moorish cypress bend and lean.

Then, vaguely dreaming, he recalls the nights
His father passed beneath those very stars,
The tales of escaladed walls, the fights,
The mirth, the songs, the Babels of guitars!

And all his sire had told him years ago,
How, often, in the gardens dim and dark,
He met full many a mantled Romeo,
And stumbled over corpses, cold and stark.

But he, alas, has heard no serenade,
No ladder hangs from Doña Linda's bars,
And the wan glint of an assassin's blade,
He ne'er has seen beneath these quiet stars.

So, weary, in the dead calm of the town,
His soul regrets the past's romantic glow;
While mute, despondent, pacing up and down,
He sadly moans his dreary "Sere-no!"

But, sometimes in the grayish light of dawn,
He stops and trembles in his clinging cape;
For he can see a lady's curtain drawn,
And in the street below, a phantom shape,

Draped in quaint, antique garb, with sword and glove,
Sombrero vast and mandolin on arm,
Which seems to play a weird, wild lay of love,
And at his coming shows no quick alarm—

But turns, and there, a skeleton all lean
And haggard, leers within the lightless lane;
And the Sereno knows that he has seen
The spectre of the Past, the ghost of Spain!

F. S. SALTUS.

THE HIDDEN WITNESS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THAT HUSBAND OF MINE."

CHAPTER XXVIII.—"TO WRECK A LIFE—OR NOT."

SYLVE sat on the lowest step of the lowest terrace, pulling the long, feathery grass and plaiting it listlessly. She looked superbly beautiful—the close braids of her beautiful brown hair brought forward like a coronet, under which the gleam of her brow was like polished marble. Her dark eyes seemed filled with a dewy splendor. Dee stood near, leaning against the broken balustrade, regal in a richly-colored head-gear, and a snow-white apron that enveloped her whole figure. Her massive arms folded over her chest looked like carved ebony in their roundness and polish. The subject was as usual, Raphael.

"How came Colonel Lewin to have anything to do with Mr. Wilde's education?" asked Sylve, as she plaited her grasses.

"Well, you see, his own mammy was dead, and my massa colonel an' he was ole friends from dar babyhood. So when Colonel Wilde go off to de war—a hull year afo' Colonel Lewin go—he just 'queathed the chile to my massa, wid plenty ob money to pay for he larnin'. So when he gits de right age, my massa sends him yeast to the college. His money was all put in yeastern banks too. Oh, Raf'le got a right smart lot of money—'deed he ain't nobody's beggar, he ain't."

"He's very handsome, isn't he?" asked Sylve, the red dyeing her cheek as the image of Flix came up unbidden.

"Well, you better b'leve. I reckon Almighty Master couldn't make .him any handsomer. When dem two chillens goes to de altar—well, ef it don't be a sight!" and, giving a series of shakes, the blue and scarlet turban came near falling from Dee's black temples. She lifted her arms to replace it—and Sylve sighed, let fall the plait she was braiding, and looked steadily before her.

"Wait till the outer coating of your romance has worn off," Salome had said. Had it worn off? Was she longing for a change? She acknowledged to herself that living with Eve Lewin would be unendurable. With Raphael the demi-god in their midst, it might be different, but then that depended. If she could only make him love her a little bit. It was a wild, half-wish—not to rob Eve, oh, no!—and yet how could that milk-and-water beauty appreciate a man such as she imagined Raphael Wilde to be? In her thoughts, her very secret thoughts, almost unacknowledged by herself, she compared this grand young Ray with Flix, associated them together in mental and moral qualities, fancied that they looked alike. Another sigh—yes, life here was prosaic. It seemed to her very hard that she should not be loved and cared for. She was as beautiful in her way as Eve, and much more rarely gifted. Why should she trouble herself because these two loved each other?—for that was what her strange mood meant. She could not have answered the question, but in her heart she knew she did care. As she sat there alone—Eve had gone to visit a sick neighbor—the fading splendor of the sky brightening her nut brown hair, her hands crossed and hanging idly over her knees, her dark eyes fixed upon the distant hills bathed now all in gold and purple, a step sounded near.

"Ah! a thousand pardons," coming close to her and starting back, "I thought it was E—— Miss Lewin in the dusk. Miss Brown, I presume. Am I right?" and beside her stood Raphael Wilde, his hat in his hand, his beautiful eyes bent upon her face, a smile on his lips. Somewhat confused, the teacher rose from her humble seat.

"Miss Lewin has gone over to the Newcomes'," she said, a rose-blush spreading over her cheeks. He looked at her admiringly.

"I will go for her," he said, his face brightening, and in another moment he was gone.

Sylve stood looking after his retreating figure, her eyes full of trouble.

"No such happiness for me—no—for ever, and for ever!" she cried, in a low, pained voice, passionately. "He is like, very like him. Surely Eve Lewin ought to be happy—and she is; it irks me to see that placid smile on her face; it—it—makes me hate her!" and unconsciously she clinched her hands.

"Reckon ye'd better come in, chile," called Dee, from the top of the steps; "de jews ob dis climate mighty onhealthy."

Sylve came to herself with another sigh, as she cast a lingering look over the landscape, and went slowly into the house, with a strange weight at her heart. She paused on the threshold to gaze at the picture the long kitchen presented. A fire of red-hot embers glowed and crackled in the great square hearth, giving a wondrous varnish to the crimson tiles in front. The fire was at her left. Dee had swept and brightened the floor. In front of the glowing coals, patted close against a board of hickory-wood, slowly baked a corn-meal johnny-cake. The faint firelight fell athwart the long space, creeping up to the edges of the many shining utensils of tin and copper that hung from the wide dresser. Over the boundary line that separated sitting-room from kitchen, a large square of brilliant carpet, the remains of a drawing-room splendor, gave an air of comfort to that part of the room. On that border, culinary adornment ended, and tasteful decoration began. Vines and plants hung from charming baskets in the windows. Statuettes on brackets, lovely pictures, shelves full of books, and little fanciful arrangements of Fall leaves and ferns, gave token of innate culture and refinement on the part of the inmates of this broken paradise. Here were lounges, the fine piano, a guitar, racks of music, a low rocking-chair and easy-chair, tables mended by Crow's black, capable fingers, and a marble pedestal upon which stood a porcelain vase, that before Sylve came had reposed ingloriously in a dusky corner, in twenty pieces at the least. Sylve had cemented the fragments, and the fine antique gave grace and dignity to the more humble adornments around it.

Sylve, no ways comforted by all this homelike beauty, walked forward and seated herself dejectedly in Eve's low rocking-chair. Her eyes emitted a clear, electric fire as she mused. She was conscious of her own power, and believed in destiny. Indeed, as far as religious or heart culture were concerned, Sylve was little better than a heathen. Eve, on the contrary, was intensely and emotionally religious, taught, strangely enough, by slaves. Sylve was quicker, brighter, more magnetic than Eve, though she acknowledged Eve's more ethereal nature. Eve was in some things quite as innocent as a child, and inherited from her father a high sense of honor. She was also intensely proud of race; in fact, her pride was the weak point in her character, though it had so long lain dormant.

"So I have seen their prince," murmurs Sylve, while Dee rolls the table into the centre of the imagined sitting-room. "He looks born to command, like another;" here she sighs and a frown contracts her brow. "But I will not think of him. And Eve is such a lifeless little thing. How could he ever fancy her?"

Thinking intensely, with contracted brows and tightly-shut lips, she sits by the window till the brief twilight melts into starlight and a crescent moon makes its appearance in the pale sky overhead.

Dee pronounced the cake done and the "chicken browned lovely," in a tone of triumph. At that moment Raphael entered, Eve clinging to him and looking fondly into his face. Both young creatures seemed to be lifted above earth, themselves the centre of all pleasure, the world a void. The fragrance of smoking viands soon broke the spell, however.

"I didn't dream that I was hungry till this very minute," said Raphael; "but this fragrance makes me ravenous"—he turned towards the table.

"Ray, you haven't seen Miss Brown," Eve exclaimed, with a happy little laugh. How Sylve loathed the name from that moment!

"Yes, I have, indeed; introduced myself to her—didn't I?" turning to the lovely, glowing face; "or did we recognize each other through sympathetic magnetism or mediumship? I am Raphael Wilde—if I didn't say so before—at your service," and he bowed low, his handsome, laughing eyes sparkling, "or, as Eve here dubs me sometimes, Wild Raphael."

They were a merry trio—in appearance, at least—around the snowy cloth that evening. Dee stood near, her sinewy black arms folded, her favorite attitude, now and then showing her large, white teeth, occasionally chiming in with some original remark, with the freedom of a petted and privileged servant. After supper, Sylve sat down to the piano and listlessly ran the octaves up and down. Her cheeks were flushed, her eyes full of a strange electric fire. Unwonted impulses stirred her heart. Vistas as of some charmed future opened before her. She felt how barren and loveless her life had been; how robbed of all brightness and softness, and a miserable envy of this more fortunate girl rankled in her bosom.

"Don't pretend that you can't do better than that," said Eve, laughing—"play some delicious waltz-music that we can dance by. Come, Ray, this is a glorious floor for waltzing."

The young fellow held forth both hands with a glance towards his betrothed which to Sylve was a stab; but Eve sprang forth radiant, the bloom of innocence mantling her cheek, the light of love sparkling in her eye, and, presently, to dreamy rhythm, the two went swiftly down the long polished floor, forgetting, in their present happiness, all past trouble, and seeing no serpent in their paradise.

"Is he not everything that is good and noble?" Eve asked, when the two girls sat together by the fire on the hearth in the shadowy parlor, protected from drafts by a heavy screen.

"He seems so," said Sylve, quietly. "I am not enthusiastic, you know, nor is my blood as quick as yours. We dark people are suspicious. I must study him a while."

"You dark people are suspicious—as if I would believe that!" said Eve, untwisting the coil of her golden hair. "Why, Raphael is shades darker than you. Would you have me believe that he is suspicious? No, no, he is candor itself; neither," she added, a minute after, "do I believe you are."

"Oh, yes, I am. What lovely hair he has—rather a kink in it, isn't there? Do you believe—now don't be angry with me for saying it—I should fancy him an Octoroon if I didn't know——"

"What an idea! I retract my decision—you must be suspicious to connect such a thought with my Raphael. It's enough to make his mother rise in her grave, you wicked girl!" Half in sport though she was, Eve's cheeks blazed, and her gentle eyes flashed unwontedly. "His mother was very dark."

"Still I am curious enough to wonder what you would do if that were really the case?"

"What I would do? The question is—well, it would be an insult from any one else. In that case, you must see from what little you know of me that it would be impossible for him ever to have been even my friend."

"Dee is your friend."

Eve flushed a deeper scarlet.

"The cases are not parallel. Dee is my nurse, slave, servant—now dependent, rather. I command her, I exact work from her, I love her dearly, but even that cannot alter our relations. She would tell you so herself. But don't let us talk of such things, for I feel myself growing angry, and my inheritance from papa is a high temper and a proud, sensitive spirit. I am afraid already I have said too much. Kiss me, I am going to bed. I suppose you will sit up a while and dream with your eyes open, as usual. I daresay sometimes you write poetry while I am asleep."

"No, indeed," Sylve responded, throwing herself back in the capacious easy-chair and clasping her hands over her head. "I should be only too glad if I could. I would coin my gift into money."

"Ask Ray to write you some verses, you mercenary creature; he writes delightfully, as you play."

When Eve had disappeared in the solemn shadows that wrapped in the high four-poster, Sylve bent her head and looked into the fire with an absent and weary expression. How still the house was! Dee had told her some wild story about the left wing which was said to be haunted. Was she waiting to hear the sound of the measured footsteps as the fire flickered and burnt blue? Suddenly a little box upon the table at her elbow attracted her attention. It had been left there by Eve, who sometimes deposited her trinkets within, but now it seemed empty. It was made of sandalwood, and its odor was exquisite.

"Just the fragrance for one who is sad," murmured the girl to herself, as she lifted it to admire its beauty and inhale the subtle incense made sweeter and stronger by the heat of the burning embers. Eve slept softly. Sylve knelt closer to the fire and turned the box round and round, the better to observe its rare carved tracery, when—she must have touched some secret spring—a sheet of yellow, faded paper fell out. Lifting it, she saw, almost before she was aware of reading a word, the mention of Raphael's name. The letter was signed by Colonel Wilde, U. S. A., and written in confidence, apparently, to Colonel Lewin. Tempted strongly, she forgot that even night and silence confided this sheet to her honor, and read on. A quick and almost baleful light illumined her face. She clasped her hands with the gesture of one who sees unexpectedly the way out of some dark labyrinth.

"So, I am not the only one smitten by the hand of a secret and dreadful disgrace. This would make your proud heart writhe, Eve Lewin. Oh, how little she thinks there is such a document as this in the wide world! Now would it not be easy to strike him out of her heart? Sustained by her strong sense of family honor and superiority, I question whether she would even suffer much. And then if he could love me! and if I could forget! I will forget Flix Forester! But, great heaven, what wickedness am I planning! Why should she know of this paper at all? It would be a friendly act to put it in the fire. No, no! I can't do that; I have no right to do that, and she has a right to know that she is deceived and imposed upon. Still, it will be a terrible blow," she looked at the letter with parted lips. She sought the secret of the spring. Might it not be best to restore the document to its mysterious hiding-place? But the search was all in vain. Nothing rewarded it save the blank interior of the upper part of the receptacle which had held Eve's small stock of jewels. Still undecided, after having concealed the missive, she took her place by the side of the happy, trusting Eve.

For days after that, until Raphael had taken his departure, her mood was more preoccupied than usual. A feverish bloom deepened the faint carmine of her cheeks; her eyes were glittering and restless. She grew absent and constrained in manner, and went alone by herself sometimes to consult with conscience, but, oftener, to dally with temptation. Eve regarded her with a tender interest, for she had learned to love her.

At last she made her decision.

CHAPTER XXIX.—A TERRIBLE SHOCK.

"YOU must leave your school," Eve said, one day to Sylve in her pretty authoritative manner. "You are absolutely feverish; your hand burns and your eyes are as bright as if you had been living on cologne for a week."

"You forget that I am not my own mistress," said Sylve, wishing heartily that she was for the moment. "How can I live if I do not work? If I prove my inability to teach through the failure of my health, there are plenty quite willing to take my place—would be glad to do so, no doubt."

"Suppose you give up for a while and let that little pale cousin of Salome's—by-the-way, is she a cousin?"

"By three or four removes," replied Sylve.

"Well, she could take your place for a few weeks while you recruit, and we'd have such jolly walks and picnics. I think September picnics are the best. One don't get so hot and thirsty and tired. By-the-way, what a sad history is written in that girl's face! Do you believe she knows that spot?"

"Oh, yes, Salome told her; she was sure to find out by the servants if she had not."

"Poor child, one must always have one's sorrow," said Eve, pitifully, pinching the ruffles in her apron. "Mine is bad enough—being so poor—but thank God it's no worse. Salome tells me she had a lover, and he has forgotten her. There's bitterness!"

During this speech Sylve's cheeks had turned from red to white.

"But—anyway—won't you think of my plan?" Eve persisted. "You can still keep on teaching—me! I am of sufficient importance to take all your time, I think."

Sylve shook her head.

"You selfish little thing!" cried Eve, pretending to box her ears. "Never mind, wait till Ray and I are married, then when you need rest you shall make your home with us! Don't that sound pretty? Do you know Ray admires you very much—and I'm not in the least jealous. He says your touch on the piano is exquisite, and that you are full of the magnetism of genius."

Sylve's breath came quick, the pupils of her eyes dilated.

"Did he say that?" Her cheeks crimsoned and she averted her face.

"He did say it; there, I have had my talk out," and Eve was soon engrossed with her book. Eve did not see the half-guilty movement with which Sylve drew a small package from her pocket. Another moment the sandal-wood box was in her hand and had fallen heavily to the floor. This time the spring did not move, but Sylve had cunningly contrived that the letter should fall with it. She stooped and picked it up.

"There's a letter, dear, isn't it, came out of the box? How curious! A moment ago I opened it, and I'm certain there was no letter there."

"Why, no; there was no letter there this morning," said Eve, slowly looking up from her book. "I never kept letters in that; it's a trinket-box—an old letter, too, isn't it?"

"Years old, I should think," said Sylve, trying to speak lightly, "it is so yellowed. Wouldn't it be odd if there was a secret spring in the box which opened as it fell down."

"Why, yes, it would be, rather," replied Eve. "That box belonged to papa; he set great store by it, and when the soldiers were here one of them took it, but Dee found it packed up with his luggage, and I do believe she would have been shot before she'd have let him have it again." By this time she had the paper in her hands, half a letter sheet. "It's papa's letter, I suppose," she said, half-aloud. "Oh, yes," looking at the signature, "one of Colonel Wilde's; wonder if it's worth reading," and she laughed lightly.

Alas! how little one suspects as he lifts his glance to a hand's-breadth white speck in the blue heavens, that in its train come lightnings freighted with devastation and death. The moment Eve's eyes scanned the first line her bosom began to heave, and her hand clinched on the paper.

"Why, this"—her lips grew pale as ashes, she trembled from head to foot, rose from her seat in an uncertain way, looked at the teacher, who pretended to be very busy now, asked faintly for permission to read, and slid into the chair she had before occupied, like one weary or faint. Sylve dared not watch her. She heard her own heart beat so loudly that it seemed to her it must be audible in any part of the room. Nevertheless, her eye was drawn as by a magnet to the face now white and set as chiseled marble. She felt rather than saw how the small lips quivered, the blue eyes dilated, and the veins stood out over temple and throat.

At last overtaxed nature gave way in a groan of exceeding agony.

"Oh, this is too dreadful!"

"What is it, dear?" queried Sylve, real alarm in voice and gesture.

"Something I cannot tell you—cannot tell any one. Oh, my God! Something I ought not, will not believe."

Sylve was silent. If remorse, if even terror made her pulses leap with quick fierce strokes, outwardly she was very calm.

"And yet it is Colonel Wilde's own letter; it was written by Colonel Wilde himself," murmured Eve, in the muffled voice of stifled anguish. "Pardon me," she added, a moment after, raising her blanched face, "I cannot tell it even to you. It—it is—a—a letter of—business."

Sylve listened tremblingly to the faltering voice, saw the poor pale drawn face, and felt like a murderer. What had this girl done to her except to show before her her simple happiness? How fervently she now wished, the better nature wakening, that she had thrown the terrible missive in the fire, as Eve, thrusting the letter in her bosom, and leaving Sylve alone with her own self accusation that amounted to anguish, went out into the moonlighted kitchen, and there for long, dreary hours walked back and forth. This was the sentence that seemed likely to be her death-warrant:

"Raphael is the son of my wife's favorite slave, Estelle, and I, having taken every pains to conceal this fact, and for fear it might some time leak out, have caused free papers to be drawn up for him, which I have had since his infancy in my possession.

"And now I will turn to another and a pleasanter matter, for, as you may believe, my blood is on fire at the thought of this dreadful wrong. What would my dear wife say, who loves me so devotedly, if she should hear it? Why, I should feel like killing myself on the spot.

"Am I never to get away from this subject? I send you with this letter instructions with reference to the boy's education. Heaven bless him, he is the idol of my heart. I hope he may make an honorable and useful man, and never hear one whisper prejudicial to his birth and my fair fame. For God's sake take care of that! I am sure you will. I can safely trust myself in your hands, and my reputation. In most things I think I have been honorable, though I often find it on my lips to say like David, 'I am a sinful man, oh, God.' If I should fall in the coming struggle, and I think I shall, you will know just what to do in all respects. I have put my record in your hands. In great haste, your ever loving friend.

"R. T. WILDE, Colonel U. S. A."

This to the proud daughter of a Southern race was little better than a death-warrant. From that hour Eve was changed. No one ever knew what bitter, anguished tears she shed that first awful night. On the day succeeding Sylve was glad to be occupied with her duties, and Eve struggled bravely to maintain an outward composure that she was far from feeling. Sylve tried a few commonplaces of condolence, feeling that she must say something, but desisted as those soft appealing eyes prayed dumbly for silence. The place had become intolerable to Sylve—the house felt like a grave—and Eve seemed a corpse, endowed with vitality enough to look and move. That evening while the unhappy girl was meditating what to do, she spied Samson coming up the steps. That diminutive negro with the gigantic name bore in his hand a note; the note was directed to Sylve, and ran as follows:

"MY DEAR CHILD—As soon as you get this note, whether Eve can spare you or not, come over. I wish to see you on a matter of great importance. Don't wait a moment. I am sure you will be glad I took the liberty to send for you. SALOME."

Sylve flushed to the roots of her hair; a thrill ran from nerve to nerve, a strange yet ecstatic feeling. She smiled.

"Samson, come here!" she said.

The boy came forward, his great beads of pupils, black as night, rolling under brows that were nearer the kinks of his knotted wool than his eyes.

"Sam, I want you to tell me the truth; if you don't, mind," and she emphasized the word with a glance that set him to shaking, "I shall kill you."

The boy had always been afraid of her.

"Oh, lor, missee, don't!" he cried, with chattering teeth.

"Then tell me the truth!"

"Missee S'lome say I mus'n't spoke a word," was his next effort.

"And Missee Sylve tells you if you don't you'll be shot. Has anybody, any stranger, come to the house to-day?"

"Oh, lor! oh, lor! missee!" and he held his hands dramatically up to his ears. "I's an unfortinit nigger! Missee S'lome say I wasn't to tell."

"She did? Then I know; a gentleman has come for me."

"Yes, missee—but I mustn't done gone tell," quaked the boy.

"Oh, no, you needn't tell, I'll only ask you. Is he a young gentleman?"

"Yes, missee, I guess," said Samson.

"Young and fine-looking?"

"Mighty fine-looking, missee. I guess he'm a sojer."

"A soldier, yes—looks like it." She nodded her head vivaciously. "I'm tired of this. I'll go."

She ran up-stairs to kiss Eve, who, in her wretchedness, prayed to be alone, and then left the house with Samson.

CHAPTER XXX.—INTO HIS ARMS.

"I SHALL go up the back way," said Sylve, as they came in sight of the house. "Go tell Miss Salome that I will be with her directly."

"He has come for me," soliloquized Sylve, as she hastened to array herself in the only fine dress she had brought with her, "and only to see him! only to touch his hand! Oh, it will be worth whole years of suffering if I must go back."

Salome sits in the low-ceiled parlor with a stranger, a gentlemanly man, in plain citizen's clothes. Nobody seeing him in that garb would have recognized one of the most remarkable detectives of the day. As Sylve comes in, her long robes sweeping behind her, her beauty glorified by anticipation, her eyes glowing, her lips parted, showing two lines of white pearl, the gentleman with whom Miss Salome is talking, suddenly stands up with a quick start of admiration. Sylve pauses, with another kind of start, a sort of panic that pales her cheek and brings her lips together. The bunch of heliotrope on the small table in the middle of the floor recalls Salome's tastes and habits, but already Sylve feels like a stranger in her old home. Salome goes towards her.

"My dear," she says, softly, "you know I told you this was sure to happen some day; do be reasonable and go back like a good, sensible girl. They must have you, they can't get along without you. You have got to do something in this law case; it is indispensable that you should return."

Sylve makes a cold bow towards the detective, as Salome introduces him—then Salome looks out of the window and smiles. Sylve withdraws and sits down in a recess near the window-seat, angry and repelling. She had not dreamed that this messenger would be a stranger, and the warmth of heart and manner turns to icy coldness. She answers his few questions mechanically, with lowered glances.

"Yes, Sylve de Latude was her name—he is quite right as to his dates—she is very sorry to be found, but, as they have discovered her, she supposes that it is proper for her to return."

Then all at once a strange feeling comes over her. She has never had it before, for she never fainted in her life. The little bunch of purple heliotrope dances up and down, the detective in plain clothes swims across the room with Salome after him and back again. She draws her breath hard, and, without speaking, rushes for the door, throws her hands wildly out to grasp the threshold, which by some mysterious process seems level with her eyes, and falls into somebody's outstretched arms.

"Madam," says Flix Forester, just come in from a saunter in the garden, "I—I think the young lady has fainted." The girl lies a dead weight in his arms. Salome is by his side in a moment—between them they bear her to a lounge.

"Very tragic," mutters the unbelieving official; "miss is evidently a good actress."

When Sylve opens her eyes the first object they encounter is the face of Flix Forester. Vaguly at first she gazes, and then with coming intelligence a great light flashes out of the beautiful orbs, and she turns her head away blushing rosy red.

"I don't see how it happened," she murmurs.

"Are you better, dear," says Salome. "I have been afraid the climate would give you at least one turn. There, there, don't be too eager to sit up; how nice that you are going to change; it's a great deal better than medicine, a great deal."

"Let me sit up, I am quite well," Sylve says, struggling a little to gain an upright position. "It was so foolish to faint—there was nothing in the world to make me—nothing in the world;" and then a great flood of happiness rushes into her heart, for she remembers into whose arms she fell, and hopes he will think she lost consciousness first, though she did not, dimly seeing his face just before. Flix has retreated and stands by the window, looking thoughtfully out, and talking now and then confidentially to the detective. Later they walk out together.

"When do they want me to go?" asks Sylve. "I wish you were going, too. You can't imagine how awkward I feel."

"I have been talking with them," says Salome, soothingly, glad of the opportunity to wash her hands of the secret, "and they are quite willing to believe that it is only a little romantic escapade, a childish, or rather girlish, folly. Mrs. Forester will receive you with open arms, and it rather softens their mannish view of the matter that you have really been bravely working for yourself. I don't believe Mr. Forester knew it was in you. By-the-way, it is the same Mr. Forester who was thrown from his horse at the time of the murder. He looks scarcely changed. I wonder if Eve Lewin would recognize him?" There is a little tinge of pain as Salome mentions Eve, and Sylve murmurs that her late companion will think strangely of her sudden desertion.

"Oh, I will tell her all about it," Salome responds.

"No, indeed"—Sylve reddens—"not for worlds; promise you won't. Tell her I am gone—Miss Brown has gone away, and sends her love, but don't let her know who I am. I have good reasons. I don't wish to see her again. I never wish to be recognized by her by my real name. It will be just as easy to say Miss Brown, now you have become used to it. Promise me."

"I never saw your equal for mystery," says Salome; "but, there, don't look so terribly anxious; I will promise, and she must make what she will of your sudden departure. Lilly will take your school—you have scarcely become acquainted with Lilly."

"It is just as well. If I had been ever so much attached to her we should have to part. But I like her; she is a very sweet girl. You will come and see me some time, will you not?"

"If it is possible," says Salome. "You know how hard it will be for me ever to leave home, now that I am sole head here."

"But if I particularly send for you?"

"Yes, in case——" Salome begins, hesitatingly.

"In case I marry or die," says Sylve, recklessly.

"Hush! If you marry, of course I will come; you are not going to die, please God, before I have seen you a great many times."

Presently Sylve and Salome vanish. Lilly is called up-stairs. Lilly is like a breezy little wild-flower, or might have been, had not trouble laid its heavy hand upon the delicate petals and bent them to the earth. In the white cheeks and dreamy eyes there is more than a hint of the disappointment that has desolated her life. One thinks, looking at her, of faded letters and love-tokens laid carefully away to be wept over sometimes. Silently and expeditiously they help Sylve pack her little treasures—these are very few. Then she leaves messages and gifts for each of her pupils—there are not many; and then—she is eager to go down-stairs. What can she say to Flix? He will be there all the long evening. What will he say to her? she thinks. He will talk probably of his mother. No matter who he talks of, he will talk with her, and a glad, sweet emotion drowns even the memory of the barrier between them. Of course he will never care for her, but that does not trouble her much. She will be near him. She has forgotten that Raphael Wilde ever existed. Raphael! he was a boy beside this handsome, tall, and well-grown man. How eager she was to go down, for the gentlemen were not to take their departure till early in the morning. What was her disappointment, therefore, to find the parlor empty!

SCIENTIFIC INTELLIGENCE.

A MOVEMENT is on foot to erect an educational natural history museum in Perth, as a memorial to the late Sir THOMAS MONCRIEFFE, President of the Perthshire Natural History Society.

Professors C. A. F. Peters (director of Kiel Observatory) and Albert von Kölliker (Würzburg) have been decorated by the King of Bavaria with the Maximilian Order for Art and Science.

The Emperor of Austria has presented the Austrian Gold Medal for Arts and Sciences to Herr Wilhelm Hodmann, of Dresden, in recognition of his merits in advancing the art of photography.

On January 24, 1882, the University of Würzburg will celebrate the 300th anniversary of its foundation. The Bavarian Government had intended to set aside a sum of £2,000 to defray the expenses of the celebration. The Finance Committee of the Bavarian House of Deputies have, however, declined to allow the sum in question.

In the Present Critical state of affairs between China and Japan in regard to the suzerainty of the Loochoo Islands, much interest attaches to an official document issued in the latter country on the subject. All the Loochoo Islands, the Japanese maintain, are connected by certain geomantic signs in the earth with the Japanese province of Satsuma. The forty-eight characters of the Japanese alphabet are in use there, having been communicated to the islanders by Minamotonotametomo. As regards language, they use a mixture of Chinese words and the Japanese alphabet in their literature. They call their own kingdom Okina, or otherwise, Ukinawa. As regards religion, they worship Yi Shih, the Great Spirit of Japan, besides other divinities. In many of their domestic customs, too, the Japanese maintain that their practice indubitably indicates their origin.

Entomology in the United States.—Great advance has been made in the study of insects during the last few years, partly prompted by the ravages committed by these lower forms of life. Many large and valuable collections have been accumulated, and the literature on the subject has become quite extensive. The General Government of the United States has appointed a commission to investigate the more injurious pests, and the results of the labors of this commission have proved to be of great value in pointing out the best manner of exterminating the ravagers. An entomological club has been organized which holds its meetings simultaneously with the American Association. At the last session the names of 250 entomologists were reported; this year the list has increased to 285 persons who make the study of insects a specialty. The literature of the subject has also grown to great proportions, and there are numerous periodicals exclusively devoted to its treatment. Among the leading entomologists may be mentioned Professor J. A. Lintner, Albany, N. Y.; Professor C. V. Riley, St. Louis, Mo.; Professor A. R. Grote, Buffalo, N. Y.; Professor W. S. Barnard, Ithaca, N. Y.; Professor S. H. Scudder, Cambridge, Mass.

The New Metal, Scandium.—According to M. Cléve, scandium has only been found in minute quantities in gadolinite and yttro-tantalite, two minerals which are very rare. It apparently forms but one oxide, a sesqui-oxide, having the formula Sc_2O_3. The atomic weight of the metal is 44.91, and the atomic weight of the oxide is 44.12. The atomic weight of scandium can be regarded at 45. What renders the discovery of scandium interesting is the fact that its existence was predicted by M. Mendélijef in his celebrated memoir on the periodicity of the elements. This author pointed out that a metal ought some day to be found having the atomic weight of 44, a sesqui-oxide and other preparations to which scandium is very analogous. M. Mendélijef gave the name of ekabor to the hypothetical metal, a designation which could be retained with great propriety instead of scandium. The sesqui-oxide of ekabor or scandium appears to be more energetic in its behavior than alumina, which it closely resembles. It appears probable that a scandium alum can be made as soon as enough material is on hand. The sesqui-oxide is less basic than magnesia. Scandium is too rare to predict for it any uses in the arts.

Improvement in Silvering Mirrors.—To silver a mirror in the usual way, the glass, previously carefully cleaned, is placed upon an iron table covered with linen and cloth, and is heated to about 104° Fahrenheit. Two solutions, one of tartaric acid and the other of ammoniacal nitrate of silver, are poured upon it, and, by aid of heat, the organic acid reduces the silver to a thin metallic film in the course of twenty minutes. The whole process terminates in an hour. The plate is then dried and the silver protected by a coating of varnish. The results obtained have not always proved satisfactory, as the silver sometimes peeled off, and the varnish did not prevent the deleterious effects of sulphur fumes. M. Lenoir has introduced a modification. After the glass is coated with silver it is submitted to the action of a weak solution of the double cyanide of potassium and mercury; an amalgam of silver, very white, pure and adhesive, results. To facilitate the operation, M. Lenoir strews finely pulverized zinc over the plate before pouring on the solution of cyanide. The silver mirrors thus prepared do not give a yellow reflection, but present images perfectly white and pure. The silver amalgam resists the action of sulphurous fumes and is in every way permanent.

The Conversion of Mechanical Energy into Heat by Magneto-electric Machines.—In consequence of a suggestion before the Parliamentary Commission on Electric Lighting, made by Sir William Thomson, that hot water might probably be distributed through the streets of a city economically in the copper tubes used to convey electricity for power, the heat being produced by the resistance of the tube, Professor George F. Barker has made a series of experiments upon a dieneux machine, with a view to determine the economy practicably realizable by this method of heating. His experiments were made at Ansonia, Conn., by the kindness of Wallace & Sons. Professor Barker is of the opinion that Sir William Thomson's theory can be sustained in practice, and that the heat generated in this way can be applied to every necessity of the household. In cases where electric light was furnished by magneto-electric machines and the current was transmitted through hollow copper conductors by filling these conductors or tubes with water the heat would be sufficient to bring the water to a boil, and thus by turning a thumb-screw we could boil an egg or make coffee at a moment's notice without interfering in the least with the efficiency of the electric light.

MADAME COLBAN is a distinguished Norwegian writer, who did not attempt authorship until she was nearly sixty years old. She has produced since then five romances, which are described as charming. Her children were established in life, her health began to fail, and her duties and amusements as a woman of society grew irksome. So she went to live in Rome, where she has renewed her youth in literary work.

THE Empress of Russia, who has been spending the Winter at Cannes, near Nice, for the benefit of her health, has started for St. Petersburg. If she reaches St. Petersburg alive she believes it will be possible for her to reconcile her husband and son, and restore some measure of political tranquility to that much-distracted country.

GOVERNOR DAVIS of Maine is a son of a clergyman of the Christian Connection, and is nearly thirty-seven years old. His story is that of Maine boys generally. He worked on a farm when young, made his way to the high schools, and became a soldier when the country needed him. While in the army he studied Latin and recited to an officer. After leaving the service he went to the seminary at Kent's Hill, and helped himself along by teaching.

In 1854 he was appointed rouge croix par suivant, and figures at the head of all the Queen's processions at royal weddings, etc. He began as a dramatist when only twenty-two years old. During the next fifteen years he wrote seventy-six pieces, and has since added one hundred to the list. He wrote "The Brigand," in which the late Mr. Wallack, with the song, "Gentle Zitella," made such a hit at Drury Lane and at his theatre in New York City.

the legislation of that Society is due to his legal ability and enterprise. On the decease of its late President, Mr. Gerry was unanimously elected its President in September last.

It is worthy of remark that the Society whose chief executive he now is owes its inception and creation to the successful institution which so efficiently guards the mute dependents of mankind from abuse and inhumanity.

The recent appalling case of cruelty to children at the "Shepherd's Fold," and Mr. Gerry's prompt and unsparing investigation of the same, foreshadows an augmented usefulness of the Society over which he presides.

Mr. Gerry was a member of the Constitutional Convention of this State in 1867. In the same year he married Miss Louisa M. Livingston, daughter of Robert J. Livingston, and a great-granddaughter of Morgan Lewis.

THE BURNING OF A MEMORABLE CHURCH.

THE one hundredth anniversary of the burning of the first edifice of the First Presbyterian Church, at Elizabeth, N. J., by the British and Tories, was celebrated with appropriate services on Sunday, January 25th. The old church was a "frame shingle building," and was among the first buildings erected in the town. The original congregation of the church was the first that worshiped in the English language in New Jersey. The Rev. James Caldwell, "The Fighting Parson," was at the time of the burning the pastor of the church, and was serving in the army as a chaplain. About four months after the old church was burned a British soldier shot Mrs. Caldwell, the wife of the heroic pastor, dead in her house at Connecticut Farms, near Elizabethtown; and soon after the surrender of Cornwallis a soldier in the Continental army shot the Rev. Mr. Caldwell dead at "The Point," or what is now called Elizabethport. The present church building, which is on the site of the old church, was begun in July, 1784, and was finished in 1786. It is built of brick. The tall steeple of wood, painted white, contains a town-clock, and a bell that has often announced the tidings of victory and sounded the alarm when danger was near. Embedded in the walls of the church are quaint tombstones, some of which are over two hundred years old. In the graveyard, which originally comprised eight acres, are many tombstones over a century old; and the visitor may see the graves of Tories in close proximity to the monuments and slabs inscribed with the names of the Rev. Jonathan Dickenson, the first pastor of the First Presbyterian Church; the heroic Caldwell, who was pastor during the Revolution; and the pious Murray. In the northeast end of the burying ground, fronting on Broad Street, is the lecture-room of the church. It stands on the spot once occupied by the College of New Jersey, now known as Princeton College, which was founded in Elizabethtown by the Rev. Jonathan Dickenson.

The church was handsomely decorated and festooned for the centennial exercises, and was crowded beyond comfort.

NEW JERSEY.—CENTENNIAL OF THE BURNING OF THE FIRST PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, ELIZABETH.

THE DUCHESS DOWAGER OF MEDINACELI.

THE days of the old Spanish grandees, when the hidalgos ruled the land and their word was law, are gone. A new order of things prevails, and the men of to-day are of another type, on whom the aristocratic titles still sit awkwardly.

The old nobles kept aloof for a time, but in Spain, as elsewhere, they are coming forward again in the great improvements of the country, aiding to develop the agricultural, commercial and mineral resources of the peninsula. In this movement of the zeitgeist, no one is more prominent than the lady whose portrait we present, Doña Angela Perez de Barradas, Duchess Dowager of Medinaceli, Santisteban, Feria, Alcalá, etc., Countess of Santa Gadea, and an array of other titles. Her influence has been great, and, still young and beautiful, she points as proudly to the medals bestowed on her in the great universal exhibitions as she does to her genealogical tree and the coats-of-arms of her ancestors, who fought of old against the Moors. She has perfected the products of the forests and won premiums for the high grade of the resinous productions from her estates at Navas and Guadarrama. She founded and presides over the Society for the Encouragement of Agriculture in Spain; she is also president of the League of Contributors, at Madrid, and an active member of various agricultural and industrial societies.

BOOK NOTICE.

THE AMERICAN ALMANAC for 1880, edited by Mr. Spofford, the efficient Librarian of Congress (American News Company), is a veritable treasury of facts, and an indispensable hand-book to all interested in the statistical, financial and political matters of the United States.

Co-operative Stores.

THE annual reports of the English and Scotch co-operative stores are now being published. The profits divided among the members of the societies range from one shilling three pence to two shillings eight pence on the pound sterling of purchases made during the year, and seem to average about two shillings or ten per cent. Stating the amount in dollars, a member of one of these co-operative stores, about which Mr. Holyoake gave so much interesting information during his late visit to this country, receives at the end of the year one dollar in the way of profit for every ten dollars' worth of goods he has bought. This is clear gain to him, for he gets his goods at the regular market prices, and is, besides, assured that what he buys is of good quality and free from adulteration. The Manchester Co-operative Wholesale Society, from which the co-operative stores buy their goods, is a federative institution, composed of 384 societies, comprising 305,161 members. It has a capital of £241,000, on which it pays five per cent. interest, and its profits are divided among the branch societies in proportion to their purchases, just as the societies divide their profits among the individual members.

The Public Works of France.

M. DE FREYCINET, before leaving the Department of Public Works, has drawn up a report on the progress of the scheme of improvements he was employed in carrying out. The expenditure it will involve, he estimates, will not fall much short of 6,000,000,000 francs. Of this, railways will absorb 3,500,000,000 francs; rivers and canals, 1,000,000,000 francs, and ports 500,000,000 francs. The remainder, a sum of 700,000,000 francs or 800,000,000 francs, is likely to be expended on the purchase of railways which the original grantees have been either unable to finish or to work. In May last, 500,000,000 francs of this sum were already employed in the buying and completion of the lines of ten such companies. The execution of the scheme is to extend over a period of twelve years, terminating in 1890, when France will have augmented her length of railways of general interest, now amounting to 42,000 kilomètres, by 18,000 kilomètres. Some 10,000 kilomètres of canals and rivers will have been added to the internal navigable ways, and the ports almost entirely transformed. As yet only a small part of the work has been done, the investigations, surveys and plans not yet being ready. About 1,000 additional engineers have been engaged, and next Summer the scheme fairly enters on its phase of execution. In 1878, the first year of the programme, only 108,000,000 francs were expended, this year the sum will be 193,000,000 francs, next year certainly 300,000,000 francs. In 1881 400,000,000 francs, till in 1882 the programme will be fully launched, and thenceforth the annual outlay will amount to about 500,000,000 francs. M. de Freycinet mentions that there is more and almost as important work still to be done as regards irrigation, drainage, furnishing the towns with drinking-water, etc., and that two bills will be submitted next session as an earnest of coming improvements in this direction. He concludes by indicating the pacific conquests and progress of civilization contemplated in Africa, where three missions are leaving different points of Algeria to report on the feasibility of a railway through the Sahara, thus connecting with France the valleys of the Niger and Congo.

New View of the Discovery of America.

AT a recent examination of a group of "One-Year Volunteers" in the Grand Duchy of Baden, the examiner asked a young country fellow if he could tell him anything about the discovery of America. The youth answered that the late Pope Pius IX. had succeeded in collecting indubitable proofs that Christopher Columbus, inspired by his zeal for the Church and the Faith, was eager to discover a shorter route to the Holy Sepulchre, and that during his explorations in pursuit of this object, he discovered America by accident! The examiner, astounded and indignant at such a reply, asked him where he had found all this nonsense. The youth answered that it was not nonsense, for he had only lately read it in the Badische Beobachter, No. 225, 1879. This explanation, like the answer of the theological candidate in the Jahrad, produced a universal shaking of heads. The newspaper in question is the leading Ultramontane organ in the Grand Duchy. The special number which the young volunteer had quoted as his authority was obtained, and the passage stood there exactly as he had quoted it. It was a translation from an article in a Belgian religious magazine giving an account of the progress of the movement for the canonization of the discoverer of America. The Belgian writer adds that it was "the magnificent idea of Columbus, after his discovery of America, to conquer these new lands for the Church, to win their souls and their treasures for the Kingdom of Christ, and to expend the latter in the purchase of the Holy Places of Palestine, and afterwards to offer these latter as a present to the Pope." The same authority adds that Columbus further hoped that he and his descendants would be nominated by the Pope to the office of "Stanihalter" and "Perpetual Protector of the Holy Sepulchre." All these things, as the writer convincingly concludes, show that it was partly a thought of faith which guided Columbus to the discovery of America, held him upright in the midst of a thousand dangers, and consoled him against numerous acts of ingratitude.

Raising Carp.

IN the Fall of 1875, Levi Davis, of Forestville, Sonoma County, Cal., concluded to make some experiments in carp culture. He constructed two ponds, one six square rods in size and the other about eight. His subsequent operations and success he narrates as follows: "On the morning of January 20th, 1876, I purchased six carp from Mr. Poppe, paying $1.30, and on the 21st put them in my empty pond. One died shortly afterwards, leaving only five to start with. On the 27th of December, same year, I drew the water off and changed the young into another pond, and there were about 2,044 young fish about four to six inches long. I ate or threw away all of my common fish. 'In 1877 I had 2,672 from the same five old fish, and in 1878 I had about 4,000 from them, and I do not know how many I will have in 1879, as I have not drawn the water off my breeding pond yet. I drew the water out of the pond to get some for shipping, and found about 1,000 young fish in it. And now what is the result? I have four ponds, and they cost me $41.30 apiece, and the fish pond has cost about $40, or $10 a year on an average, making in all $270. I have sold $415 worth at from twenty-five cents to $2 each, which leave $145 cash, and my family has been eating fish for eighteen months, and I must have 6,000 or 8,000 on hand, and all of my ponds will not cover one acre of land. The pleasure pays for all trouble, and when you sit down to a breakfast of carp you have something delicious. I think the feed that will make one pound of pork will make ten of carp, if they are not crowded too thick in the pond. I would rather have ten acres of fish ponds than all the land I could cultivate, for the people will eat, and they will eat that which is good if they can get it."

A POET asks: "Where are the dreams of the days gone by?" This is a singular query, even for a poet. The dreams of the days gone by are like the days themselves gone by—gone by. A dream can't be preserved like quinces and pears, and other fruit. The poet can witness just as lively and startling dreams as those that have fled, if he will eat a mince pie, a dozen raw oysters, and some pickled pigs' feet, and drink a pint of cider before going to bed.

"A DROP OF JOY IN EVERY WORD."

FLEMINGTON, Hunterdon Co., N. J.

Dr. R. V. PIERCE, Buffalo, N. Y.:

Three months ago I was broken out with large ulcers and sores on my body, limbs and face. I procured your GOLDEN MEDICAL DISCOVERY and PURGATIVE PELLETS, and have taken six bottles, and today I am in good health, all those ugly ulcers having healed and left my skin in a natural, healthy condition. I thought at one time I could not be cured. Although I can but poorly express my gratitude to you, yet there is a drop of joy in every word I write. Yours truly, JAMES O. BELLIS.

SKIN DISEASES.

A SEVERE case of five years' duration entirely cured.

Messrs. WEEKS & POTTER: Gentlemen—For the benefit of the world I wish to make this statement: I have been afflicted with a skin disease for about five years, and have tried almost everything that I could hear of, without any relief whatever, until I saw your CUTICURA REMEDIES advertised, and concluded to try them.

I certify that I only used them about six weeks until I was entirely well; but before I commenced using them, my face, breast, and back were almost a solid scab, and I often scratched the blood from my body. I am now entirely well and think your CUTICURA REMEDIES are the best for skin diseases that ever was brought before the public.

Very gratefully yours, F. M. FOX.

THE WINTER FASHIONS

JUST RECEIVED FROM PARIS.

Frank Leslie's

LADY'S MAGAZINE

—AND—

Gazette of Fashion,

Universally regarded for nearly a quarter of a century as the

FASHION STANDARD OF AMERICA

FULL AND ACCURATE DESCRIPTIONS ARE GIVEN OF THE LATEST PARISIAN STYLES OF LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S COSTUMES.

Beautiful Colored and Plain Fashion Plates

Are imported monthly from Paris,

EXCLUSIVELY FOR THIS MAGAZINE.

"FRANK LESLIE'S LADY'S MAGAZINE for January, 1880, is out, and the lady who is fortunate enough to get a copy will need no further information as to what she shall wear or how it shall be made up. Here you have fashions for the home, visiting, carriage and promenade toilets—children as well as grown people—street dresses and bridal toilets, and everything, to the minutest detail, to make the ladies happy. A large number of short, interesting stories complete the book, which has quite a number of good engravings. The subscription is only $3.50 a year, postpaid, which, considering the character and style of the magazine, makes it the cheapest and best we know of."—The Covenant, Phila., Pa.

"FRANK LESLIE'S LADY'S MAGAZINE needs no special praise at our hands; it speaks for itself, and is a prime favorite in every household where it has ever gained a foothold. Its stories, its poetry, its sketches, its engravings, its fashions—all things about it, in fact—are first-class in their way; and, take it for all in all, we don't know of a lady's magazine in America that excels it, and few that come within cannon-shot of equaling it, in any of the departments we have mentioned. In point of cheapness it outranks them all, quality and quantity considered, its price being only $3.50 a year, postpaid."—Lyons (N. Y.) Republican.

The readers of the LADY'S MAGAZINE have the earliest information of the constant change in Fashions, as its reports appear simultaneously with those in the journals of Paris.

Each Number is Profusely Embellished,

GENERAL GRANT DECIDEDLY A CANDIDATE.

PENNSYLVANIA is entitled to fifty-eight votes in the Republican National Convention—more than belong to any other State except New York. The fifty-eight delegates from Pennsylvania will go to Chicago next June pledged to vote as a unit, and instructed to vote for the nomination of General Grant for a third term. That these instructions proceed from a State Convention in which a majority of the members were actually hostile to General Grant's candidacy; that the managers who drew up these instructions are the same men who, in 1875, procured the passage of a resolution declaring the Republican Party of Pennsylvania "unalterably opposed to the election to the Presidency of any person for a third term"; that when the delegation to Chicago casts its solid vote for General Grant it will misrepresent the will of the Republican voters of Pennsylvania, representing only the will of a single man who is accustomed to work the machinery of the party to his own advantage—all this counts for nothing in the game. The one material fact is the fact that General Grant has nearly one-sixth of all the votes needed to nominate him for President.

The event at Harrisburg marks an important change in the aspect of the third-term movement. Up to the present time it has appeared in the somewhat nebulous character of a "boom." It has been set forth as a sort of popular uprising against the politicians and political traditions, as the spontaneous demand of loyal citizens that the distinguished soldier whom they honor as the foremost man of the country be again placed at the head of executive affairs. While the magnitude of the movement has been constantly insisted upon, its outlines have been but vaguely indicated. At the East, the soul of the movement has been supposed to exist somewhere in the West; in Chicago and St. Louis, inquiring minds have been referred to Philadelphia for evidence of the genuine enthusiasm of the cry for Grant. But from this time forward the campaign will present a totally different appearance. Now it is the politicians who are forcing General Grant upon the people. Now it is General Grant scheming for place, starting all the wheels of the machine, employing through his friends all the arts and tricks of "practical politics"—in short, using the same methods which Mr. Sherman and Mr. Blaine and other professed candidates are supposed to use for the furtherance of their personal ends. If the matter were of less serious moment to the country, there would be something very grotesque in a review of General Grant's rapid changes of attitude towards the voters of the Republican Party since he landed at San Francisco. Changing by almost imperceptible degrees, yet with surprising celerity, he would be seen, first, as the eminent citizen satiated with honors at home and abroad and utterly devoid of political ambition; then as the sincere patriot, desirous of tranquil retirement for the rest of his days, but ready to come to the front in an extraordinary emergency; then as the representative American, willing to serve his fellow-citizens in case of an unanimous call; then at Philadelphia, as the party chieftain, summoning his lieutenants around him and frankly avowing his designs; and, finally, at Harrisburg, working, with his coat off, for the nomination that will not come unsought.

All this has been in accordance with a programme adroitly arranged and pursued, so far, with unvarying success. The capture, by Mr. Don Cameron, of the solid vote of Pennsylvania puts the third term issue squarely before the people. There is no denying, now, that General Grant is in the field, or that the probability of his nomination at Chicago is very strong.

How can that be when there is no doubt of the overwhelming preponderance of Republican sentiment throughout the country against a violation of the unwritten law which limits the Presidential service of any citizen to two terms? The answer goes deep into the workings of what is called practical politics.

Even in the Pennsylvania State Convention, largely constituted as its membership was according to the wishes of Mr. Don Cameron, who was put at the head of the Republican National Committee to manage General Grant's campaign, the friends of Mr. Blaine lacked few votes of being in the majority. And it is probable that the solid delegation, casting fifty-eight votes at Chicago for General Grant, will not more grossly misrepresent the real wishes of the State Convention than the State Convention in its turn misrepresented the preferences of the voters in the State. The machinery of caucus and convention is not designed to give effect to the popular voice. It is built and operated for an altogether different purpose. That is deplorable, but it is true; and while it remains true, delegations will be committed beforehand, nominations will be dictated to conventions, candidates will be forced upon parties, and honest voters with honest preferences will have no choice save the unpleasant alternatives of bolting the regular ticket or voting for men whom they heartily disapprove.

The Pennsylvania Convention was called more than two months earlier than usual in order that its prearranged action might influence the course of events in other States. Its effect in this way will be not less important than the actual gain of the fifty-eight votes. The Republican Convention in New York State is to be held on the 25th of this month. Already, it is apparent that the performance at Utica will be merely a repetition of that at Harrisburg. Senator Conkling's fidelity to the interests of General Grant is not to be questioned, and there is reason to believe that the control of the organization was never more firmly in his hands than it is at the present time. Unforeseen occurrences aside, it is reasonably safe to assume that the seventy delegates of the New York Republicans will carry to Chicago seventy votes for Grant. That will give him at the outset one hundred and twenty-eight of the three hundred and seventy-nine votes required to nominate. To Illinois, where the machine campaign for Grant is moving forward with silent smoothness, the General's friends look for forty-two votes more. They regard Illinois as even more certain than Pennsylvania, for the delegations of the latter State, under the management of the Camerons, have acquired a reputation for dickering and treachery at the last moment.

Thus the three great States of New York, Pennsylvania and Illinois alone furnish one hundred and seventy votes, almost one-half a majority of the convention. Eighteen additional votes are reckoned for General Grant from the two Pacific Coast States—California and Oregon. This leaves him lacking one hundred and ninety-one votes. But now comes the South with its two hundred and seventy-six delegates, representing the skeleton organizations of State parties that are practically defunct, yet wielding in convention all the influence to which they would be entitled were their States safe for the Republican nominee. The Southern delegates will be vociferously for Grant and a third term. Mr. Sherman is credited with having gained some support in that section through the efforts of his industrious agents; but General Grant can afford to give him about one-third of the Southern delegates without feeling the loss.

It is, therefore, in the power of the delegation from Pennsylvania, New York, Illinois, California, Oregon, with two thirds of the Southern Republicans, to force General Grant upon the party as its candidate for President. It may be interesting to observe that not one of these States, with the possible exception of Illinois, can be surely counted on to help elect him after he shall be nominated. But it is a campaign for the nomination that is being carried on at present. After the nomination has been secured, the work of General Grant's immediate friends will be at an end; the responsibility of success or defeat at the polls will be shifted to the shoulders of the Republican Party at large.

Mr. Blaine, Mr. Sherman and General Grant are the only Republican candidates really in the field. To a large and influential element of the party, General Grant is undoubtedly the least acceptable candidate of the three. Yet, of the three, it is General Grant whose chances of nomination are the best at this time.

LENT.

THERE is no doubt that Lent has been observed to a greater or less extent from the very earliest period of the Church. It was held by the Puritans of New England that Lent was invented by some particularly wicked Pope for his personal amusement, though it is difficult to understand how he could have found any acute pleasure in it; but this opinion will not stand the test of investigation. In the writings of the earliest Fathers of the Church, Lent is mentioned as a universally recognized fast, and, though we cannot positively prove that the apostles fasted for forty days before Easter, there is every reason to suppose that they did.

When Lent was first established it was undoubtedly understood to be a period of real fasting. Even the most determined zealots found, however, that if they kept Lent strictly they would starve to death, and the system of compromising between the worldly stomach and the devout spirit, which has ever since characterized the observance of Lent, was introduced. The Church was first permitted to eat vegetables. The entering wedge of potatoes being once admitted, room was soon made for eggs. Then it was discovered that fish was not meat, and could hence be eaten without scandal by the most devout persons. As one can live for forty days on a diet of fish, eggs and vegetables, without in the least degree mortifying the flesh, abstinence from theatres and balls was enjoined during Lent, and an unusual quantity of religious services was prescribed. At this point in Lenten observance the Church of Rome wisely stopped, and with her the Greek Church substantially agrees, with the exception of lengthening Lent to forty-eight days, though this probably is one of the results of that disastrous struggle with the calendar in which the Greek Church engaged, and in which it has been so signally worsted.

The Church of England recognizes Lent by special religious services, but leaves the observance of it to the personal consciences of individual believers. As a consequence there is a wide diversity of opinion and practice among its members. The Ritualist abandons meat, and eats as little food of any kind as is compatible with avoiding suicide. The growth of ritualism has been, in this respect, a great benefit to the medical profession. The stomachic troubles arising from a ritualistic observance of Lent are not as acute and violent as those which follow Christmas, but they last longer, and it is estimated that a congregation of thirty ritualistic ladies will give a physician, who makes a specialty of dyspepsia, a very fair living. While the Ritualist far surpasses the Roman Catholic in his Lenten strictness, the Low Churchman regards Lent with some little suspicion as an essentially Romanist affair. He limits his fasting to abstinence from theatres and balls, to which, as a rule, he is conscientiously opposed at any season, and which he can, therefore, temporarily forswear without any great sacrifice.

Among the less devout of High Churchmen, Lent is kept in a very ingenious manner. The chief feature of their system is the theory of vicarious mortification. The lady of High Church views, but with a nervous system which abhors fasting, and imperatively requires amusements, is still able to show a proper respect for Lent by forbidding the children to go to the circus. It was a particularly ingenious lady of this class who devised the plan of cutting off the pet terrier's supply of sugar during Lent. Her example has borne excellent fruit, and in many households, where it is desired to keep Lent without personal inconvenience, the horses are made to temporarily wear their second-best set of harness, and the dogs' brass collars are removed. A marked distinction between Lent and other seasons of the year is thus made, and these vicarious austerities can be endured by a truly earnest spirit without much personal suffering.

Even this, however, is not the last degree of refinement to which the keeping of Lent has been brought. There are many young men who show their devotion to the Church by resolving to give up smoking in Lent. This resolution is a creditable one, and does them undoubted good during the three or four months next preceding Lent. There is, however, no case on record where any young man has carried out this resolution. Either he forgets the precise day on which Lent comes in, or he remembers that he is in danger of becoming corpulent if he suddenly abandons tobacco, and he therefore postpones the performance of his resolution until next year. It would require a skilled theological casuist to determine whether this method of keeping Lent by resolutions which are never performed is better than that of keeping it by shifting the duty of mortification upon dogs and horses.

Such are the results to which the neutrality towards Lenten observance displayed by the Anglican Church has led. In that church actual fasting has virtually become an extinct practice except among the Ritualists. The Puritan has also ceased to fast. When he abandoned Lent as a Romanist invention, he appointed certain annual fast-days in which he not only literally fasted, but he compelled his family, his cattle and the unhappy stranger who might be within his gates to do likewise. But the Puritan fast-day has utterly vanished. Indeed, in Connecticut it has done worse, for it has gradually changed into a feast-day; a holiday on which boys play baseball in the streets, and the land flows with cider and pumpkin-pie to an extent that has a decided Thanksgiving Day aspect. Thus, from the strict forty-days' fasting which the early Church intended, we have arrived by way of Rome, Anglicanism and Puritanism, to the repudiation of all fasting. The Lent of Protestantism has become, at best, a shadow of the once universal season of mourning, penitence and mortification, observed by the united Christian Church.

Who invented é as an English letter? What is its name, and what grammar or dictionary authorizes it? Is its use confined to a few words like employé, written in good old times employee? or are we bound also to write granté, doné, baillé, trusté, pharisé, consigné, legaté? May its use be extended to tré, flé, agré, wé, fré?

A STRAW best shows how the wind blows. The fact of Archduke Albrecht being selected to represent Austria at the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Czar's accession to the throne enables the German press to announce a rapprochement between Austria and Russia. Still Austria arms, and Russia's strength militant, like that of Germany's, is upon the increase.

THAT arch scamp the ex-Khedive ardently desires to obtain permission to take up his abode in Constantinople. His residence at Naples, he alleges, is fraught with much personal inconvenience. Amongst other things, he complains that the ladies of his establishment must either remain close prisoners in their houses, or be exposed to the vulgar curiosity of a gâteur mob if they venture out.

KING CHARLES II., the Merry Monarch, possessed a complete set of the original quarto edition of Shakespeare, and, it is stated, that a volume of the set, lettered "Shakespeare vol. 3," and containing the first edition of the second part of "Henry IV.", 1600, and several other scarce Shakespearean plays, was sold some little time back at an auction in London. As the Americans are invariably "on hand" on such occasions, it is not unlikely that this rare book may, in good time, cross the pond.

IT is with a view to creating a "national feeling" in the annexed provinces of Alsace and Lorraine that special regiments are about to be raised, with the concurrence of Baron Manteuffel, the Governor-General. This seemingly plausible excuse for keeping a large armed force on the frontier is a little too thin—at least so thinks France, who at this time is sullenly engaged in discussing the "probabilities." Berthault, as Minister for War, was of opinion that railroads were more essential to France than cannon, and to his efforts are due the increased railway facilities for warlike purposes in the direction of the annexed territory.

A FULL estimate has just been published in the Bulletin des Halles et Marchés of the wheat yield of all the world, as compared with the average yield. The average production for the whole of Europe is 962,866,150 bushels, while that of 1879 is only 763,987,500 bushels, being a falling off of 198,878,650 bushels. The average yield for other parts of the world is 1,367,887,500 bushels, and for the past year 1,189,487,500 showing a decrease of 178,400,000. The deficiency of the crop for the whole world is 377,279,150 bushels. The average yield of the United States is set down at 337,500,000 bushels, and France comes next with 296,172,000.

M. CHARLES LAMOUREUX, the ex-conductor of the Paris Opera, is engaged on the realization of a project long since conceived by him, which consists in the founding of an institution for performing on a grand scale musical compositions, both vocal and instrumental, of all ages, countries and schools, and also of bringing together eminent performers of every nationality. He is associated in his scheme with M. Jules Delahaye, formerly general secretary of the Opera; and both are engaged in forming a company for the erection and management of a grand concert hall, suitable for the large masses of performers whom they propose to assemble for their concerts.

Berlin. His condition has changed much for the worse since the last session of the Reichstag. He was then hoping that the ill effects of his strenuous exertions to pass the new tariff might be remedied by his usual course of waters in the Autumn; but this hope has proved ill-founded. Instead of the quick-footed Bismarck, who ran up-stairs "like a school-boy," there came back from Gastein in September a heavy, corpulent, and weary-footed man, the glance of whose eye was as worn after his holidays as before. Has his nation another Bismarck ready?

How much do you pity the Irish? "I pity them $100,000," says James Gordon Bennett. And this is a very substantial and tangible kind of pity, very worthy of imitation. Instead of disputing as to what charitable hand the possible contributions of the benevolent may be sent, it is an immense step for a private individual to make the possible a real by a donation that leaves the subscriptions of royalty, and the slow relief measures of Parliament, far in the background of shame. The sum given by Mr. Bennett gives him a high rank among practical philanthropists, it silences a world of mean, petty questions, and rouses the charitable to act and give better than all the appeals that eloquence can frame.

THERE is a very sensible proposal among those of Irish race in this country to dispense this year with the St. Patrick's Day parades and dinners, and to send the amount that would have been expended to the relief of their suffering countrymen at home. It will be an excellent step; and not only be a great charity, but will help to the gradual abolition of a custom which has ceased to contribute to their credit and advantage in this country. It is a thing of the past and should be left to the past—making the celebration in such more quiet form of a religious or social character as will make the day one of pride to them and secure for them the esteem of all classes.

THE thousand and one odors of Cologne are being out-odored by Nizza la bella, the beautiful Nice, the fragrance of whose sewers is not only upon the handkerchiefs of its inhabitants, but likewise upon their garments. It is well-nigh inconceivable, yet it is nevertheless the case, that to politics is due the unsatisfactory condition of Nizza la bella, for, in order that the Republic and its institutions may flourish, this most charming resort of the high and mighty ones of the earth—what noses those hardy Republicans must possess!—remains in its present abominable state, because the Republican party fear to lose the elections if they have anything to do with adding to the taxation of the town by a sewer-rate!

AND so Lord Beaconsfield plays whist execrably—this man who holds kings and queens for honors, and who contrives to collar the odd trick after some mysterious play never guessed at by either his partners or his opponents. Hughenden is set down as a "pretentious villa," and is surrounded by trees planted from time to time by royal personages. There is no picture of artistic value in the pretentious villa save a portrait of Lord Byron, but in the library are many books presented to the Juggler of the Jingoes by the august lady whom he made empress. As a host, he is amiable, but not companionable. He seldom joins in conversation, but sits nursing his own thoughts, and if addressed, replies with some mystic truism.

STUFFED of Disraelian phraseology, the speech of Her Most Gracious Majesty Queen Victoria, uttered per the Lord High Chancellor at the opening of the British Parliament, might have been spoken thus: My Lords and Gentlemen—I am at peace with all the world. The Berlin Treaty is still in labor. The Sultan and I are solid on the slave question. To avenge Cavagnari I'll annex Afghanistan. South Africa is as quiet as a lamb. Cape Colony shall have Home Rule. The crops in Ireland are deficient. Money shall be advanced for public works on the security of the property administered by the Church Temporalities Commission. Gladstone provided the fund. Beaconsfield shall spend it. Other Bills will be laid before you. Heaven bless you all.

THE volunteers of Great Britain—England and Scotland, for the "mere Irish" are not to be trusted with rifles—are coming out strong. The volunteer returns for the past year show that the enrolled strength of the force has risen from 203,213 in 1878, to 206,250, and the efficients from 194,191 to 197,585, or a percentage of 95.74 against 95.55. The proficients, officers and sergeants, are likewise increased to the highest figure yet known, being 5,586 and 11,825 respectively, or a total of 17,411, whereas in 1878 they were 5,536 and 11,518. The increase is general throughout the country, and in all arms, with the exception of light horse and mounted rifles, which show a diminution. What does all this mean? Is there any expectancy that the Battle of Dorking may yet have to be fought?

THE Bishop of Manchester has proved himself a man of the world—in the canniest acceptation of the term—and a wise man. He was married quietly, forgot to tell his bridesmaids where the church was, sent his mother-in-law a telegram to say she was wanted in the Orkneys, and bought a wedding-cake for eighteenpence at the nearest pastrycook's. There is much speculation as to where he bought the ring, and if it was eighteen carat, or did he invest in a ring at all? What a crusher to St. George's, Hanover Square, and to the institution of bride-maidens and "angels," and wedding breakfasts and satin slippers and rice! Verily, the bishop is a bold man. British bishops have been smitten with a marrying mania during the last two years. Bishops Temple, Maclagan and Frazer in England, and Bishops Mackarness and Germyn in Scotland, is a pretty good proportion for so short a time; two and a half bishops, in fact, per annum.

NEW YORK has acted promptly on the recommendation of Governor Cornell to give women the right to vote for school trustees. In both houses of the Legislature a Bill was introduced with that view. If the system of public schools is to stand, the women of America will not, and cannot, submit to have the choice of the educators of their daughters devolve on mere politicians whose own moral training does not commend them. The training of the future mothers of Americans should be committed to the purest and noblest of their sex, and no mother can but feel that she, or women who can appreciate her anxiety, should have some voice in the selection of the teacher who, for several hours each day, is to mold the mind and train the heart of her daughter. The choice of teachers of our girls should not be made in the village tavern or city barroom.

ENGLISH railroad engineers are enjoying a crow over us just now. The completion of the new railway from the Indus as far as Sibi, on the road to Quettah, is a notable instance of what can be accomplished by engineering skill and energy in these times. "Brother Jonathan," they say "boasted much formerly because he had made a certain portion of the Pacific Railway at the rate of a mile in every twenty-four hours. On the present occasion we have beaten that great performance easily, the railroad to Sibi having been constructed at the average rate of a mile and a third per diem since it was first taken in hand." Sibi lies due east of Dadur, the most important town on the old road between Shikurpoor and Quettah. The line was taken to the eastward to avoid certain obstacles, and to obtain a good starting-point whence to run it on to Quettah. The total cost of the railway is estimated at two and a half millions sterling. When the line once gets into thorough working order it ought to find considerable traffic passing over it. The bulk of the large trade between Central Asia and India will assuredly choose this route in preference to that through Cabul and the Khyber, when once it becomes known that a railway terminus exists in the Khelat State. If, however, current talk in India is to be trusted, the line is to be continued to Candahar itself, and, in that case, the western capital of Afghanistan would be likely to completely supersede the eastern as a commercial centre.

A CELESTIAL pea! The very name startles gourmandism into ecstatic expectations. Some experiments recently carried on by two or three Austrian and German horticulturists have brought into notice an almost forgotten plant which was introduced into Europe from China nearly thirty years ago, but whose existence, and whose products, have been undeservedly lost sight of. This is the Soja hispida, a species of leguminous plant, somewhat resembling in habit and appearance the well-known pea. Unlike the latter, however, it has two distinct uses—industrial as well as alimentary. It is highly prized in China and Japan, and is said, indeed, to take its scientific title from the Japanese name of a sauce-sooja—which is made from its seeds. The seeds are very similar to a "marrow-fat" pea, but contain a large quantity of oil, which is either pressed out of them or boiled out in process of cooking the seeds for the table, which is effected by simply throwing them into boiling water when the outer skin bursts, and floats to the surface, together with a quantity of oil, both the oil and the husks being skimmed off together. These may be either used as cattle food, or the oil may be separated and employed for various purposes, while the husks are still valuable as a feeding stuff or as a manure. The peas are boiled for about twenty minutes, and furnish a dish which is highly relished not only by the Celestials, but by many Europeans who have tasted it. It is said to resemble in flavor the green pea, but lacks its sweet taste.

IT will somewhat console our advocates of the abolition of ambassadors and their impedimenta, to learn that a raid is about being made in England upon that ambassadorial institution known as the Queen's Messenger. He has come to be regarded as an expensive luxury, too expensive; and as his functions consist in carrying Blue Books in white bags to Great Britain's Ambassadors abroad—the Blue Books come to the United States per the penny post—sensible people have arrived at the conclusion that if a Blue Book reaches Sir Edward Thornton in safety at Washington through the medium of the mail, a Blue Book runs just as good a chance of striking the Ambassador at Constantinople or the Envoy Extraordinary at Berlin. The Queen's Messenger is neither so dignified nor so important a person as he was in the old days, and he knows it. Ambassadors snub him, Secretaries of Embassy look down upon him; he is admonished, wigged, laughed at, and dubbed a postman. The corps to which he belongs is no longer composed of retired military men, but numbers in its ranks quill-drivers from the Foreign Office and clerks who have retired. He feels that he is doing the work of an ordinary letter-carrier, and that, as days go on, his office does not gain in dignity, but rather loses. And it is most likely that, could he have an equally good position found him elsewhere, he would be glad to surrender the right of transporting mail-bags from one station to another. England is not just now in possession of an overflowing revenue, economy should be the order of the day, and it behooves her to determine whether, taking the advantages and disadvantages of the Queen's Messengers into consideration, it would not be as well to do without those extravagantly-appointed representatives of Great Britain abroad.

A RECENT exposure in New York has shocked the public mind, and a clergymen lies in our city jail with no fewer than twenty-five indictments against him. Morally, an indictment lies against the system under which such things are possible. Traced back, the evil will be found to be in the great number of unemployed and underpaid clergymen in the country. The salaries of the clergy in the United States do not average five hundred dollars a year, and there are numbers unemployed who must seek a living. Unfortunately, life in the ministry does not fit a man to struggle in the world. Many of these clergymen at large take hold of some public want, and begin a charitable institution in order to live. The motive is praiseworthy and good, but the want of persuasive eloquence, personal magnetism and business tact, which made a man fail in the pulpit makes him fail in managing his little charitable institution. He gets enough sympathetic support to start it, but the feeling dies out. He dare not own that his project is a failure. His own denomination does not consider itself responsible, although the public mind will at once so regard it if anything goes wrong. Then begins a terrible struggle to make both ends meet; the clergyman grows desperate, his very soul hardens, and we have seen to what misery he can bring himself and those under his charge. One step in the right direction will be for every denomination to assume at once responsibility for all charities directed by its ministers, and exercise a supervision over them, or promptly, clearly and plainly disavow all connection, and make it distinctly known that they are private ventures, the object of which is to make a living. Then the public will not be misled, and men will not unthinkingly give their name and donations to build up questionable charities.

THERE was the shadow of a deep grief on the noble and handsome face of Senator Anthony as he arose to speak of his dead friend, Zachariah Chandler. The Chamber became instantly hushed, and every eye turned to the Senator whose superb physique so "boldly marks him amongst men." Mr. Anthony, although as yet but on the threshold of his Autumn, is the senior member of the Senate, and one of its ablest, most respected and most honored members. He said: "Mr. President, this scene and this occasion renew to me the shock which I experienced when the sorrowing wires unloded their burden of grief and told me that Chandler was dead. It is difficult to associate Zachariah Chandler with the idea of death. His exuberant vitality, his overflowing spirit, his commanding air and presence, all forbid it. I almost look to see his manly and vigorous figure—fit tenement of his manly heart and his vigorous intellect—rise from his accustomed seat, towering above his peers in this Chamber; I almost listen for that voice whose stentorian tones these walls have so often sent back to our ears. Born and educated in New England, passing the maturity of his years in the West, he united, in an uncommon degree, the qualities and characteristics of each—the shrewdness, the steadiness, the keen observation, the inflexible purpose of the one; the freshness, the eager earnestness, the sturdy robustness of the other; the fidelity, the truthfulness, the manliness of both. His sincerity was beyond question; his honest belief in the principles which he professed was never disputed; he meant what he said, and he said all that he meant. The strength of his convictions found expression in the boldness of his utterance. Disdaining the lighter graces of rhetoric, his speeches did not sparkle with wit nor glow with sentiment, but they bristled with facts; if he did not captivate by his style, he compelled assent by his reasoning; and when he had arranged his facts and constructed his argument, his conclusion followed with almost irresistible force. Devoting himself to commerce and to politics, he attained eminent success in each, and secured the highest rewards of both. To dwell at length upon his qualities as a partisan might offend the proprieties of the occasion, and I forbear. But even the slightest sketch of him would be imperfect without some reference to his partisan character. He was a party man. He held that the division of the people into parties was essential to the balance of elective institutions. He early selected for his support the party that was, in his judgment, most conformable to the spirit of the Constitution, to the rights and liberties of the people, and to the prosperity of the country; and having deliberately made his choice, he adhered to it with all the tenacity of his nature. He believed in strong measures; and had no confidence in half-way methods and expedients. Whatever was right and proper he held was to be promoted by all legal and proper means. He died as he would have preferred to die—suddenly, painlessly, and with his harness on. He fell as the warrior falls, on the eve of battle, with his sword in his hand and his shield upon his arm. Death was kinder to him than it often is to the race of man, to all of whom 'it is appointed once to die.' No lingering disease wasted that stalwart form; no protracted suffering enfeebled that masculine intellect. The pale messenger, unheralded and unexpected, summoned him in the vigor of health and of active usefulness, touched him with his wand, and he sank to eternal sleep—no, we believe he rose to eternal life." Many other members of the Senate also spoke of the late Mr. Chandler in terms of the highest eulogy.

HON. FRANK HEREFORD,

U. S. SENATOR FROM WEST VIRGINIA.

SENATOR HEREFORD, Chairman of the Committee on Mines and Mining in the Forty-sixth Congress, was born in Fauquier County, Virginia, July 4th, 1825. After graduation he studied law, and was, in due season, admitted to practice. Removing to California in the early part of his legal career, he became District Attorney of Sacramento County in 1855, and held the position two years. He was a Presidential Elector on the Democratic ticket in 1868, and was a member of the House during the Forty-second, Forty-third and Forty-fourth Congresses. Upon the death of Hon. Allen T. Caperton, of West Virginia, he was elected to fill the vacancy in the United States Senate for the term ending March 3d 1881. In addition to holding the chairmanship of the important Committee on Mines and Mining, Senator Hereford is a member of the Committees on Commerce and Claims.

"THE FALSE FRIEND."

WE illustrate a highly dramatic situation in Mr. Edgar Fawcett's play, "The False Friend," now being performed at the Union Square Theatre. Lucian Gleyre having impersonated Cuthbert Fielding, whom he has left for dead in a cañon in the gold fields of Australia, and having returned to England, has been acknowledged by Fielding's sister and by an aged retainer; but Lady Ogden, a venerable dame aged eighty-two, entertains secret misgivings as to his identity, and, with a view to a thorough test, has presented him with what purports to be a portrait of his mother, over which the presumed Fielding gushes in well-assumed devotional rapture. Lady Ogden, however, finds that she has in error placed the portrait of a mere friend of the family in his possession, and her suspicions becoming strong as Holy Writ, she fiercely taxes him with his perfidy, announcing her intention of denouncing him. Before she can put her design into execution a stroke of lightning blinds, paralyzes and eventually kills her, and it is the moment while she is hopelessly engaged in a ghastly but vain attempt to speak or write that we have selected for our illustration. The situation is intensely dramatic—the terrible struggles of the venerable lady, the agonized suspense of the villain, the momentous issues hanging upon every tick of the clock. Will she, can she speak? Will not something interpose to save the good old family from the shameful stain that is about to be put upon it? She must make some sign! One word, and his rascality will be laid bare to the world. One word, and he steps from that palatial drawing-room to the felon's dock. She makes no sign, and Lucian Gleyre triumphs—till later on, when Love, that will be "lord of a'," compels him to unmask, compels him to wreck his richly-laden argosy, and, in one moment of unendurable agony, to fling the nefarious scheme of his life into the black waters of remorse. He madly loves Fielding's sister, and he must either renounce his passion or declare himself a swindler, a cheat, and a false friend. Mr. Edgar Fawcett has invested a somewhat threadbare plot with a refreshing newness, and has woven in some vivid coloring with masterly effect. The character of Lady Ogden stands forth in luminous relief, while the interesting villainy of Lucian Gleyre begets an unwearied interest.

FEBRUARY'S FURY.

THE month of February opened as if determined that the season should not pass without some evidence of how severe Winter can be. The storm of wind which broke over New York on the night of the 2d had been gaining strength in its sweep from the Gulf of Mexico for forty-eight hours. After passing over twenty States the storm centre reached the metropolis, where it found an abundance of snow in waiting. Shortly after midnight both combined, and by daylight the minds of people were prepared to hear of disasters on sea and land, freezing, suffering and death.
